SENATE

THURSDAY, JANUARY 16, 1936

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed Savior, who at this hour didst hang upon the cross stretching forth Thy loving arms: grant that as we thus behold Thee we may love Thee more and more, and loving Thee may hate those sins from which Thou hast redeemed us. Have mercy upon all who are in want; comfort those who are in sorrow; enlighten the perplexed; strengthen the faint-hearted; and by Thine own example kindle in us all the flame of true devotion to our country and our God.

And when life's golden days have winged their flight and we no longer barter time for good, nor have the power to heap up life or buy one added hour, do Thou then receive us unto Thyself that where Thou art there we may be also. We ask it for Thy sake, who died to save us all. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Monday, January 13, 1936, when, on request of Mr. ROBINSON, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the following bills of the Senate:

S. 1016. An act to empower the health officer of the District of Columbia to authorize the opening of graves, and the disinterment and reinterment of dead bodies, in cases where death has been caused by certain contagious diseases;

S. 2013. An act to provide for the issuance of a license to practice the healing art in the District of Columbia to Dr. Pak Chue Chan; and

S. 2939. An act to provide for the issuance of a license to practice the healing art in the District of Columbia to Dr. Ronald A. Cox.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1277) to amend section 24 of the Judicial Code by conferring on district courts additional jurisdiction of bills of interpleader, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2434) for the relief of George W. Hallowell, Jr., with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House insisted upon its amendments to the bill (S. 381) for the relief of the Confederated Bands of Ute Indians located in Utah, Colorado, and New Mexico, disagreed to by the Senate; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma, Mr. MURDOCK, and Mr. BURDICK were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 8437. An act to provide for the issuance of a license to practice the healing art in the District of Columbia to Dr. Arthur B. Walker;

H. R. 8577. An act to amend the Teachers' Salary Act of the District of Columbia, approved June 4, 1924, as amended, in relation to raising the trade or vocational schools to the level of junior high schools, and for other purposes;

H. R. 8820. An act to amend section 907 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901, as amended, up to and including June 7, 1924; and

H. R. 8821. An act to define the crime of bribery and to provide for its punishment.

The message communicated to the Senate House Resolution No. 396, as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (S. 3260) to amend Public Law No. 438, Seventy-third Congress, entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase silver, issue silver certificates, and for other purposes", in the opinion of this House contravenes that clause of the Constitution of the United States requiring revenue bills to originate in the House of Representatives, and is an infringement of the prerogatives of this House, and that said bill be respectfully returned to the Senate with a message communicating this resolution.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (S. 430) for the relief of Anna Hathaway, and it was signed by the Vice President.

REPORT OF THE DIRECTOR OF EMERGENCY CONSERVATION WORK

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress, the report of the Director of Emergency Conservation Work, embracing the activities of that organization which includes the group popularly known as the Civilian Conservation corps, for the period April 5, 1933, through June 30, 1935. Text and tables are included, showing in considerable detail the extensive activities of this organization in relieving unemployment, providing for the restoration of the country's natural resources, and assisting in the program of national recovery.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 16, 1936.

REPORT OF GOVERNMENT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the president of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of the operations of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1935, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS OF THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Librarian of Congress, transmitting, pursuant to law, his annual report as Librarian of Congress, together with the report of the Register of Copyrights, for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1935, which, with the accompanying reports, was referred to the Committee on the Library.

NOVEMBER REPORT OF RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, reporting, pursuant to law, relative to the activities and expenditures of the Corporation for November 1935, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the General Court of Massachusetts, favoring the enactment of legislation providing for the immediate cash payment of adjusted-service certificates of World War veterans, which were ordered to lie on the table.

(See resolutions printed in full when presented today by Mr. COOLIDGE, p. 459.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a letter from Mrs. Emile Bienvenu, of New Orleans, La., transmitting resolutions adopted by a mass meeting at New Orleans, La., of the Democratic Party of that State, protesting against any Federal interference or control over primary elections in the State of Louisiana, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. COOLIDGE presented the following resolutions of the General Court of Massachusetts, which were ordered to lie on the table:

Resolutions memorializing Congress in favor of the immediate cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates of veterans of the World War

Whereas it appears that present national economic conditions warrant the extension of adequate relief to a large number of those who served in the armed forces of the United States Government during the recent World War; and

Whereas it appears that adjusted-service certificates were issued to those mentioned above by the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau in compliance with section 501 of title V of the World War Adjusted-Compensation Act; and

Whereas it appears that it is the consensus of opinion and the desire of a large number of those who have received the above-mentioned certificates to realize the immediate cash value of their adjusted-service certificates: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Court of Massachusetts respectfully represents to Congress and the President of the United States the advisability of providing for the immediate payment to war veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service compensation certificates; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded forthwith by the secretary of the Commonwealth to the President of the United States, the Presiding Officers of both branches of Congress, and to the Members thereof representing this Commonwealth.

Mr. WALSH presented papers in the nature of petitions from Local Union No. 2384, of Webster, and Local Union No. 2332, of Northbridge, both of the United Textile Workers of America, in the State of Massachusetts, praying for the enactment of House bill 9072, known as the National Textile Act, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Springfield, Mass., remonstrating against the neutrality policy of the administration, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Sixty-third Great Sun Council, Improved Order of Red Men, of the Great Council of Massachusetts, favoring the enactment of legislation creating a Bureau of Alien Deportation in the Department of Justice, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. WALSH. I present copy of resolutions, similar to those offered today by my colleague [Mr. COOLIDGE] and printed elsewhere in the RECORD, from the Massachusetts General Court, memorializing Congress in favor of the immediate cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates of veterans of the World War.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be received and lie on the table.

Mr. COPELAND presented resolutions adopted by the Quaker Springs Local of the New England Milk Producers' Association, and Lewis County Pomona Grange, both of the State of New York, favoring the enactment of legislation imposing an additional tax upon oleomargarine, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the annual meeting of the National Association of Sales Finance Companies, favoring the nonextension of activities of the E. H. F. A. into urban communities; the cessation of the activities of F. H. A. in respect of small movable chattels, and that title I of the National Housing Act expiring in April 1936 be not renewed in terms authorizing the continuance of credit insurance on the financing of small chattels, which were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Warehousemen's Association of the Port of New York, N. Y., protesting against the use of certain water-front terminal property acquired by the Government pursuant to an act of Congress authorizing the taking of property for war purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a letter from the commander of the New York Chapter, the American Veterans Association, enclosing copy of a telegram addressed to Mr. Ray Murphy, national commander of the American Legion, stating in part, "New York Chapter of the American Veterans Association urges you as leader of the largest organization of World War Veterans to reaffirm the American Legion policy as regards service pensions as declared at the Fourth National Convention of the American Legion held at New Orleans in 1922, wherein the Legion recorded itself as being opposed to the creation of a general pension system", etc., which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions of the Crusaders Democratic League, Inc., and St. Vito of Ciminna Society, both of Brooklyn; the Italo-American Union, Sons of Italy, of Schenectady; the Ravanusa Club, of Buffalo; and an organization of the nineteenth assembly district, all in the State of New York, protesting against the neutrality policy of the administration, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution of Isabella Council, No. 873, Knights of Columbus, Brooklyn, N. Y., favoring the allocation of 50 percent of radio frequencies or wave lengths to educational, religious, agricultural, labor, and similar non-profit-making associations, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented the petition of Harry J. Green and sundry other citizens of Williamsville and vicinity, New York, praying for the enactment of legislation granting additional salary to rural mail carriers employed on unusually densely populated routes, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented resolutions adopted by Branch No. 12, Jugoslav Federation of the Socialist Party, and Lodge No. 728, "Gewanda Boosters", Slovene National Benefit Society, both of Gewanda, and Lodge No. 211, Slovene Progressive Benefit Society, all in the State of New York, favoring the adoption of a so-called workers' rights amendment to the Constitution, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. SMITH. From the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 3612) to provide for loans to farmers for crop production and harvesting during the year 1936, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 1466) thereon. I desire to state that this bill is identical with the one passed last year; and I think all the members of the committee join me in hoping we may get early action, because, if relief is to be given, it must be given before planting time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. McNARY, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the bill (S. 3596) to provide for making rental and benefit payments to farmers who have made crop-adjustment contracts with the Secretary of Agriculture, reported it without amendment.

Mr. COPELAND, from the Committee on Commerce, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

H. R. 7814. A bill to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to grant to the State of California an easement over certain land of the United States in Tehama County, Calif., for highway purposes (Rept. No. 1467); and

H. R. 7995. A bill to authorize a preliminary examination of the Arkansas River and Fourche Bayou, with a view to the control of floods in the vicinity of Little Rock and North Little Rock, Ark. (Rept. No. 1468).

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED

SUSPENSION OF GIN TAX

Mr. RUSSELL. I introduce a joint resolution for the suspension of the gin tax provided for in the so-called Bankhead Cotton Control Act, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 195) for the suspension of the gin tax provided for in the so-called Bankhead Cotton Control Act, approved April 21, 1934, as amended, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate Joint Resolution 195

Joint resolution for the suspension of the gin tax provided for in the so-called Bankhead Cotton Control Act, approved April 21, 1934, as amended

Whereas the Supreme Court of the United States in its recent decision declaring unconstitutional and invalid the act of Congress establishing the Agricultural Adjustment Administration clearly indicated that, in the opinion of a majority of the Court, the act commonly known as the Bankhead cotton control measure was unconstitutional, null, and void; and

Whereas, on account of the lack of a case pending in the Supreme Court properly presenting for the determination of that body the question of the constitutionality of the Bankhead Cotton Control Act, the cotton producers of the Nation are shackled with a program of mandatory control of production without being permitted the benefit payments from the Treasury of the United States for the reduction in production of this commodity, thereby leaving cotton as the only great essential commodity under drastic mandatory restrictions as to production; and

Whereas under said Bankhead Cotton Control Act taxes are now being collected from the cotton producers of the United States on all cotton ginned in excess of the allotment to such farmers allowable under the terms of said Bankhead Cotton Control Act, and said taxes are being collected by virtue of an act which, under the decision in the A. A. A. case, is certain to be declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court when the question is properly presented; and

Whereas gin taxes in the amount of thousands of dollars have already been illegally collected from cotton producers on all cotton ginned by them in excess of their allotment, and recovery of said taxes will result in great confusion, expense, and difficulty both to the producers who have paid said taxes and to the Government of the United States and its agents and officials, and will cause much litigation and legislation in the adjustment of refunds; and

Whereas it is inconsistent with sound public policy to collect any further taxes under an act already clearly designated by the Supreme Court as null and void, and it is, further, unfair to the producers of cotton to limit their production to definite allotments, some of which are too small to permit such producers to earn a livelihood, while denying such producers any benefit payments as provided in the Agricultural Adjustment Act: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the gin tax provided for in the Bankhead Cotton Control Act, the same being an act entitled "An act to place the cotton industry on a sound commercial basis, to prevent unfair competition and practices in bringing cotton into the channels of interstate and foreign commerce, and to provide funds for paying additional benefits under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes", approved April 21, 1934, as amended, be, and the same is hereby, suspended.

ALLOCATION OF EMERGENCY RELIEF FUNDS

Mr. DAVIS. I introduce a bill to provide for the allocation of emergency relief funds, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The bill (S. 3673) to provide for the allocation of funds appropriated by the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935 was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DAVIS subsequently said: Mr. President, earlier in the day I introduced a bill (S. 3673) to provide for the allocation of funds appropriated by the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935 through the administrative agencies of local governmental units. At that time I asked that the bill be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The bill provides that all funds appropriated by the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935 which have not been expended prior to the enactment of this act, except funds allocated for expenditure for Federal projects or for expenditure by the State highway departments of the several States, shall be allocated by the President to the several States in proportion to their respective populations.

It further provides that any municipality or local political subdivision of the several States may submit relief or work-relief projects to the President for his approval.

It further provides that funds so allocated by the President shall be paid to the governing boards or bodies of local governmental units whose projects have been approved and administered in such manner and under such regulations as they may prescribe. The President may require of such governing boards or bodies such reports as are reasonably necessary to show that the funds so paid are expended only to carry out such projects.

An appropriation of $1,200,000,000 from the unexpended balance of the work-relief fund, allocated on a per capita basis to the various political subdivisions of the country, would enable local officials to sponsor substantial construction projects, create jobs for the unemployed in their respective communities, create markets for materials and equipment necessary to carry out the program, thus starting the wheels of private industry, creating additional jobs in a normal and orderly manner.

The administration of the works relief program and funds by locally elected officials would save millions of dollars in the cost of administration, wipe out partisan politics as the dominant factor in employing men, put an end to red tape and delay in getting projects under way, and result in work projects of a more substantial character.

This proposal can in no way be considered a partisan matter. The allocation of funds would be made on the basis of population. The approval of projects would be in the hands of the President. The administration of funds and the direction of the relief and work-relief programs would be entrusted to local governmental officials, irrespective of their party affiliations.

The purpose of the Federal Government to provide relief for the unemployed has been clearly demonstrated. The relief program has failed to accomplish its purpose, because it has been administered centrally rather than locally. Democratic processes of government are more responsive in small areas than in larger ones. With Federal money at their disposal there is every reason to believe that local government officials, under the pressure of local public opinion, would give a far more efficient administration of the taxpayer's money than is possible under the present plan of long-range administration from Washington.

Every effort should be made to stimulate private business and build up private pay rolls. This can be accomplished more effectively when there is a local coordination between relief administration and private business enterprise. It is impossible for Federal officials working in and out of Washington to meet local needs as satisfactorily as local officials who have to rub shoulders day by day with the taxpayers who foot the relief bill. The transfer of the administration of relief to local governmental agencies is inevitable. The most expert opinion of statesmen and social welfare leaders points in this direction. Such a move, coming at this time, would be a tribute to the sagacity of the present administration and would show indisputably that relief is a public-welfare measure and not a political weapon.

WORLD WAR ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES—AMENDMENTS

Mr. KING submitted an amendment in the nature of a substitute intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 9870) to provide for the immediate payment of World War adjusted-service certificates, for the cancelation of unpaid interest accrued on loans secured by such certificates, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 9870) to provide for the immediate payment of World War adjusted-service certificates, for the cancelation of unpaid interest accrued on loans secured by such certificates, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO RIVER AND HARBOR BILL

Mr. BULKLEY submitted an amendment, and Mr. HAYDEN and Mr. HATCH, jointly, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them to the bill (H. R. 8455) authorizing the construction of certain public works on rivers and harbors for flood control and other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE

On motion of Mr. NEELY, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the following bills, and they were referred to the Committee on Finance:

H. R. 8577. An act to amend the Teachers' Salary Act of the District of Columbia, approved June 4, 1924, as amended, in relation to raising the trade or vocational schools to the level of junior high schools, and for other purposes;

H. R. 8820. An act to amend section 907 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901, as amended, up to and including June 7, 1924; and

H. R. 8821. An act to define the crime of bribery and to provide for its punishment.

COMPILATION OF LAWS ADMINISTERED BY VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

Mr. NORRIS submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 27), which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is requested to prepare and transmit to the Congress, in form suitable to be printed, a compilation of all Federal laws administered by the Veterans' Administration, which compilation shall contain (1) appropriate explanatory notes and annotations to each section of such compilation and (2) suitable headings, reference tables, and indices for the purpose of making available in convenient form, a clear and complete statement of the rights and privileges provided by such laws; and that this compilation shall be printed as a public document, and 8,000 additional copies shall be printed for distribution and use by the Veterans' Administration, of which not less than 7,000 copies may be furnished, upon written application to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, one copy to each post of the Grand Army of the Republic, to each camp of Veterans of the Indian Wars, to each camp of the United Spanish War Veterans, to each post of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, to each post of the American Legion, to each chapter of the Disabled American Veterans of the World War, and to each chapter of the American Red Cross.

WAR DEBTS, DISARMAMENT, CURRENCY STABILIZATION, AND WORLD TRADE

The VICE PRESIDENT. Resolutions coming over from a previous day are in order.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the resolution (S. Res. 141) submitted by Mr. TYDINGS on May 21, 1935, favoring conferences with foreign governments on war debts and certain other international matters.

Mr. ROBINSON. Let the resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

APPOINTMENT AND CONFIRMATION OF CERTAIN FEDERAL EMPLOYEES

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the resolution (S. Res. 152) submitted by Mr. GORE on June 15, 1935, calling on the Comptroller General for information concerning appointees or employees of the Government receiving compensation at the rate of $4,000 per annum or more.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that the resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

REPORT OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION ON AIR MAIL ACT

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, subsection (e) of section 6 of the Air Mail Act of 1934, as amended August 14, 1935, required the Interstate Commerce Commission to make examination as to rates in certain cases and report by January 15 of this year. I have a letter from the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, Hon. Charles D. Mahaffie, explaining why it was impossible to do so by that date. I ask that the letter be printed in the RECORD for the information of Senators.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, January 11, 1936.

The PRESIDENT, UNITED STATES SENATE.
The SPEAKER, UNITED STATES HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SIRS: Additional time is needed to comply with subsection (e) of section 6 of the Air Mail Act of 1934 (48 Stat. 933), as amended August 14, 1935 (49 Stat. 614), which provides in part:

The Commission is hereby authorized and directed, after having made a full and complete examination and audit of the books, and after having examined and carefully scrutinized all expenditures and purported expenditures, of the holders of the contracts hereinafter referred to, for goods, lands, commodities, and services, in order to determine whether or not such expenditures were fair and just and were not improper, excessive, or collusive, in the cases of the eight air-mail contracts which are allowed, by a previous report of the Commission, the rate of 33⅓ cents per mile, under the provisions of the act of June 12, 1934, on routes numbered 7, 12, 13, 14, 19, 25, 27, and 32, and the Commission shall make a report to the Congress, not later than January 15, 1936, whether or not, in its judgment, a fair and reasonable rate of compensation on each of said eight contracts, under the other provisions and conditions of said act, as herein amended, is in excess of 33⅓ cents per mile, together with full facts and reasons in detail why it recommends for or against any claim for increase.

While subsection (e) directs us to investigate the operations of only 8 routes, as a practical matter we must extend the investigation to 16 routes. Among the 8 routes are routes nos. 7 and 25, operated by American Airlines, Inc., and route no. 12, operated by United Airlines Transport Corporation. American operates 6 and United operates 2 other mail routes.

In addition, these and other carriers operate off-line passenger and express service. In the case of the Pennsylvania Airlines & Transport Co., operating route no. 32, also included in the eight routes, the off-line service is more extensive than that on its mail route. Carriers engaged in these multiple-route operations must of necessity first set up the combined results of those operations on their books, records, and accounts, and then allocate the total amounts to the various operations on the basis of actual results directly relating thereto with a predetermined arbitrary division of items common to all services. In such cases our investigation must therefore embrace a study of the total operations by each carrier and the apportionment of the results between its separate operations.

In order to carry out the directions of the statute it is necessary that we not only make a complete audit of the accounts and carefully scrutinize all expenditures of the routes affected, but "under the other provisions and conditions of said act", as amended, ascertain whether the expenditures have been upon a fair and reasonable basis and whether the carriers have paid more than a fair and reasonable market value for the purchase or rent of planes, engines, or any other type or kind or class of goods or services, including spare parts of all kinds, and whether the carriers have purchased or rented any kind of goods, commodities, or services from any individuals who own stock in or are connected with the carriers or have purchased such goods and services from any company or corporations in which any of the individuals employed by or owning stock in the carriers have any interest or from which such purchase or rents any of the employees or stockholders of the carriers would be directly or indirectly benefited; give consideration to all income derived from the operation of airplanes over the routes affected, the amount of air mail carried, the facilities supplied by the carrier, and the carrier's revenue and profits from all sources; and disregard losses resulting, in our opinion, from the unprofitable maintenance of nonmail schedules, in cases where we find that the gross receipts from such schedules fail to meet the additional operating expenses occasioned thereby.

We have carried on this work as expeditiously as possible with our limited force of employees in the Bureau of Air Mail, and all other work of the Bureau that could be deferred has been subordinated, but necessarily all of the employees in that Bureau could not be spared for this job.

Although good progress has been made, we regret to say that it will be impossible, for reasons hereinabove stated, to submit the report by January 15, 1936. We will continue to expedite the work, and shall submit a complete report at the earliest practicable date.

Respectfully yours,

CHARLES D. MAHAFFIE,
Chairman.

REGULATION OF TRANSPORTATION OF PASSENGERS AND PROPERTY BY AIRCRAFT—LETTER FROM THE POSTMASTER GENERAL

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, last August, as shown by Order of Business 1381 on the Senate Calendar, the Committee on Interstate Commerce reported favorably a bill, introduced by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], proposing to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, by providing for the regulation of the transportation of passengers and property by aircraft in interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes. On January 13 the Postmaster General, Mr. James A. Farley, wrote a letter to the Honorable BURTON K. WHEELER, chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, protesting against the passage of the bill. The arguments set forth are very interesting and important. I ask that the letter may be printed in the RECORD.

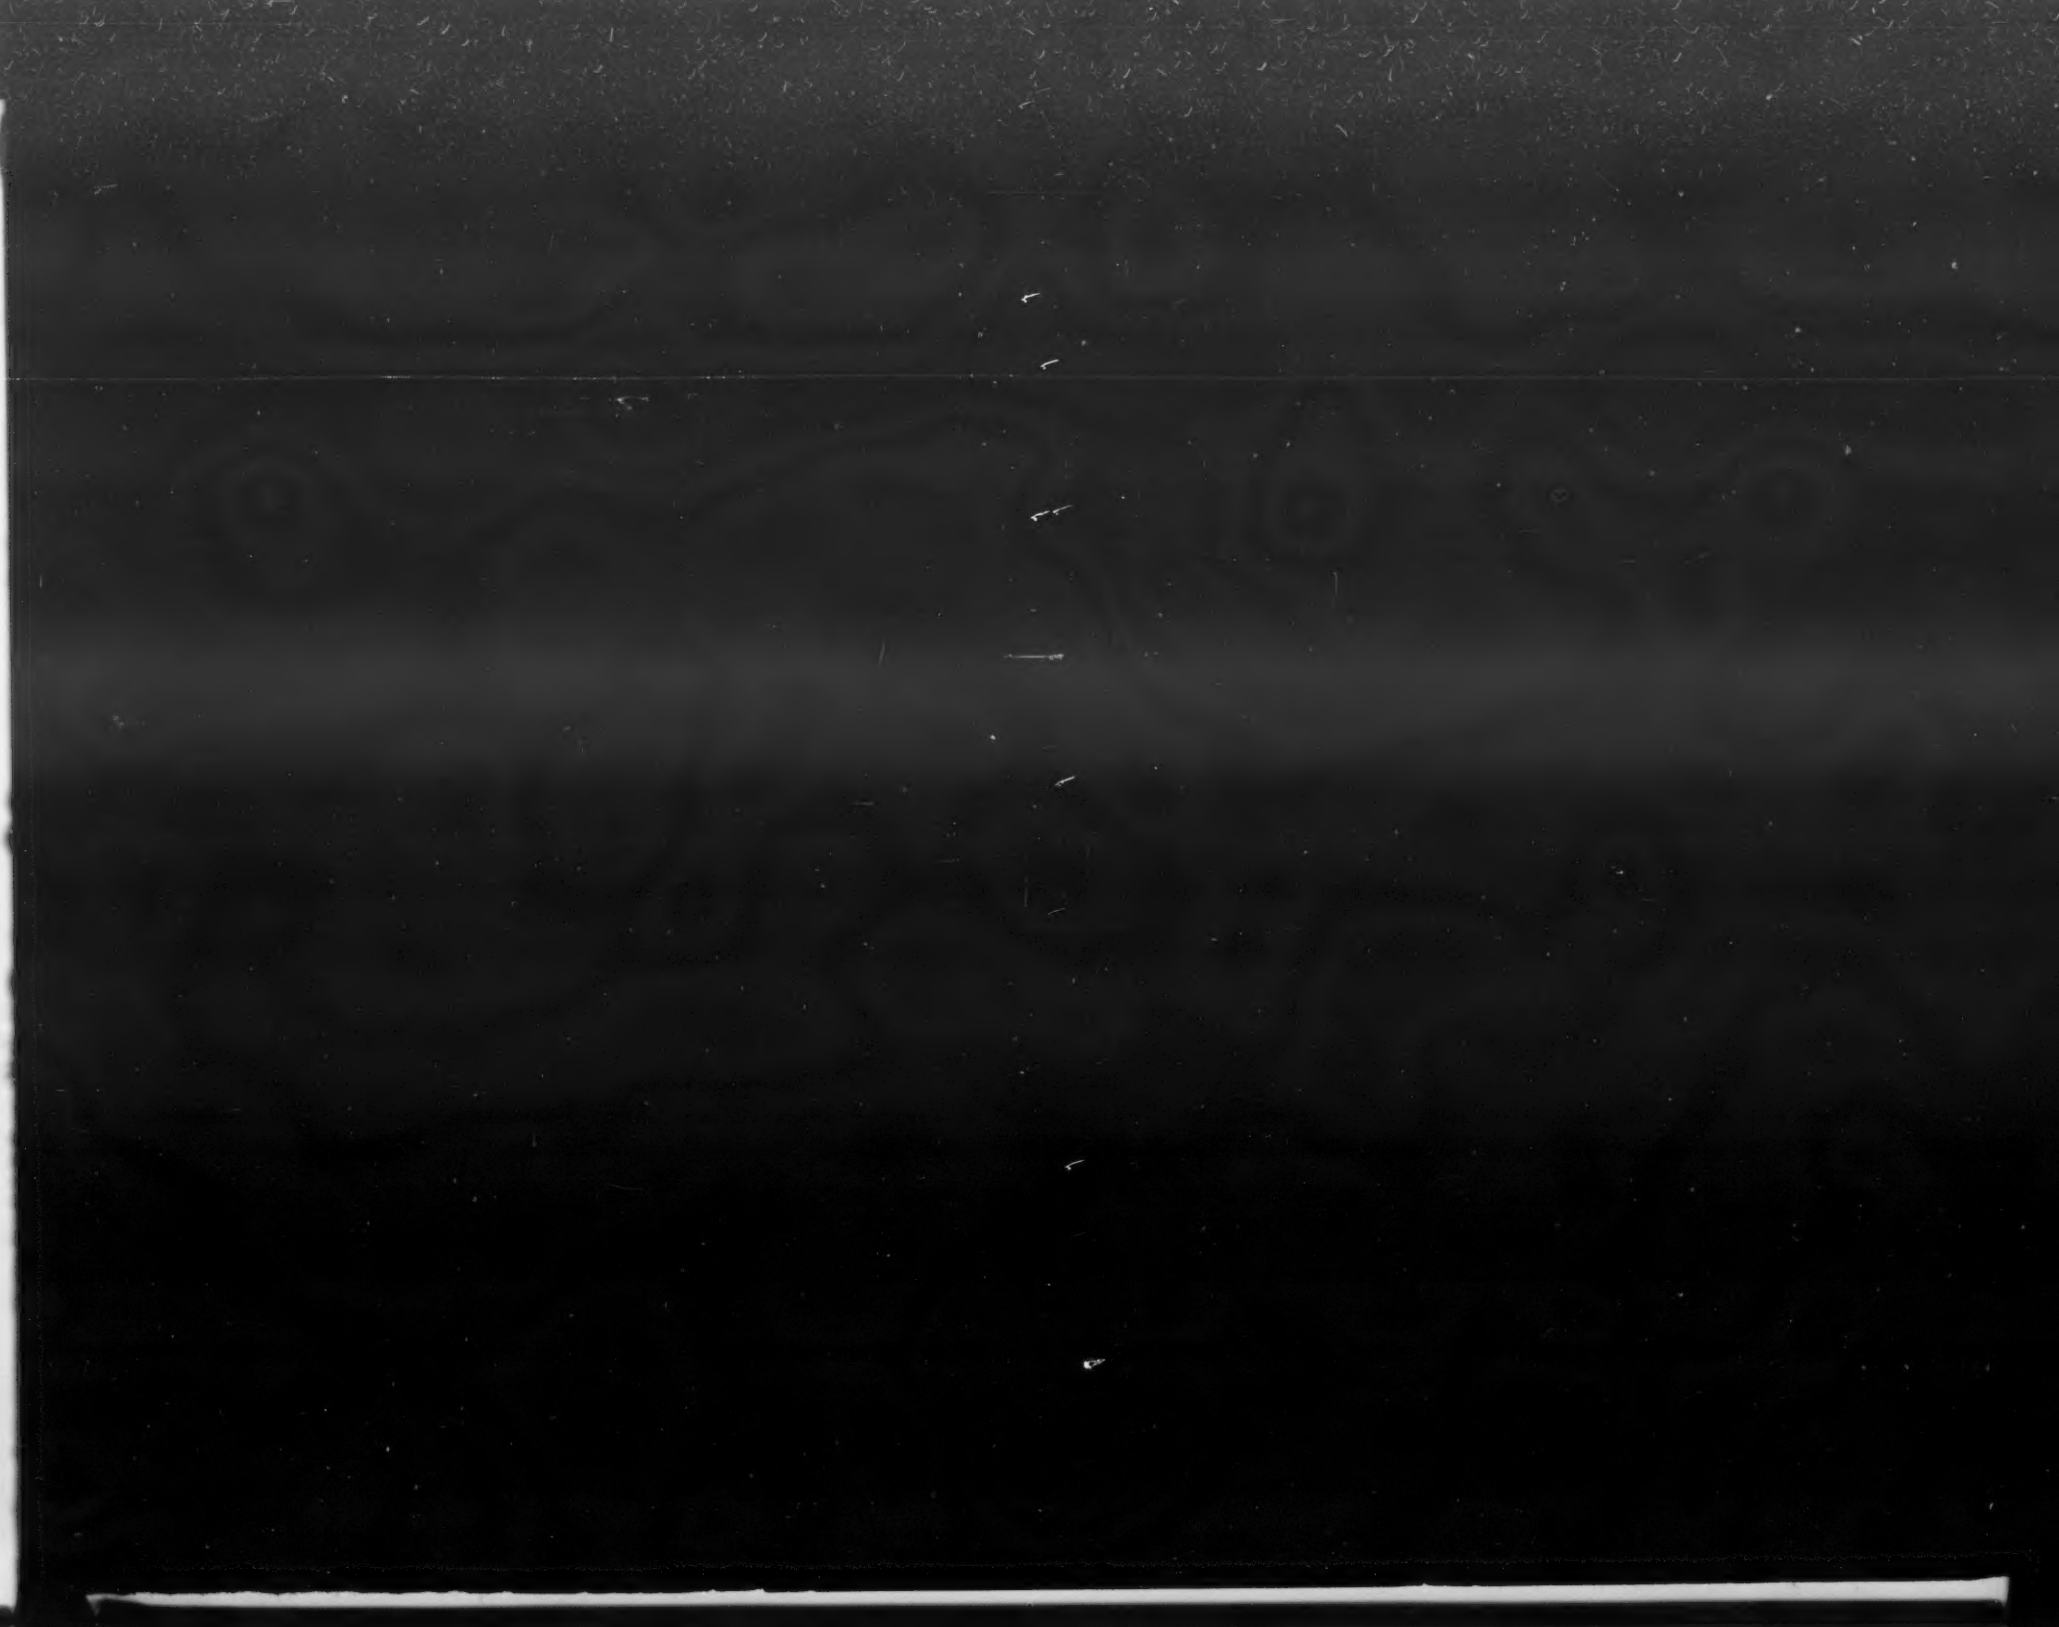
There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JANUARY 13, 1936.

Hon. BURTON K. WHEELER,
Chairman, Committee on Interstate Commerce,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR WHEELER: The report on S. 3420 was filed by Senator TRUMAN, of your committee, in Calendar No. 1381, July 29, 1935 (calendar day, Aug. 15, 1935), just before the adjournment of Congress. I do not know whether this report was intended to be the report of the whole committee, but at any rate I now understand it is on the Senate calendar. This bill has for its purpose the repeal of the greater portion of the present air-mail laws and the enactment of substitute legislation.

At the time this bill was under consideration, the Post Office Department did not have an opportunity to personally present its views to the committee. Representatives were allotted a brief period, but unfortunately only the author of the bill, Senator McCARRAN, and one other, Senator DONAHEY, were able to be present at the hearing. In view of the fact that since the bill was introduced another air-mail law has been enacted by Congress, this bill, S. 3420, may not be further considered by the Senate, or it may be referred back to your committee. I therefore desire to present to you, in the hope that they may be considered by the entire membership of your committee, my views upon the pending bill. I also at this time ask that if additional hearings are held, the Post Office Department be given an opportunity to appear.



This bill provides for the regulation of all air carriers and airport operators who operate regular scheduled service, by the Interstate Commerce Commission. The report appears to assume that there is not now any regulation by the Commission when, as a matter of fact, under existing law the Commission already has full and complete power and authority to regulate air-mail lines. Practically every one of the air-transport operators is a mail contractor; and the domestic air-mail system extends into practically every principal city and to every State in the Union except two, which have indirect connections.

The report of Senator TRUMAN refers to the appointment of Coordinator of Transportation Eastman and the Federal Aviation Commission, and to the reports of these two Commissions and testimony of individuals and air-line operators. Since the Coordinator and Aviation Commission were appointed and made their reports, the air-mail laws have been twice rewritten. These reports therefore cannot be used as the basis for the revision of the present law, because numerous and vital changes have been made which have permitted the building up of a much better aviation system and much better regulation. Also, since this bill was introduced the air-mail laws were amended to authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to increase rates as well as lower them, and a number of contractors have expressed themselves as being thoroughly satisfied with the law as it now is.

I do not think that the present air-mail law should be changed in any material respect at this time.

The present air-mail laws are the natural development from years of intense study and investigation by the two Post Office Committees of the Senate and the House, and were enacted upon the recommendation of these committees. During these years the Air Mail Transport Service has been operated under the direction of the Post Office Department, and Congress has usually depended upon that Department for accurate information as to the nature of the services rendered.

Every official of the Post Office Department is justly proud of assisting in establishing, under the present law, the finest air-transport system the world has ever seen. This system embraces 28,884 miles, over which planes fly more than 40,000,000 miles annually. The principal lines are using the highest type and most improved airplanes, flying from 185 to 215 miles per hour. Time has been reduced between all major points in the United States to a matter of hours, whereas under the old system it was a question of days. All records for passengers, express, and mail are broken practically every month. Ten million seven hundred and seventy-five thousand pounds of mail were carried in the fiscal year 1935, as against 6,741,000 in 1933. The passenger-miles flown by air-mail contractors for the fiscal year 1935 was 243,780,000 miles, as against 126,598,000 for the fiscal year 1933. The cost to the Government in 1932, with inferior service, was $20,154,146.19. The total direct cost of the service for the fiscal year 1935 was $9,836,846.49, or a savings of more than $10,000,000 annually. The air postage rate was reduced to a flat rate of 6 cents per ounce by Congress, and yet in the fiscal year 1935 the revenue derived from postage amounted to $6,589,534.45, leaving a deficit of only $3,250,000 as a subsidy.

Notwithstanding the lessened cost to the Government and the operation of the newest, finest, and most improved type of airplane by the contractors, involving the expenditure of millions of dollars for such new equipment, the air lines are generally doing well. The United Airlines, an air-mail contractor, in a recent statement showed an increase of approximately 26 percent in its earnings and is paying dividends. Transcontinental and Western Air has announced substantial increased earnings. The American Airlines, which operates more route miles than any other contractor, while claiming a loss at this time, announces an increase of 80 percent in its passenger revenues for a 6-month period this year compared to a similar period of last year. These largest lines, therefore, appear to be fast approaching a self-sustaining basis because of increased passenger and express revenues.

The condition just recited exists despite the fact that the rate fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission on only seven of the routes is the maximum rate authorized by law. Congress has fixed a base rate limit of 33⅓ cents per airplane mile for planes carrying 300 pounds of mail or less. This maximum rate applies on only seven of these lines. The Interstate Commerce Commission has authority to lower rates or raise them to as much as the base rate of 33⅓ cents per mile. After this law was passed the Commission held extended hearings, and after such hearings the Commission fixed a fair and reasonable rate for the transportation of mail over the lines by reducing the rate on 11 routes and increasing it on 19 routes and leaving the rate on 1 route the same as called for in the contract. Congress has directed the Commission to make a thorough investigation and audit of the books of the seven contractors who receive the maximum rate and report their recommendation to the next session of Congress not later than January 15, 1936, as to whether any increase in the base rate of pay should be made. Congress has already given thorough consideration to the question of rates. The Commission has held its hearings and fixed these rates, and is continuing from day to day to hold hearings concerning rates on different lines. It therefore follows that, from the standpoint of the question of the rate compensation to the carriers, there is absolutely no necessity for the passage of this bill.

I consider the present law provides an adequate method of securing transportation of the mails by air at reasonable rates.

The present law contains safeguards protecting the public interest which would be repealed by the passage of this bill. The pending bill seriously and unnecessarily interferes with States and municipalities in the operation of their laws and ordinances relating to the establishment and maintenance of airports, which is bound to lead to friction between Federal and local governments. Monopolies in the air transport business should be and are specifically prohibited by law. The pending bill would repeal the present law and, in fact, specifically authorize combinations and mergers that would result in the establishment of monopolies.

Competition should be encouraged in a new industry such as air transportation. Under the pending bill there can be no real competition. By reason of requirements of certificates of public convenience and necessity, competition is prevented at the outset. The air-mail lines are subsidized and the present law fixes limits upon the extent of the service, the rate of compensation, and the mileage that may be flown by the air lines each year. The proposed law removes those restrictions and is certain to result in a tremendous increase in expense to the Government.

These are some of the general reasons why it is the opinion of myself and others in the Department having direct charge of the administration of the present law, that S. 3420 should not be passed.

In support of my view that the passage of S. 3420 might have a detrimental effect on the air-transportation industry; that passage of the bill in its present form might be used to destroy some of the beneficient results of our present laws; and that no radical changes should be made now in the present air-mail laws, I submit the following detailed analysis of the law compared with corresponding sections of the pending bill:

REGULATION GENERALLY

Under the present laws, all regulations concerning the use and operation of airports, the operation of airplanes, the licensing of pilots, the requirements as to safety features and safety devices, arrangement, supervision and operation of all airways, beacon lights, and radio stations, are promulgated by the Bureau of Air Commerce of the Department of Commerce. The Bureau of Air Commerce was built up over a period of many years and is a very efficient bureau for handling the administrative problems in connection with the operation of air lines.

It is generally considered that the Bureau of Air Commerce maintains a very efficient, experienced, and able personnel, and their fitness and ability to handle the problems connected with the maintenance and supervision of airways has been recognized by all persons dealing in any phase of the aviation industry. The undertakings of the Bureau of Air Commerce affect not only the commercial air transport operators but also the operators of private planes, and it cooperates with the Army and Navy. Its work is purely administrative and wholly unrelated to any of the normal functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is a quasi-judicial body.

Section 404 of S. 3420 would vest in the Interstate Commerce Commission the authority to prescribe standards with respect to the types of equipment to be used; to approve or disapprove any rules or regulations issued by any other department which would affect the Commission's powers and duties; to approve or disapprove any application made by any air carrier, or airport operator, for any loans from any governmental agency or department; to study and report to Congress whether or not the Government should share the cost of maintenance of airports or whether any governmental aid should be given to air carriers or airport operators; to report to Congress the effect on air transportation of existing laws with respect to customs, immigration, public health clearances, and all such functions as are now being performed by the Commerce Department and other Government departments.

The airport operators and individual operators of airplanes, and the small commercial air lines that are not mail contractors, are not regulated by the Post Office Department or the Interstate Commerce Commission. They are strictly regulated, however, by local authorities and the Bureau of Air Commerce, and up to this time Congress has considered that the aviation industry was too young to be severely restricted by governmental regulation that would tend to hamper its natural growth and efficiency.

All domestic air-mail contractors, which include practically all persons engaged in commercial aviation, are being strictly regulated by the Interstate Commerce Commission as to rates and as to services supplied the public beyond and in addition to that required under the air-mail contract. The Commission can raise or lower rates and it can order a decrease or may permit an increase in the number of nonmail flights made by the contractor over his route.

CERTIFICATES OF PUBLIC CONVENIENCE AND NECESSITY

Section 405 (a) provides that no air carrier or airport operator shall engage in any interstate or foreign transportation, or any service connected therewith, unless he obtains a certificate of public convenience and necessity issued by the Commission.

Under the proposed law no municipality or citizen of a community may operate an airport if on any occasion it is used by any person engaged in interstate transportation by air, unless under the direction and with the consent of the Interstate Commerce Commission. This provision would naturally require every municipality or State to surrender any sovereign powers they might have, waive any requirements of laws made by their own legislatures, and be compelled to appeal to the Commission at Washington for authority to operate their own airports as they desire. This restriction as to airports does not apply alone to the air-transport operator engaged in interstate commerce but is much broader than that, and covers the operations of the airport if it is made available at any time for use by a person who flies from one State to another. The supervision of each of these airports and the policing of the airports by the Commission would not only involve a conflict of authority between the Federal and local governments but is certain to result in heavy expenditures of public funds used for such policing, inspection, and supervision.

Under the present law the Bureau of Air Commerce regularly inspects airports used by commercial planes, and simply either forbids the air-transport operators to use airports found not to be so constructed and maintained as to be safely employed as landing fields, or authorizes their use as such landing fields.

REGULATES FOREIGN AIR COMMERCE

Our foreign air-mail lines, which extend throughout Mexico, Central America, South America, the West Indies, Cuba, Hawaiian Islands, Philippine Islands, and to China, are regulated as to the services rendered to the United States by the Post Office Department. Whenever necessary, every administrative action taken by the Post Office Department is the result of consultation with the Bureau of Air Commerce as to safety features, types of equipment to be used, and other phases of the operations with the War and Navy Department from the standpoint of national defense. Obviously, our foreign air-mail contractors conducting friendly business negotiations with foreign nations necessarily must observe the laws of the foreign countries through which their lines extend.

The bill under consideration definitely requires that American citizens operating commercial air-transport businesses in foreign countries must first secure permission from the Interstate Commerce Commission. It makes no provision for consultation with the Secretary of State, who handles foreign affairs, and does not take into consideration any treaties or covenants or agreements of the United States.

Section 405 makes air carriers and airport operators in foreign transportation or service connected therewith subject to the law. It is inconceivable that the author of the bill would attempt to regulate the operation of airports in foreign countries if they rendered service connected with foreign air-mail transportation. Nevertheless, the bill so provides.

The foreign air-mail contractors are the only foreign air-transport operators of the United States. As stated, they must yield obedience to the laws of the countries through which they fly. Our present contractors are under the jurisdiction of the Post Office Department. Their present services are very valuable to the United States in building our foreign commerce, and the Commission should not have the power to direct any action on the part of our foreign air-mail lines that would jeopardize our foreign air-transport service.

From the standpoint of handling the mails the schedules of the foreign air-mail contractors must be fixed by the Post Office Department if the foreign air lines are to be of any benefit to the public. This is necessary in order to provide for connection with domestic air-mail lines, railroads, and steamships carrying the mails.

CREATION OF MONOPOLIES

Practically all of our domestic air-transport operators now operate with mail subsidies. Aviation is approaching the point where we hope subsidies will not be necessary. On the other hand, other individuals and corporations are becoming more interested in the air-transport industry and may be expected to institute services from different points in the United States without the assistance of subsidies. It is my opinion that free and unhampered growth of the industry should be accorded to it for a few years, and that, generally speaking, only the subsidized lines should be rigidly controlled, as they now are, by the Interstate Commerce Commission. If it is allowed to grow naturally and unrestricted, we may expect to see all of the smaller cities, towns, and villages of the Nation connected with a network of independent, nonsubsidized lines. Some of them will be profitable and some will die out because of their failure to develop the business which was expected. The Government at this time has no investment in the air lines other than the subsidies granted to them, and the same conditions do not prevail in the aviation industry as did in the railroads in their infancy. The regulation proposed at this time of the ordinary commercial carrier operating with its own resources is unjustified and would result in giving the present air-transport operators a full and complete monopoly.

VALUATION

Section 406 provides for the valuation by the Commission of all property owned or leased by all air carriers subject to the act.

Section 6 of the present law authorizes and directs the Commission to take into consideration, in the fixing of air-mail rates, all expenditures of every kind for goods, lands, commodities, and services; and in the determination of rates at this time the Commission is taking into consideration, and will continue to take into consideration, the value of all property of the air-mail carriers. Therefore, the Commission now has the authority which would be conferred on it by section 406. It can, and should, value all the property of the air carriers in order to ascertain and fix fair compensation without additional legislation.

ACCOUNTS, RECORDS, AND REPORTS

Section 407 authorizes the Interstate Commerce Commission to require annual, monthly, periodical, and special reports from all persons subject to the act and to prescribe the manner of keeping the books, records, and accounts, and to issue rules and regulations concerning the manner in which depreciation reserves shall be accrued and expended.

The present law not only authorizes the Postmaster General and the Commission to require the books, records, and accounts of the contractors to be kept as directed, but the Commission is also directed to examine the books, accounts, contracts, and entire business records of the holder of each air-mail contract each year, and to review the rates of compensation of the contractor in order to be assured that no unreasonable profit is resulting therefrom. Therefore, no new law in this respect is necessary.

RATES AND FARES

Sections 408 and 409 direct every airport operator to provide safe and adequate service and to establish, preserve, and enforce just and equal rates, fares, and classifications therefor. The tariff is required to be published, filed, and posted under the direction of the Commission, and it is authorized to repudiate any tariff found not to be in cognizance with the law and with the Commission's regulations. No air carrier or airport operator shall charge, demand, collect, or receive a greater or less or different compensation for transportation, or for any service in connection therewith, than the rates, fares, and charges specified in the tariffs in effect at the time. Numerous provisions of this character, which very closely follow the laws pertaining to railroads, are contained in the act, and the Commission is given authority over rates exactly as it is in the case of railroads.

From the experience of the Post Office Department, there are numerous objections to sections 408, 409, and 410.

The infant air-transport industry has found it necessary to have different rates per mile for the carrying of passengers and express in different localities. It has attempted to fix rates to meet proper demands for air travel and competition. In order to supplement revenues which they have obtained from their mail contracts, they have used various methods to build up their passenger and express business. And, again, it is repeated that in the experimental state in which this industry now is it is more likely to suffer than to be benefitted by being compelled to observe strict or hide-bound rules and regulations with reference to fixed charges for the carrying of passengers and express than if they are permitted to continue to feel their way along, test out public sentiment, and adopt such practices and fix such tariffs as they think will produce increased revenues and business. Again, it is emphasized that it is my opinion that the natural and fair competition existing will do more to develop the aviation industry than any rules made by a Government bureau.

Like other public conveniences which have been developed in this country and experimented with by thousands of persons who have become interested in them, cities and towns have built fine flying fields. Sometimes the use of these airports is given free to commercial airplanes flying into the city; sometimes they are leased at nominal rental charges to commercial operators, who maintain operating facilities for transit airplanes at nominal cost, or cost of upkeep. At no place in the country is there any indication that the charges of municipalities supplying airport facilities are unjust, unreasonable, or discriminatory, but such rates are made by the owner and the municipalities as will attract airplane operators. Every encouragement in many other ways has been given to the building of commercial aviation fields by city governments throughout the Nation. Whatever they do, the municipalities and local governing bodies should not be themselves subject to the rule of a Federal agency as to the regulation of rates, charges, tariffs, and services at municipal airports. The Federal Government should go no farther than insisting that such airports shall be made safe for planes engaged in interstate commerce. This the Government now does through the efficient operations of the Bureau of Air Commerce of the Department of Commerce. The idea that a municipality shall come to Washington to secure a certificate of public convenience and necessity for permission to operate its airport would be resented and intolerable to the citizens of the country in general.

AIR-MAIL RATES

With reference to paragraph (g) of section 410, I have to call the attention of your committee to the fact that the methods proposed for the fixing of rates for the transportation of air mails do not prescribe any maximum limitation that may be paid to the carrier. It is provided that the Interstate Commerce Commission may prescribe the rate of pay by pound-mile, weight, space, or any combination thereof, for ascertaining such rates of compensation; and no consideration is given to the necessity of supplying a subsidy to the weaker lines. If the Commission is permitted to put into effect a general rate, applicable to all lines by the pound-mile basis, then naturally the heavy mail-carrying lines will receive most of the money appropriated by Congress to pay for carrying the mails by air. The rate is now fixed by prescribing a base rate of not exceeding 33⅓ cents per mile for carrying a mail load not exceeding 300 pounds. The Air Mail Service extends to practically every State, and most of the lines do not carry anything like the base load of 300 pounds. Without going into too much detail, it is obvious that if all sections of the country are to be equally served by air-mail lines, the rate of pay must be kept on a mileage basis for a while. An admirable system is now in force, and while providing for a rate of pay that amounts to a subsidy for the weaker lines, yet the stronger lines receive added compensation for the heavier mail loads. These rates are, of course, fixed by the Commission. Under the proposed system there is no limit to the amount that would be expended for carrying the mails or to the number of air lines that might be established, or the number or frequencies of trips, or the aggregate mileage to be flown.

The present law is admirable for present conditions and is the best system to be used for several years yet to come. With reference to expenditures of Government funds, the law contains several safeguards not present in the proposed law.

The Postmaster General may not establish air-mail routes in excess of 32,000 route miles. He may not authorize schedules over these lines in excess of 45,000,000 airplane-miles per year. He may not pay, nor may the Commission direct him to pay, in excess of 33⅓ cents per airplane-mile for carrying the base load of 300 pounds of mail or less, and the rate is gradually increased in proportion upward for excess loads, with a maximum rate of 40 cents per airplane-mile for any load. If the mail traffic is so heavy that it would be unjust to require the contractor to fly an extremely heavy mail load, for which he should receive more than 40 cents per mile, the Postmaster General may put on additional trips or schedules, having in mind that the aggregate amount flown cannot ever exceed 45,000,000 miles per year. The proposed law would remove every one of these limitations and restrictions, and would cause the Post Office Department and the Interstate Commerce Commission to be constantly infested with persons desiring to extract additional funds from the Federal Treasury on the basis of pretended needs for increased service.

It would seem that the author of the bill feels that air-mail rates should be fixed in a similar manner to that provided for railroads. If so, this certainly should be made very clear. We feel that the air lines must have a greater rate at this time for carrying the mails than for carrying other weight, passengers, or express. The basis of fixing railroad rates is determined upon the space requirements compared to other uses of railroads of similar space, the expense, and revenues of the railroads. Air-mail rates to the contractors are anywhere from 3 to 20 times as much per pound for carrying the mail as for carrying passengers, and more for carrying mail than for carrying their own express. We felt that it was better to allow them to build up their express business as long as the planes were flying and had space available, and to fix the rates at whatever they thought they should have. It means just that much more revenue to them. But the Government is the biggest customer the air lines have, and if it can be said that competition is so great that it is vital that the future growth of aviation should be controlled and competition lessened, then the air lines do not need any subsidy whatever, and the Government should get the same rate per pound for carrying the mail as the air lines get for carrying express or passengers, in the carrying of which they are compelled to render a great deal more service than in carrying the mail.

Under the proposal the Commission would have control of all the air-mail lines. This is properly a function of the Post Office Department; and so far as directing the lines by any governmental department is concerned, that should be done by the Commerce Department and by the Post Office Department as to air-mail lines.

The Air Mail Service must be coordinated with regard to railroads, steamship lines, star-route services, and connecting air lines, and those in the Post Office Department who administer the air-mail service are in much better position to know the needs of the Government with respect to carrying the mails than is the Interstate Commerce Commission.

To allow any other agency of the Government to fix schedules of air-mail carrying planes than the Post Office Department would seriously impair the value of air-mail service. The Post Office Department now fixes the schedules of all the air-mail lines so that prompt connections are made at terminal points resulting in speedy dispatch of the mails and excellent connections for passengers. This is all done very simply by the Post Office Department with full accord and agreement with the contractors, and it is done without a lot of expensive and tedious hearings and red tape.

HOLDING COMPANIES AND MONOPOLIES

Section 411 (a) provides for the merger and combination of commercial aviation companies, with the consent of the Commission. This is bound to lead to monopolies. It is inevitable. For the past several years this has been a subject of considerable discussion. When this Department reorganized the Air Mail Service, it was found that practically every contractor had affiliated connections. There were holding companies upon holding companies, each extracting a dole from the operating company. There were manufacturing companies from which the air transport lines were compelled to purchase supplies at the manufacturing companies' own rates. There were companies, the principal business of which was to engage in stock manipulating activities. Now these practices are directly forbidden by law. They cannot be engaged in. All the present contractors have severed their connections with the stock manipulating enterprises theretofore conducted by some of their officers. Holding companies have been divorced from ownership of the air-transport companies. The management has been transferred to the field of operations, rather than on the stock market, with the result that there has been developed the greatest aviation system in history. Of all the provisions of the bill, this provision, in my opinion, is probably one of the worst from the standpoint of public interest.

Section 411 contains seven full paragraphs, which in detail provide ways and means by which the present direct operations by the stockholders can be circumvented or avoided by stock manipulators and for the creation of monopolies that will prevent any fair amount of competition by new capital or persons.

Section 412 relates to the issuance of securities and requires the air carriers and airport operators to be subject to the Interstate Commerce Act rather than to the laws now being administered by the Securities and Exchange Commission, which are adequate and sufficient to protect the public interest.

GOOD LAWS REPEALED

If there has been established and is now in operation in this country the most modern air-transport system in the world it is due to a large extent to the sound laws now in effect governing the air-mail contractors, who constitute practically all of the air-transport lines. The proposed bill would repeal some of the most vital sections of the present law.

Section 417 of the pending bill would repeal the following laws, which I consider vital and important to the aviation industry:

Section 3 of the Air Mail Act of 1934, which provides that the Postmaster General may designate air-mail routes, award contracts within the limitations heretofore mentioned as to rates and mileage, and grant extension of routes.

Section 4 of the present law, which restricts the Postmaster General in the award of contracts to a mileage of 32,000 miles for flying and provides that not more than 45,000,000 airplane-miles may be flown per year; directs the Postmaster General to prescribe the number of frequencies of schedules, stops, and departures of all planes carrying the mails, with due regard to the volume of mail carried and for connection schedules; and provides for additional schedules for emergency trips. This would be left to the Commission.

Sections 5, 6, 7, and 8 of the present law specifically direct the Commission to make periodical audits of the books of air-mail contractors, to see that no unreasonable profits are resulting to the contractors; to make a thorough and complete investigation of operating methods of contractors, including purchasing of supplies to ascertain whether they have made fair and reasonable terms; to make a special investigation as to whether they are paying fair and reasonable prices for equipment; to make a report touching upon such probability to the Postmaster General, the Secretary of the United States Senate, and the Clerk of the House of Representatives. In short, the Commission is expected to make a full and complete investigation of every phase of the contractor's business in order to determine the need of Government aid in the operation of the lines.

Specific directions given to the Commission by the laws recommended by the Post Office Committees of the House and Senate and adopted by Congress, as to the performance of its duties in fixing air-mail rates, are all repealed, and the methods to be used in the proposed law are to allow the Commission to disregard specific instructions which Congress has heretofore deemed wise, but to use their own judgment as to what investigations they shall make and what consideration they shall give to any phase of the conduct of the operators' business.

Section 15 of the present law provides specific prohibitions against the building of monopolies by providing that it shall be unlawful for air-mail contractors competing in parallel routes to merge or enter into any agreement which may result in common control or ownership. This is specifically repealed by the pending law. It is now unlawful for a contractor to maintain a passenger express service off the lines of his air-mail route, commencing after June 30, 1935, if such service competes with passenger-express service available upon another air-mail route. This prohibition is in the present law in order to assure that there will be no cutthroat competition among air-mail contractors who are receiving Government subsidies. The subsidy is given to aid in the establishment and maintenance of the air lines, and the beneficiaries thereof having large capital should not be permitted to engage in cutthroat competition with another air-mail contractor by invading territory served by such other contractor. It is being attempted right now by numerous contractors, and this question already is causing the Department some concern. The bar should certainly not be let down to permit any such unfair competition. The flying of the air-transport routes of the air-mail route by contractors in competition with another air-mail contractor has a detrimental effect upon the air-transport service in two directions. First, the contractor whose air-mail line is subsidized must spend a great portion of his capital for a subsidy in conducting the off-line flying, thereby weakening air-mail contract service; and, secondly, unwarranted competition by a strong air-mail contractor with a weak line, of course, takes away needed revenue from that weaker line to its great damage. Both the Post Office Department and the Commission now can control any unlawful operations of the contractor under present laws.

SAFETY MEASURES

Section 12 of the Air Mail Act of 1934 is repealed. It provides that the Secretary of Commerce is authorized and directed to prescribe the maximum flying hours of pilots on air-mail lines and safe operation methods on such lines. The Bureau of Air Commerce has rendered and is continuing to render splendid service in providing for the safety, comfort, and convenience of passengers using the air-mail lines.

The safety of passengers flying in airplanes should be a prime consideration of the Government. The laws providing for safety measures can be best administered, I believe, by an administrative agency such as the Bureau of Air Commerce rather than one of a quasi-judicial character such as the Interstate Commerce Commission, whose principal functions are the fixing of rates for transportation. This is not said in any criticism of the Commssion or expressing any doubts of its ability to administer the law if charged with that responsibility, but it is my belief that the present status of the development of aviation safety measures can be best handled by an administrative body rather than a semijudicial body.

Section 15 of the present law restricts the air-mail contractors in the number of contracts they may hold. Under the proposed law, they may hold any number of contracts if allowed by the Commission. The present law was intended to prevent monopolies and monopolistic practices. The effect of the proposed law would be to encourage monopolies and the freezing out of small concerns for the benefit of the large ones by allowing them to appear before the Commission and make claims of being able to render superior service because they have more capital. Numerous other good provisions of law that have been found necessary to be enacted by Congress would be repealed by the pending bill.

For the foregoing reasons, and for numerous others which are not necessary to be mentioned in this letter, it is my sincere belief that S. 3420, now pending, should not be enacted into law. If the bill should be returned to your committee or further hearings held thereon, this Department would be very glad to furnish to your committee or any other committee of Congress any information the Department has on the subject.

Very truly yours,

JAMES A. FARLEY,
Postmaster General.

PUBLIC-UTILITY PROBLEMS AND PUBLIC-UTILITY SECURITIES—ADDRESS BY SENATOR HOLT

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, on November 4 last the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HOLT] delivered a radio address on Public-Utility Problems, with especial reference to natural gas holding companies, and on the 6th of December before the National Association of Security Commissioners, at Miami, Fla., he delivered an address on Public-Utility Securities. I ask unanimous consent that both addresses may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the addresses were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PUBLIC-UTILITY PROBLEMS

SPEECH DELIVERED AT WASHINGTON NOVEMBER 4, 1935

In discussing utilities, the public has not paid much attention to the gas industry. Tonight I will discuss that problem. In 1815, while drilling a salt well in Charleston, W. Va., gas was discovered. A few years thereafter at Fredonia, N. Y., a well was drilled which yielded gas. Natural gas has been in use for 110 years, but the most rapid growth has come in the past 10 or 15 years. It was not until 1872 that the first iron-pipe line was laid for any distance; it was approximately 5 miles long. Gas is produced in 28 States in 5 gas areas—the Appalachian, covering the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, West Virginia, and Kentucky; the southern, covering the States of Louisiana and the Texas Panhandle; the Rocky Mountain, in the States of Montana, Wyoming, Utah, New Mexico, and the California field.

With the advent of the seamless pipe in 1926, the industry started its rapid growth. We find that pipe lines have now been built so that natural gas is at the gateway of almost every city east of the Rockies except in New England and a few southern cities. Recently the natural-gas interests filed a brief before a committee of the United States Senate stating that there were approximately 75,000 miles of gathering and transmission lines and about 90,000 miles of local distribution mains furnishing natural gas to approximately 5,000 communities. In the year of 1933, 7,166,000 domestic and commercial consumers were supplied, as compared to approximately 3,500,000 in 1925. When one realizes that it has been estimated that the gas industry has a potential energy of from five to six times that of the power and electric industry, one will realize this gigantic set-up. Moody's volume of public-utilities estimates that the gas industry (both manufactured and natural) has a capital investment in excess of $4,500,000,000, with 17,000,000 consumers and a gross revenue of $800,000,000.

Manufactured gas has approximately 10,000,000 consumers. Although I am not discussing manufactured gas, it might interest you to know that the consumers for this product increased 113 percent between 1910 and 1930; 360,000,000,000 cubic feet were used in 1934, of which 270,000,000,000 cubic feet were sold to domestic and house-heat sales, with a revenue of $312,000,000 of the $380,000,000 for the industry. To produce this, it took 7,000,800 tons of bituminous coal, 132 tons of anthracite coal, 2,000,580 tons of coke, and 528,000 gallons of oil.

Let us turn now to the natural-gas industry. In 1933, 1,500,000,000,000 cubic feet, with a gross revenue of approximately $375,000,000, were distributed. Ten years ago the domestic and commercial consumers covered 3,500,000 users, as compared to 7,166,000 in 1933. The rise of domestic and commercial consumers has been steady. Although the domestic consumer used but between one-fourth and one-fifth of the total amount of gas produced, they contributed $250,000,000 of the $360,000,000 received by the gas industry. It is used in heating, lighting, and refrigeration. A rapid increase in the revenue per thousand cubic feet and the rate to domestic consumers has been noticed.

This has come about by the development of large pipe lines. To look at a map of the United States, one would see pipe lines coming close by large centers of populations from the fields where this product is found. It has been estimated that Texas has 10,000 miles, Ohio 6,000, Pennsylvania 5,000, West Virginia 4,000, Oklahoma and Kansas between 3,500 and 4,000, Louisiana nearly 2,000, and California, Arkansas, Kentucky, and New York with more than 1,000 miles of these lines. Natural gas is unlike electricity.

It is found in limited fields and cannot be generated like electricity—everywhere. One line between the Texas fields to Minneapolis is approximately 1,000 miles in length. Natural-gas service has been offered and used by 15 States in 1933 that did not use it in 1925 and replaced manufactured gas in communities with a combined population of 15,000,000 people. The control of the gas industry does not have to be at the point of production, but it can be controlled through the ownership of pipe lines that transport gas. Sixteen percent of the total production of gas was interstate. The four holding companies that control this interstate movement are the Cities Service, Electric Power & Light, and the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, also the Columbia Gas & Electric. Eleven holding companies control 76 percent of the total pipe-line mileage of America. Four control 58 percent. The big four are: The Columbia Gas & Electric, which controls nearly 25 percent; Cities Service, which controls 14 percent; the Electric Power & Light (a subsidiary of the Electric Bond & Share), approximately 11 percent, and the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, with approximately 8 percent. Who are the big four? Senator NORRIS says: "The Columbia Gas & Electric, which is Morgan controlled and operates largely in the East—that is, in Ohio, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Kentucky, and Maryland—sells in gas, mostly natural gas, half as much energy as is sold by the entire electric industry of the United States." Utilities controlled by the Cities Service is known as the Doherty group. You have heard much of Henry L. Doherty in the power investigations. He was listed as a director or officer in 111 different companies.

The Electric Power & Light goes back to the Electric Bond & Share. The well-known C. E. Groesbeck, who was director in 33 companies, is the powerful factor in this.

There is no need to go into the Standard Oil, as their corporate set-up is too well known by all of you through its Rockefeller ownership.

The Cities Service and Standard jointly control the Natural Gas Pipe Line Co. The next largest, the Lone Star Gas Co., has its connections with the Columbia Gas & Electric through Mr. Crawford and Mr. Gregory as directors. In 1930, 380,600,000,000 cubic feet went across State and international boundaries, and of that amount 240,000,000 through pipe lines under control of the big four.

The Federal Trade Commission report says:

"The Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey owns 30 percent of some of the Columbia Gas & Electric Corporation main trunk pipe lines, and together they own nearly 50 percent of all main trunk pipe lines. The mastery of the most practical gas transporation by a few large corporations would seem to place the small well owners at their mercy, to enable these corporations to dictate terms of purchase and to compel the small well owners to sell their gas in order to secure transportation, as was the situation in the oil industry prior to the Hepburn Act. Thus, these larger gas trunk pipe lines are common carriers in substance, though not in form, due to their exception as common carriers under the Interstate Commerce Act.

"All the natural gas pipe lines transporting gas from the Appalachian area to the eastern seaboard are operated by the Columbia Gas & Electric Corporation and the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey. Four lines are jointly owned by these two companies extending from the Appalachian field to cities along the eastern seaboard, and in addition a compact network of gas lines is operated in western Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and northern Kentucky, with a line from this area effecting a connection with the line operated from the Texas Panhandle gas field by the Panhandle Eastern Pipe Line Co.

"That transporation of gas through pipe lines from one State to another is interstate commerce coming under the regulation of Congress is clearly settled in many decisions of the United States Supreme Court.

"It is possible that the reason Congress specifically exempted gas pipe lines from regulation as common carriers was that they were not of sufficient importance at the time to require regulation. The growth of 111 percent in customers in the 10-year period 1921–31, and the increase of gas pipe line transportation facilities to 50,000 miles, more than 50 percent of which is under the mastery of four large corporations purchasing, as well as producing, natural gas, present a situation somewhat similar to that which preceded passage of the Hepburn Act as set forth in the pipe-line cases, 234 U. S. 548."

The 11 companies that control the gas field, according to the report of the Federal Trade Commission, are as follows: The American Power & Light Co., Columbia Gas & Electric Corporation, Cities Service Co., and the Electric Power & Light Corporation, Lone Star Gas Co., Minnesota Northern Power Co., Middle West Utilities Co., North American Light & Power Co., and Southwestern Development Co., Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, and Tri-Utilities Corporation.

May I be pardoned to point to a local situation? West Virginia, my home State, produces much natural gas. Across our boundaries we export between 60 to 64 percent of the entire amount produced. The Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey and the Columbia Gas & Electric Co. have complete domination. There is developing and has been developing a huge monopoly that is taking away the God-given resource from the earth for the profits of only a few. Most of those few are the absentee landlords who do not live where the gas is produced. Senator COUZENS, of Michigan, introduced a resolution in the Senate of the United States in the last session in which it was asked that the Committee on Interstate Commerce obtain information relative to the producion, transmission, sale, and distribution of natural gas. We have, and properly so, brought to the attention of the public the huge power octopus that invades most of the American homes, but let us not overlook the very rapid development of another public-utility combine, the natural-gas group. Many people feel that the industry is local in its nature. That was so a few years ago, but today it is a Federal problem. It has risen to a place where it has enough power to defy and to evade State regulatory bodies. For years gas companies appeared before the courts saying that State regulation interfered with interstate commerce. Between 1891 and 1934 there were 22 cases carried to the Federal courts from Indiana, New Jersey, Oklahoma, Kansas, New York, West Virginia, Pennsylvania, Alabama, Wyoming, Ohio, Mississippi, Texas, and Colorado on this ground. The interstate commerce decisions rendered forestalled much State regulation and conservation.

A few years ago the legislature of my State passed a bill to place a tax upon gas being exported beyond the boundary. It was carried to the Supreme Court of the United States, and there it was decided that the law interfered with interstate commerce. Now these same interests, this same group, this same company is trying to dodge Federal regulation by calling for State rights and State regulation. It is a joint problem. Where the State does not and cannot regulate, it should be the problem and responsibility of the Federal Government to step in. The Federal Trade Commission, under the very able counsel of Colonel Chantland, will bring much information to the people of the United States about the natural-gas industry.

We have heard a whole lot—not too much—about the National Electric Light Association and about the Edison Electric Institute, but what the N. E. L. A. is to the electrical industry the A. G. A., the American Gas Association, is to the gas industry. These utilities, controlled through the 11 powerful holding companies mentioned earlier, contributed materially to the public-utilities information bureaus of the different States, and gave much for propaganda in behalf of the utilities.

I speak from personal knowledge when I say that I know of no group, not even the Power Trust, that is more active in politics than those who control the gas industry. They interest themselves in all elections—municipal, State, and congressional. They try to control municipal officials so that the cities and towns will not have rate cases. They try to control the State officials in order that no public service commissioner will be appointed that would be so-called unfriendly, or that no member of the legislature be named who would introduce a bill making pipe lines common carriers or investigate their activities. They try to control congressional elections because they fear Federal regulation and oppose liberal legislation just as bitterly as does the Power Trust. The same lobbyists who represent the power companies in many instances are lobbyists for the gas companies.

They have and are interested in getting propaganda into our schools. I have with me a pamphlet that was placed by the gas industry in the public schools of West Virginia. They have their essay contests and lectures about their activities. The employees are called in before campaigns for safety meetings, and just as important as the teaching of safety to life and limb to those who have called the meeting, is the safety of the political control that the gas industry asserts.

You who are not from a State that produces natural gas may not realize to what extent this group extends its influences. They lease land from the farmers for the proposed drilling of wells. They will see the farmers and advise them that rentals will have to be reduced because of the activity of some man from that county who might be interested in regulating the gas industry, telling them that it is highly advisable that someone else would be sent in place of a so-called "red" or dangerous demagogue. Leases have been surrendered and rentals reduced to my own knowledge to exert the political control of the gas companies.

Contracts call for the shifting of tax burdens to the independent producer. This not only has its value in keeping down the tax burden on the gas companies but places them in a position whereby they can and do have the small independent producer in their lobby activities. In the last session of Congress representatives of the gas companies quietly but effectively lobbied in opposition to the holding-company bill. Not only have they been guilty of all these things but many more. They have had the power of finance to stave off any fight in the courts that might be raised by a municipality. One case recently decided by the Federal court had been pending 10 years. They have become so powerful that a municipality can hardly compete with them. They have entwined themselves through the control of holding companies to such extent that the State commission finds them practically impossible to regulate. They are not a lone State problem, but, as I said before, a national problem.

We find directors who are directors in the power companies and industrial groups so that influence can be used for the continuation and protection of this monopoly. In a period of declining prices, all through the depression, we find that this monopoly had a constant increase in the price of gas. This did not go to the independent producer who sold it to them, but was extra profit for the holding companies and to the favored few who might control this octopus.

Just recently the Federal Trade Commission exposed the activity of the American Gas Association, who aided in a movement to decrease the British thermal unit to the consumers. The term "B. t. u.", or British thermal unit, does not mean much to those who realize that it represents the direct heat value of gas itself. The gas industry by decreasing the B. t. u. would naturally increase the consumption, because as the heat quantity declines, the amount used increases. It is similar to decreasing the number of pounds in a gallon. It has been estimated that this B. t. u. activity of the gas companies would have increased the final bill for cooking and heating in America $490,000,000. The usual methods of suppression were brought about to keep this information from the public.

The Bureau of Standards in 1925 published a pamphlet which presented a mass of scientific data to the effect that the heating value of gas was in inverse ratio to the volume consumed. The industry had endeavored either to prevent or modify the conclusions reached. In a letter dated August 29, 1934, referring to this proposed publication, Mr. Abell wrote Managing Director Forward, of the American Gas Association, describing a conference with the Bureau of Standards, and stating that he knew "that many members of the gas association would not want to send out a report that would indicate that the charges for gas should be inversely proportional to the calorific value of gas."

He further expressed the belief that if the industry "watches its step with the Bureau, the Bureau will play the game our way as near as they know how." A. Gordon King, service manager for the American Gas Association, in referring to the proposed publication of the Bureau of Standards, said: "The more I study this document the less value of good to anyone I see in it, and if it were possible I believe it should be suppressed."

A letter was prepared for dispatch to the Bureau of Standards by the president of the American Gas Association, stating the industry's position, and the minutes of a conference among the leaders of the industry stated that: "The purpose of this letter is to stop further publication and distribution of the Bureau's report and to lead up to a conference with the Bureau at which an effort should be made to induce them to withdraw the copies of this publication already distributed."

You will find a feeling of cooperation between the electric and gas utilities. The large holding companies have asserted electricity and gas. Gas and electricity, as everyone knows, can be competitive, but if controlled through the same ownership, this competition, which would naturally bring decreased rates for the domestic consumer, would be done away with.

The same story of holding companies can be traced through those who operate the gas industry as that of electricity. The growth of capital assets, intercompany transactions, high interest rates, and the pyramiding of company upon company are all evident. For instance, when I was a member of the legislature, I investigated the ownership of utilities. I found Kentucky-West Virginia Gas Co. owned by the Philadelphia-Louisville Gas & Electric Co., which in turn was controlled by the Philadelphia Co., in turn by the Standard Gas & Electric Co., which in turn was controlled by the Standard Power & Light Corporation, and this jointly owned by the United States Electric Power Corporation, and H. M. Byllesby & Co., and the holding company was United Founders Corporation.

May I also cite some intercompany transactions:

The United Fuel Gas Co. sold gas to the Huntington Gas Corporation for 26½ percent. They in turn sold to Union Gas & Electric at 45 percent, and this company finally sold the product at 64.7 cents. Upon every transaction the Columbia Gas & Electric collected management fees, not on the final prices, but upon each of the transactions. I also should like to note how the United Fuel & Gas Co. shows an appreciation of $41,042,462 with the property valued at $98,500,000. It is the same problem and the same group of insiders collecting whether it be electricity or gas and the consumers footing the bill.

Of course one must realize that the Securities Act and the Wheeler-Rayburn bill would do much to correct this problem, but we must be on our guard so that this combine will not develop to such an extent that it will be a burden on every consumer. This requires strict regulation of the gas pipe lines by the Federal Government.

It is important that America know more about this industry and that a thorough investigation be made of the activity of those who control it.

PUBLIC-UTILITY SECURITIES

I have been much interested in the public-utility problem and particularly interested in the holding companies that control public utilities. Of course, I could go back and trace the history of public utilities and holding companies, back as far as 1868 when the State of Pennsylvania gave the right to one company to hold stock in another by legislative enactment, and then on through the action of the State of New Jersey in giving holding companies a legal right to live, through the United Gas Improvement Co. started in 1882, and on through the Associated Gas & Electric Co. started in 1906, but there is no need to do that. We are interested in public utilities as they affect the United States today.

Of course, the public-utility game is a big one. Over $25,000,000,000 is the estimated value of plant and equipment of public utilities in the United States. I should like to, in the few moments that I have, speak of public-utility securities as they affect those who buy them, and in doing that I should like to show some of the appreciation of the value of public-utility stocks and how that was accomplished. Of course, appreciation, or write-ups, which is the general term used, is the addition of the ledger value of stocks. There are four ways of appreciation:

(1) Through construction; (2) through purchases and inflation and intercompany transfers; (3) through consolidations, mergers, and greater reorganizations; and (4) through appraisals and revaluations.

How come the write-ups through construction? Public utilities must build lines. They must build their property in order to serve the customers. They have brought together their own construction companies, owned or nearly owned entirely by the holding company itself. I could cite Phoenix Engineering Corporation of the Electric Bond & Share, W. S. Barstow & Co. of Associated Gas & Electric Co., Byllesby Engineering & Management Corporation of the Standard Gas & Electric Corporation. In other words, these construction companies owned by the holding companies charge the operating company a certain fee for the construction of their properties. They not only reinvest that but they capitalize the interest and overhead over a long period of time. I will cite a few cases to show you that securities are not based on actual value.

The Brooklyn Borough Gas Co. shows appreciation by Associated Gas & Electric, where the Barstow Engineering Co. charged 2½-percent construction fee and all of this was capitalized and sold to the security holders of America.

Then we could go further and note the capitalization of organization expenditures, of utilities, of franchises, of privileges, of water rights. May I mention one of those? The Minnesota Power & Light Co. is a subsidiary of the Electric Bond & Share Co. We find capitalized organization expenditures, franchises, and certain water rights. That was also true in the case of the Niagara Falls Power Co.

Now, how could this appreciation or write-up be gained through purchases? That can be done through capitalization of improper items and transfer of properties to affiliates. May I note a case of that—the Central & Southwest Utilities Co., of the Insulls, in which certain improper items were capitalized and passed on to the security holder. That was also true of Cities Service. Then another way they sell the securities is capitalization of service contracts. One company has a contract with another company to give them certain management and official services. They sell that contract and make a profit. May I refer to the fact of Associated Gas & Electric having such a contract. It was sold to the Utility Management Corporation, another subsidiary. They in turn sold it to the J. G. White Management Co. and boosted the value of the service contract alone $8,000,000, to be sold to security holders over the United States. Another instance of that is Standard Gas & Electric Co. They own the Byllesby Engineering & Management Corporation, who sold the same contract back to the Standard Gas & Electric Co. and made hundreds of thousands of dollars, which was capitalized and sold to the security holders. Stone & Webster, through the sale of service contracts in a period of 7 years, increased their capitalization seven and one-half million dollars, based on nothing but the resale of their own property among their affiliates; and that is true of Cities Service and the Public Service Co. of Colorado, who in the same manner made over a million dollars.

Another way to write up is through consolidation and mergers. They want to consolidate some of their own companies, or merge, whether it be owned within or without their own right. The Arkansas Natural Gas Co. was an instance where the Cities Service stepped in and through consolidation had a write-up of $5,669,975, and with that write-up came the sale of securities to the people, and they had to pay that. Another was the Ohio Fuel Corporation, a subsidiary of Columbia Gas & Electric, which group operates in the State of West Virginia, written up by $164,915,000, and the Columbia Gas & Electric Corporation written up by $97,185,000. The Federal Trade Commission in their report stated this is a write-up alone in these two companies through consolidation of their own properties of $104,833,905. They add two and two together and get seven, and the people pay the difference between the two. May I cite another write-up that was boosted onto those that have to pay the bill. There are only two ways a holding company can make money. One is through the operating company, or through the consumer, and the other through securities they may sell. May I go back to the instance of write-up through consolidation and merger? Appalachian Power Co. in West Virginia was bought by the American Gas & Electric Co. When they consolidated on March 31, 1925, the company's worth was $73,000,000. On the next day on the books this company's worth was $139,000,000. Overnight we find the Appalachian Power Co. had a write-up of $66,419,913; and the pressure became so great on the Appalachian Co. that they met 6 years after and wrote off approximately one-half that amount. Another one is a local situation, the Florida Power & Light Co. We find the Florida Power & Light Co. had a ledger value of $28,213,209. Immediately upon the purchase of that company we find that it was written by the Florida Power & Light Co. to be worth $58,448,217, or a write-up of $30,235,008—103-percent increase. The only people that could pay are those who own the securities of the companies that may be sold from time to time.

Another way of write-up is through appraisals, sometimes horseback appraisals. When the Appalachian made the appraisal of that great system of electricity, they went through Kentucky, Tennessee, West Virginia, and Virginia looking at the properties. They said, "This is worth so much", and "That is worth so much", and "We will write it down at so much", and they wrote it down at so much—a horseback appraisal—and they went down the lines, horseback or anyway they could cover the various properties of the Appalachian Co., and we find they wrote appraisals by that method.

May I cite such an increase of stocks sold through the Byllesby Co., which was done in the case of the Northern States Power and Associated Gas & Electric Co., which you have heard quite a little about because of the escape of Mr. Hopson in Washington. We find the New York State Gas & Electric Corporation had their property written up from $5,947,000 to $10,860,000. In other words, the same company that owned them made an appraisal and found the value one day to be $1 and the next $2.

In my own State, may I be pardoned for citing, the United Fuel Gas Co., a subsidiary of the Columbia Gas & Electric Corporation, found their gas was worth more than they thought. They had the same fields, the same gas wells, same lines, same property, exactly, but they had Mr. White, an engineer, look at them. He made a new appraisal and he found it was worth $39,751,229 more than they thought it was, and, of course, they increased the value of it, and the public paid the price, whether a rate payer or a purchaser of securities of the Columbia Gas & Electric Corporation.

The Florida Power Corporation found in 1929 that there was certain abandoned property coming about through the loss of the value of property in St. Petersburg and Clearwater and Tarpon Springs. The property was worthless. Did they write it off? No. The directors met in 1929 and did not write off a single, solitary penny of that $1,054,370 which was listed on the value, and the people paid the price of it.

Associated Gas & Electric Co. wanted to get the value of W. S. Barstow & Co., which they owned completely. Barstow had a book value of $315,000. At how much do you suppose the Associated Gas & Electric Co. listed the value of that company? Fifty-two million seven hundred and seventy-three thousand eight hundred and fifty-five dollars on a book value of $315,000. Who paid that? Nobody but those who bought the securities of the company that operated at the top, the holding company. Another instance is the East New Jersey Power Co., where there was a write-up of $6,898,048 of a company worth less than $4,000,000.

The Cities Service Co. wanted to start a new company, and they started the Cities Service Power & Light Co., all owned by the same people, blood brothers of the same family, all go back to the top holding company, but by juggling the thing back and forth we find a write-up and increase in the value of their own companies of 165 percent, or $106,104,403.

I could go through and show you numbers and numbers of instances, but what is the use? You, as securities commissioners, know them too well. And what has that done? It has absolutely proven that these utility securities in many instances are built on nothing but water and gas and salesmanship, and you have no control over them. Very few State commissions do have control over them; and even as powerful as the Securities and Exchange Commission may be, they have no right to determine whether securities should be sold. They have the right to publicize them, but how many investors are going to pick up a 70-page prospectus and read it through before investing?

Now, as to the Associated Gas & Electric Co. stock, may I show you how this group have issued 3 classes of common, 6 of preferred, 4 of preference, 7 classes of guaranteed bonds and notes, 24 classes of debentures, 4 classes of investment certificates? You can take your choice, just like you go into a grocery store; if you do not like one kind they will sell you another. Take the Tri-Utilities Corporation, another holding company. They sold their securities, and do you know how much the preferred creditors got? Three and one-half mills on every dollar they invested. Terrible how we are stepping on these dear holding companies in Washington. They have cried on my shoulder until I have to wear a raincoat telling how we have tried to destroy the widows and orphans of America. May I give you some of the highs and lows on the stocks of some companies that love the widows and orphans of America? The American Gas & Electric Co. operates in my State. Their common stock sold at 224⅞, and the value after a few years to the widows and orphans of our State was 17¾. How they loved the widows and orphans of America. The Columbia Gas & Electric Co. issued common stock and a number of kinds of preferred stock. We find that stock had reached a high of 140 in 1929, and it had declined in 1934 to a level of 6⅝. They want to protect the dear widows and orphans of America—those who had sold stock to as high as 100 which was worth 6.

Associated Gas & Electric stock in 1930 was worth 51½. Well, my friends, if you sold it the early part of this year you were well protected, even though you were a widow or orphan, because that same stock, worth 72⅝, was worth one-fourth of 1 point this year, based on water and stock. How can you expect to add to that any value because of all these write-ups and manipulation?

Cities Service Co.—their common stock was listed at 90⅞ and it declined to a value of one point. For every $90 you invested in Cities Service you got $1 back, and, of course, they love you so well they want to protect that last dollar they have left you. And these Insull securities, you in the West know that better than the people down South, the famous $6 preferred, based on nothing but appreciation. In that appreciation they did that by pyramiding of control. I want to give you a good investment, you securities commissioners. The Associated Gas & Electric Co. has a gold debenture out. If you have any children you want to invest for and want something to give them in the future, the Associated Gas has something to take care of that. They have issued a gold debenture stock that, if you are living, you can go to the Chase National Bank in 2875 and get it back. You can invest for 947 years in this. I have brought along with me a list of a number of stocks due after the year 2001 up to 2030. If you want long-term investments, you can get your public utilities to take care of these children that may live from time to time in the future. Why don't the stockholders come in and stop this? The kind of stock they sold to the stockholders has no voting rights; stocks A, B, C, $6 preferred and at the top and special stocks have the voting rights. I cite an instance of pyramiding control of a $150,000,000 corporation. They issue fifty million bonds, fifty million nonvoting preferred, fifty million common. Then they wanted to start company B below that and in order to take control of that fifty millions they must possess twenty-five million and a fraction of it. They start company B, issue ten million of bonds, ten million of nonvoting stock, and five million common. Not satisfied with that, the five million controlling the one hundred and fifty millions voting, so they start company C, issue two million bonds, two million of nonvoting, and one million of common.

It keeps increasing to such an extent that we find such instances as this, that the Byllesby Corporation through the Standard Power & Light, through an equity of three million, has a control of utility properties worth one and one-fifth billions of dollars. And the Associated system, through eight million ownership, controls a corporation worth more than $1,000,000,000. Of course, the Standard Power & Light does that differently. They have common series B stock and common stock. If you want to vote, you have to own the common series B stock. The average investor doesn't know that. They do this through the pyramiding of control and by issuing great quantities of bonds and debentures by holding and operating companies which give control to the owners of stock equities; (2) issuance of preferred stock with no voting power whatever, or with right to vote contingent on passing dividends for a number of consecutive periods; (3) the issuance of various classes of common stock or participating stock only, one of which can be called the controlling voting power—they list them under A, B, C preferred or common; (4) through issuance of special class of cheap stock so heavily endowed with votes as to give the possessor control; (5) through creation of voting trusts by which the controlling stock of utility or holding company is placed in the hands of the voting trustees for a period of time; (6) by the issuance of controlling interests of large quantities of purchase warrants which permit those investing to secure the majority of the outstanding vote of the stock when existing minority control is threatened by the inclusion in the charter of a provision waiving the preemptive right of existing shareholders to purchase any new stock.

I could go on and show you instances of these various ways of pyramiding of control, but there is no need to do that. We all realize that pyramiding of control has been and is being practiced today. May I cite a company in my home State, the Kentucky-West Virginia Gas Co. The people down there think they are paying money to the Kentucky-West Virginia Gas Co., but upon investigation we find the Kentucky-West Virginia Gas Co. is controlled by the Philadelphia Co., Inc., and upon further investigation we find the Philadelphia Co., Inc., is controlled by the Standard Gas & Electric Co., and we find the Standard Gas & Electric Co. is controlled by the Standard Power & Light Co. When we find the Standard Power & Light is controlled generally by the United Power Corporation, and on top of that we find another holding company with voting rights, how can anyone find out who owns the stock, who owns the property, and what the value of the stock is? They say holding companies should be regulated, and the regulation should be through stocks. There is no economic value whatever to a holding company. It is an economic waste. As Will Rogers has said, "It is the man who holds the goods while the other man is being searched." You try to look into a utility company and find out its value in the State of West Virginia, and they inform you it is owned by a company in Delaware. You find Delaware company, and in turn it is owned by a company in New Jersey. Trace it further, and you find that it is owned by a company in some other State, until you finally end up by no one knowing and you finding out nothing.

As securities commissioners realize, all that must mean that securities are based on these increased write-ups and that must come from two sources. If a company has written up its value, whether it has become saintly overnight or not, the write-ups are still on the books, stocks are still out, and obligations are still out, and can only be recovered through two sources, one through the investor and the other through the rate payer. The investor has already paid the bill, but the rate payer is still available. They claim it doesn't, but how can any public-service commission investigate the actual value of a company when it is operating in a number of States closed and covered up by State regulations and laws that cross from time to time. That is not only true in the electric industry but it is now true in the gas industry. We find four large holding companies now controlling 58 percent of the gas companies in America and 11 are holding companies controlling 76 percent of them. In other words, the centralization of control is becoming just as great in the gas industry as in the power, and the people who buy the securities and the rate payer are going to pay for such write-ups and false securities and values. One way to stop this absurd sale to the people was done at the last session of Congress by the abolition of the holding company. My radio time has expired. I thank you for your kind attention.

THE ROOSEVELT POLICIES—ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES A. FARLEY

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by Hon. James A. Farley, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, in San Francisco, August 1, 1935, on the subject of the Roosevelt Policies.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It seems superfluous for me to express the pleasure I feel in being in San Francisco and having a chance to talk over the political situation with my fellow Democrats. I don't know anybody who doesn't like to come to this beautiful city. Not only is there much to see that every American wants to see, but San Francisco has the charm of romance to a greater degree, I think, than any other community within the borders of the Republic. Most American cities have come along in humdrum fashion and are consequently pretty much alike, but you folks on the edge of the continent grew up by yourselves, developed a culture unique in its character independent of the rest of the country, with the result that you have done your own thinking. Undoubtedly this is due to the circumstance that you were an isolated community separated by long distances from other popular centers. Where most of our cities are tributary to some larger center and patterned after that large center, you for many decades have been a metropolis in your own right. For nearly half a century people thought of the Pacific coast only as meaning San Francisco. You developed your own great men and great women, your own great authors and artists, and not a few of the leaders of industry, whose names have become household words in New York and elsewhere, brought their wealth and talents to the East and identified themselves with the largest of national and international enterprises.

Your splendid universities and other public works that bear their names indicate how loyal and lasting was the affection for California of these men whose fortunes were founded here. I know that some of these may have been ruthless in their pursuit of fortune, but they dated from a ruthless period. The pioneers who defied the dangers of the great gold trek of '49 had to be strong men to overcome the stupendous difficulties in their way and to hew out careers on a difficult frontier. Their faults were the faults of a period and environment; their virtues were the qualities that mean success everywhere.

No observer of government could fail to note the high quality of the men you have sent to Washington from the beginning of your statehood.

No California audience needs be told of the eminence of your senior Senator, HIRAM JOHNSON, in the councils of the Nation. Your junior Senator, WILLIAM GIBBS MCADOO, through his vast influence, his wide experience, and his ripe judgment, is of inestimable value to the country and to the administration. Your delegation in the House of Representatives ranks as high as any State's Congressmen and has contributed much to the wise legislation that has made possible the measure of recovery from the depression we have attained.

The Democratic Party cannot forget its debt to California. It was this State that kept Woodrow Wilson in the White House in 1916. It was California that insured the nomination of Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1932, and the vote of this State confirmed magnificently the action of your delegates to the Chicago Convention.

Yours has always been a progressive community. You have not feared to try stupendous experiments. This trait is part of the fine heritage that came to you from your adventurous ancestors.

Because we must recognize that the course being pursued by President Roosevelt is in itself pioneering, I feel that we can count on the continued support of the sons and daughters of your pioneers. It has required the same sort of courage that brought your fathers and mothers across the deserts and over the mountains, fighting their way with hostile Indians and the bandits that beset the trails, to inaugurate and prosecute the emergency policies that have marked the present administration in Washington. Franklin D. Roosevelt, when he came to the White House, felt that he was charged with leading this country out of the great depression. There were no precedents that he could follow in carrying out this great mission. For 3 years the country had been in the gravest trouble. Every month of that period showed an increase in unemployment, the closing down of factories, the destruction of confidence in the banks, and a growth of despair among the people. I will not say that no effort was made during this period to fight the depression, but nothing was tried except the puny expedients that had served to check minor economic diseases. It was as though some of the old-time remedies for a sore throat were applied to meeting the emergency of a ghastly mortal epidemic. It required strong measures to meet the situation.

I have heard the banking holiday declared by the President on the day of his inauguration compared with the shotgun quarantines of your pioneer days. It would have been perhaps difficult to reconcile the stringent activities of California's early days to strict legal requirements, but they were effective. So were effective the emergency measures enacted on the advent of the Roosevelt administration, which, starting in by rehabilitating the banking system, continued with such expedients as the National Recovery Act, the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, Civilian Conservation Corps, etc.

I do not urge that in the administration of these measures there may not have been mistakes and errors, but they served a great purpose, and the result of these measures is the difference between the country's condition today and what it was on March 4, 1933.

Yours is a political organization, and I want to talk over politics with you. It is perfectly natural that at this time, with a national election coming next year, the Democratic administration should be subjected to as keen a fire as our opponents can bring to bear upon it. That is the explanation of a flood of propaganda that has been inundating the country. It is true that all of this propaganda does not bear the Republican label. But there is no difference in the purpose of the onslaught, regardless of its source. The objective is to destroy confidence in the Roosevelt administration, and particularly in the President himself. By this process our assailants hope—no; I will not say hope, because I doubt if even the most sanguine among them thinks that Republican success is possible in 1936—I will put it that the dream is that by destroying the confidence of the people in the President, they can effect a return of the Government control to those who would restore the privileges which piled up enormous fortunes for the few and reduced the rest of us to poverty.

Not only is there a general assault on the legislation the President has sought to promote in Congress and a consistent effort to make our industrial and commercial gains attained under the recovery program seem small, or to deny them altogether, but there is also being conducted a whispering campaign. The word is being circulated that the President has broken down under the strain and that his decisions, instead of being the ripened judgment of a man stalwart in strength and mind, are the productions of a fretful invalid. I can tell you that hardly a day passes while I am in Washington in which I do not see and talk to the President. I can tell you also that he is in perfect health, that he is serene, and that he is living the busiest life of anybody in these United States, smilingly, cheerfully, and most effectively. Twice a week he meets the Washington newspaper correspondents. He faces several hundred of them at these sessions; they bombard him with questions, and he replies. Isn't it absurd to suppose that this host of keen, experienced men, many if not most of them representing newspapers hostile to the administration, would not have been quick to note any lessening of the President's powers? The story, of course, is without a vestige of a foundation. That, however, has not prevented its industrious circulation by word of mouth, by chain letters, and by every other means which could pass it around surreptitiously and in such form that its ultimate source cannot be traced. Well, there is nothing new in this, either to the President or to the Democratic organization. The same stories were told during the 1932 campaign in exactly the same way and in almost exactly the same language. The President plans to come out to this State after Congress adjourns to participate in one of the great California expositions. You will be able to judge for yourselves of his physical state and the vitality of his mental processes. I only mention the matter now because doubtless a great many of you may have seen some of this scurrilous stuff and may have been alarmed by it.

The President has the most strenuous job in the world, but he is equal to it.

The Nation is fortunate that this statement is true. Let me ask you if there is one among you who has not thought of the bristling possibilities that threatened this Nation if it had not had for its head during the past few years an individual of consummate courage, skill, and endurance? Where would we be today if Franklin D. Roosevelt had not gripped the situation on his advent to the White House and carried out his program of restoration and rehabilitation? The Supreme Court recently decided that in establishing the N. R. A. the President had gone beyond the letter of the Constitution. So did Jefferson when he effected the Louisiana Purchase. So did Lincoln when he issued the Emancipation Proclamation. I am no constitutional lawyer, but I dare say that there were those who regarded the acquisition of the Pacific coast as part of the United States as open to constitutional question. None of this, of course, contravenes the fact that the Supreme Court is the tribunal of last resort and you have doubtless observed that the President, while he did not mask his disappointment at the N. R. A. decision, hastened to comply with it and to arrange the various emergency establishments in accord with the ruling.

Now, the other day I noticed that one of the newspaper columnists instanced an episode of the Taft administration, reciting that the then President, and thereafter Chief Justice, had vetoed a bill—the Webb-Kenyon Act—because he doubted its constitutionality. This, of course, was in line with criticism of President Roosevelt, who advised Congress that, in his opinion, it should not hastily discard legislation for the public welfare merely because a constitutional question was raised. That matter must be left for the Supreme Court to decide. What I was about to tell you was that in the recital of the Taft incident the columnist did not tell the whole story, for the bill that President Taft had vetoed was repassed by Congress over that veto, and the Supreme Court decided that it was constitutional and it remained in force until the repeal of the eighteenth amendment.

Yes, the 1936 campaign has already begun. Every act of the administration is assailed by the Republican spellbinders and the Republican newspapers and the crew of special-interest representatives who pose as nonpartisan defenders of the Constitution and work in the word "liberty" in the titles of their organizations. When Congress passes a law in accordance with the President's recommendation there is an immediate barrage to the effect that the President is assuming to be a dictator and that Congress is a mere "rubber stamp" ready to register his individual will. When, on the other hand, Congress objects or modifies some proposal the President has made, the G. O. P. batteries—open and concealed—send forth a broadside telling the people that the President has lost control of Congress and that Congress is a high-minded body of statesmen. Of course, this does not make sense. A President could hardly be a dictator today and be at the mercy of Congress tomorrow, and resume his despotism the day after.

The situation is simply this: The Old Guard wants to get hold of the Government again; and President Roosevelt, being an insuperable obstacle in their path, they feel that their only chance lies in breaking down the affection and regard with which the plain people of this country regard him. Naturally, such a campaign is not going to be carried on in any fine ethical spirit or with adherence to the truth if a falsehood will serve better. I presume you have noticed the events in Congress relative to the bill aimed to put an end to such frauds on the people and such larcenies of the people's money as was typified in the Insull case.

For a time, you will remember, you read about every day of the flood of telegrams from their constituents being received by Senators and Representatives protesting against the enactment of this bill. These messages were cited as showing the deep public interest and concern in the matter. At the recent senatorial investigation it was shown that these telegrams by thousands were filed by the interests that sought to defeat the Wheeler-Rayburn Act, that the signatures thereto were taken from city directories and telephone books, and that the senders knew nothing about them until some of the Congressmen replied to them. Instances appeared where the originals of these telegrams were burned in an effort to destroy the evidence of forgery. Moreover, there was revealed a million-dollar slush fund. The Associated Gas & Electric System admitted spending $700,000 to fight this legislation. Chairman Philip H. Gadsden, of the committee of public-utility executives, testified to the expenditure of $301,865 which he said had been used for attorney fees and lobbying activities.

Now the next time you read of the surging tide of public sentiment against some administration project or policy just remember the faked snow storms of telegrams to Congressmen and the million-dollar slush fund, and you can perhaps arrive at a real estimate of the alleged surge of public opinion.

Detraction of the President is the sole resource of our political enemies. In all the matter that they send out, in all the speeches that have been made by or for the reactionaries and exploiters, there has not been one word of a constructive character. They inveigh against the recovery program, but not by any chance do they suggest an alternative program. They denounce the expenditures to keep people from starving and to put the unemployed to work, but never do they make a suggestion of how starvation can be warded off or men be put to work except in the manner in which this is being done.

The administration has been accused of extravagance. Let me call your attention to the fact that the routine expenditures of government, the normal, natural work of the various departments, are hundreds of millions of dollars per year below what they were when Roosevelt came to the White House. The only extravagance that can be justly laid to the door of the administration is the money it has expended in feeding the hungry, giving work to the jobless, and changing the business balances on their ledgers from red to black.

Let us just take a look at some of the results of the Roosevelt policies. For example, the amount paid in income taxes last year was $200,000,000 greater than the year before. I wish each of you would make a mental calculation. Take the amount of income tax you have paid and figure what relation it bears to your income. Apply the same process to the $200,000,000 increase that the Treasury reports, and it will be plain to you that the general public income in this country is three or four billion dollars more than it was a year ago. That is one yardstick by which you can figure what the Roosevelt policy has done for business. What it has done for the farmer you people in California can gage from your own experience. The Department of Agriculture tells me that the cash sales making up California's farm income are $65,000,000 more this year than they were last. I, of course, have seen and marveled at the two great bridges that are being thrown across San Francisco Bay. The employment they are furnishing and the impetus to business given by the purchase of the materials that go into them are tangible results of the President's program. Your stores, they tell me, are having an excellent season. These evidences of prosperity are not confined to California by any means. The automobile industry reports that it produced 2,300,000 cars and trucks during the first 6 months of 1935, a third more than in the corresponding period of last year and a good deal more than double those produced in 1933.

A familiar charge against the administration is that the profit is all going to the big fellows in business, to the detriment of the little fellow. Now, what are the facts? Dun & Bradstreet, that cold-nosed chronicler of business trends, announced that sales of general merchandise in small towns and rural areas in June of this year were 38 percent higher than for June of last year and 51 percent higher than the year before that. This business firm likewise reported recently that there were more retail businesses in existence now than there were during the boom that collapsed in the fall of 1929 and that the percentage of business failures was less than it had been for 15 years.

Yet, those who attack the administration are trying to convince the people that they are in a terrible plight, that the New Deal has failed and that the country's only salvation lies in giving back control of the Government to the outfit that led us into economic calamity.

I have gone into the subject of attacks on the administration at some length. Please do not get the impression that this means that there is any anxiety in Democratic headquarters as to the effect of the campaign of detraction. Our political fences are in good shape. I have no more doubt of the result of the 1936 election than I had before the 1932 election. But there is always this to be considered: No election was ever won by inaction, by permitting feuds within the party to take up all our attention, or by neglecting the great work of organization and education. Overconfidence has more than once in this country turned what appeared to be certain victory into surprising defeat, so I want to tell you that this is no time for Democrats to sit back and grin at what appears to be a futile foe. Moreover, an election is but one stage in the advancement of the great principles of democracy, so well expressed in a recent utterance of the President when he was asked by a newspaperman to define the object of his administration. He said then:

"The social objective, I should say, remains just what it was, which is to do what any honest government of any country would do—to try to increase the security and the happiness of a larger number of people in all occupations of life and in all parts of the country; to give them more of the good things of life; to give them a greater distribution, not only of wealth in the narrow terms but of wealth in the wider terms; to give them places to go in the summertime—recreation; to give them assurance that they are not going to starve in their old age; to give honest business a chance to go ahead and make a reasonable profit; and to give everyone a chance to earn a living."

This country has made great progress under the Roosevelt administration. It will progress still further toward the goal of public betterment during Roosevelt's next term. The voters of the United States enthusiastically gave him his opportunity in 1932. They gave him a magnificent tribute of approbation in 1934. It should be the aim of every one of us to see that in 1936 his election figures shall be so impressive that nobody can make any mistake as to where the American people stand.

EUROPE AND AMERICA—ADDRESS BY SENATOR POPE

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE] on January 8, 1936, before the Institute of Arts and Sciences of Columbia University, in New York City, on the subject of Europe and America—Today and Tomorrow.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EUROPE AND AMERICA—TODAY AND TOMORROW

A subject as broad as this gives one the opportunity to browse over nearly the whole field of foreign affairs and to linger here and there as his fancy may dictate. It is a field full of interesting things. There are tangled thickets of trade barriers in almost every nation, dangerous embankments of governmental and commercial debts, rugged piles of military armaments, and the volcanic eruptions of war. But there also may be seen green pastures of improved economic conditions in most countries, clear springs of intelligent effort in foreign affairs, and the sun of international cooperation and good will.

In approaching the subject an American has certain intimate emotional reactions. His mind goes back over the relations of Europe and America since 1492, when a courageous European discovered this continent. He thinks of the struggles of colonization, of the conflicts among European nations and their reflection in the New World, of the great struggle between Britain and France for domination of the new continent, of the War for Independence, and varied relations between the two continents since that time. He realizes the ties of common blood and common culture. He appreciates the rich heritage of European progress toward democracy in government that made possible our Republic, which, we are convinced, is an advance in popular government. The American has inherited all the cultural treasures of his ancestors. After all, there is an intimate kinship between Europe and America, and the relationship is or should be a little closer than with the rest of the world.

In fact, the thing that impresses me most when I visit Europe is the closeness of that actual relationship. Wherever I have gone I found Americans at my elbow. Many of them were, of course, tourists like myself, but I found them also in almost every line of business—bankers, merchants, hotel keepers, lawyers, doctors, newspapermen, restaurant keepers, and cab drivers. I found American students in European universities and European students in American universities. I found American newspaper correspondents in every large European city. One can buy in any large city in Europe his favorite American shaving cream or cigarette. Daily happenings on either continent are known almost instantly on both. One speaks over the radio in any capital in Europe and is heard throughout America.

In every large city in Europe there are scores of representatives of American industry and commerce. One has only to attend a meeting of the American Club in Paris to realize the importance of the commercial ties between the United States and France.

The slightest depreciation in foreign exchange or a change in European tariff duties is a matter of concern to America. A change in the form of government in a European state may have important consequences in America. The triumph of nazi-ism in Germany, of fascism in Italy, and of communism in Russia produced the most widespread interest, if not consternation, throughout America. The setting up of a dictatorship in any European country has repercussions from one end of this country to the other. Communism, fascism, nazi-ism, Hitler's treatment of the Jews, to say nothing of currency depreciations and armament policies, are subjects of consideration in every town and hamlet in America.

So important are the interrelationships between the nations of Europe and America that the murder of an Austrian Archduke in 1914 started a war in Europe which involved the United States as a participant.

Europe today is much closer to America than one State was to another a few years ago. It is predicted by scientists that tomorrow the speed of airplanes at a thousand miles per hour will keep pace with the sun and that one may breakfast in New York, lunch in Honolulu, and dine in Shanghai on the same day. This would mean a trip from New York to London for lunch and matinee and back home in New York any day. Whether such amazing advance in transportation is possible or not it is certain that the relations of Europe and America tomorrow will be closer than they are today.

This all means that such relations and interests will become more complex and more integrated. This interdependence will become more pronounced as time goes on. There will be more social and economic problems for economists and statesmen to consider tomorrow than there are today.

TRADE BARRIERS

In spite of this close relationship between the people of Europe and of America there have grown up artificial barriers that threaten their peace. As the physical barriers of time and space are rapidly dissolving in the advances of science, social and economic barriers have shown no such tendency to disappear. In fact, since the World War artificial barriers have increased. These barriers take a wide range. They are economic, financial, military, and to some extent racial.

Those barriers having to do with trade and commerce are as numerous and varied as the parts of a jigsaw puzzle. They consist of currency depreciations, exchange controls, excessive tariffs, quotas, import licenses, consular fees, government monopolies, and taxes on payments made abroad. They include colonial preferences, economic boycotts, and discriminations of various kinds.

At the close of the World War, as one of the bases of a just peace, President Wilson in his famous 14 points declared in favor of:

"The removal, so far as possible, of all economic barriers and the establishment of an equality in trade conditions among all the nations consenting to peace and associating themselves for its maintenance."

The fundamental principle laid down—that of removal of trade barriers and equality of trade conditions—has been violated in almost every conceivable way by the nations of Europe and America. It is with regret that an American must admit that his country has been a serious offender in this process. Almost immediately after the war the United States began the enactment of laws generally increasing already high tariffs, which had the effect of contracting its world markets.

In 1930 the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill was passed by the American Congress and signed by the President over the protest of some 33 European nations and over 1,000 American economists. The law increased import duties on an average of about 30 percent. Immediately following its passage European nations began to follow suit by tariff increases and other trade restrictions.

Spain, for instance, withdrew most-favored-nation treatment from the United States and passed the Wais tariff bill. The tariff on American automobiles was raised from 100 to 150 percent, and exports of them were seriously impaired. Italy acted immediately. Her purchases were transferred from the United States. Switzerland promptly and effectively boycotted American products. To illustrate the sort of campaign that was carried on in Switzerland against the conduct of the United States in passing the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act, a committee of the Swiss Chamber of Commerce circulated an advertisement in which it was stated "In order to react against a danger that menaces us and in a spirit of solidarity we ask all industrials, artisans, merchants, and consumers to ban from their offices, factories, workshops, garages, stores, and homes all merchandise coming from the United States."

As a result of the Swiss boycott exports from the United States to Switzerland decreased more than 50 percent between 1929 and 1931, while total Swiss imports decreased only about 20 percent.

In 1931 France established a customs quota system against which the United States protested vigorously. Canada retaliated in an emergency tariff act of September 17, 1930.

In 1931 and 1932 Great Britain adopted the policy of protection, and in the latter year the famous Ottawa agreements were signed in which preferences were accorded goods of the United Kingdom.

According to the United States Department of Commerce, in the year 1932, 65 commercially important countries introduced or increased their trade barriers. Coincidently with these acts of the various nations, a feverish nationalism arose. Propaganda movements were started in the various countries. Such slogans as "British goods are best" in Britain and "Buy American" in the United States became common.

A few days ago in Washington a cab driver related to me the story of a cargo of apples consigned to France by himself and his associates. They arrived 2 days late. In those 2 days quota restrictions had been imposed and the apples were not permitted to be landed. Unable to find a market, the owners were forced to dump the apples into the ocean. In addition to the year's apple crop, each party took a $1,400 loss in transportation charges. That is why one of them is driving a taxi, and his attitude toward the Republic of France is not one of intense friendliness.

Multiply this incident by millions of American exporters and the specter of strained relations raises its head.

CURRENCY DEPRECIATION

Along with the establishment of import quotas, licenses, and excessive tariffs, one nation after another began to depreciate its currency. Italy deflated the lira, Great Britain depreciated the pound, and the United States went off gold in 1933. This game added to the confusion and distress of carrying on international trade.

So long as the United States was able to float huge bond issues and lend to foreign countries money with which to purchase our goods, a degree of prosperity was maintained. In 1929, however, when such loans could no longer be financed with the savings of American citizens, a financial crash struck home. That fact, together with the trade restrictions to which I have referred, is largely responsible for the distressing economic conditions that have prevailed throughout the world during the last few years.

Let us for a moment try to visualize the end of these trade-restricting policies. Trade areas are continually narrowed; markets are inevitably reduced for the products of labor; individual purchasing power and standards of living are lowered everywhere. If carried to the logical end, man would return to the primitive state in which small groups, like the family or the tribe, would consume only what they produce. This is retrogression with a vengeance.

If history is clear upon any point, it is that the growth of human civilization has been concurrent with the growth of trade. Countless generations of explorers and scientists have devoted their lives to opening new channels of trade. Statesmen have striven by peace pacts and economic conferences to keep open these channels. As increased trade is the object of every individual business, so increased trade of nations has been the aim of the world's greatest statesmen.

Trade barriers can only serve as a detriment to the states of Europe and America and a threat to their peaceful relations.

WAR DEBTS

One of the most serious barriers to good relations between the United States and Europe is the governmental and commercial debts. There is considerable bitterness in this country over the failure of European nations to pay. In every effort to promote friendship the specter of these overdue debts appears. Upon my return from Europe this summer a number of my friends inquired cynically whether the statesmen said anything about paying their debts to us.

Critical comment is heard constantly on the floors of both Houses of Congress. Legislation was passed a year or two ago denying the indebted nations the right to sell securities in this country. The vote on the adherence of the United States to the World Court was undoubtedly influenced to some extent by the attitude of Members on this matter. The columns of our newspapers and magazines contain almost daily criticisms of such nations. It colors the thinking and influences the attitude of the American people perhaps more than anything else.

In 1921 President Wilson issued a prophetic warning to the people of the world in his message vetoing the emergency tariff bill of that year.

"Europe", he said, "is not in a position at the present time to send us the amount of gold which would be needed, and we could not view further large imports of gold into this country without concern. If we wish to have Europe settle her debts, governmental or commercial, we must be prepared to buy from her. If we wish to assist Europe and ourselves by the export of either food or raw materials, or finished products, we must be prepared to welcome commodities which we need and which Europe will be prepared, with no little pain, to send us."

Until the last 2 or 3 years the United States has been doing two things utterly inconsistent. She has pursued a policy of contracting her markets, decreasing her imports as well as exports, and at the same time demanding payments from European nations. They do not have the gold with which to pay, and we eschew commodities as a substitute. It is virtually the height of folly to adhere to a policy containing no hope of the problem's solution and the removal of a constantly irritating barrier.

COLONIZATION RESTRICTIONS

Another barrier to good relations between nations consists of colonization restrictions. This has played a very substantial role in bringing about the Italian invasion of Ethiopia and the steady encroachment of Japan in China. There are two main contentions made by the so-called have-not nations, such as Germany, Italy, and Japan. They claim that colonies are needed to serve as an outlet for surplus population and as a source of raw materials.

I am convinced that the value of colonies as a physical outlet for population has been greatly exaggerated. After 45 years of occupation of Eritrea by Italy there are now only about 4,000 Italians living in that colony. It is also claimed that there are some 40,000 Frenchmen in the French colony of Tunis and about 90,000 Italians. There were residing in all the German colonies at the outbreak of the World War less than 50,000 Germans. It is true, however, that the people believe their countries are overpopulated, and the result is the same.

With reference to necessary raw materials and markets, much more can be said for the contention. It is generally true that real trade preferences exist in favor of the mother country. There are undoubted discriminations against the have-not countries. Japan, with her 60,000,000 people and her area about the size of California, one-sixth of which is arable land, has experienced increasing internal pressure for colonization. Had it been possible for the Japanese to import raw materials and export manufactured products, she could have maintained her standard of living without the sort of expansion which we now see going on, in spite of a one-million annual increase in her population. The United States, Australia, and New Zealand placed rigid restrictions upon Japanese immigrants. China declared tariff autonomy and Japanese trade became insufficient with which to buy food for her ever-increasing population. Without contending that Japan is justified for her aggressions in China, it is safe to say that colonial trade restrictions and other barriers have had tremendous influence in bringing on the present crisis.

It is also safe, I think, to draw the conclusion that not until colonial and other trade preferences are removed will the world be free from the threat of such aggression as Japan and Italy are engaged in today.

MILITARY ARMAMENTS

Concurrent with the constriction of trade, ill-feeling, nationalistic hostility, and increased armaments have arisen to plague us. At the close of the World War it was recognized by statesmen at the peace conference that a reduction in armaments was necessary to the peace of the world. So much was recognized in the language of the peace treaty. The disarmament of vanquished Germany, Austria, Hungary, and their allies was justified by the victors on the theory of progressive disarmament among the allied nations. Before the German delegates to the peace conference signed the Versailles Treaty, assurance was given them that a policy of disarmament would be followed by all the great powers. This policy was not carried out. Evidence adduced by the Special Senate Munitions Committee laid the blame in part on activities of the world's powerful munition makers. It was also due, I am convinced, to the policy of economic nationalism and ill will to which I have referred.

Today all the powers of the world are spending more for military purposes than ever before in peacetime history.

Japan has given notice of the discontinuance of the Washington Disarmament Treaty at its expiration at the end of 1936. That the nations of the world are engaged in an armament race is no longer a matter of conjecture. The race is on.

The United States has an annual armament program of about a billion dollars. Great Britain's expenditures for the year, probably more than $650,000,000, not including estimates for her air force, are much larger than ever before. It seems certain that expenditures for replacing battleships and for aerial armament will in 1936 exceed those of any previous year in time of peace.

The increase in expenditures for military purposes is bad enough from the standpoint of the taxpayer, but the greatest menace is the increase of killing power in modern implements of war. Incendiary bombs, high explosives, and other death-dealing implements are being manufactured in enormous quantities.

Like the dope addict smothering his emotions in a drug, nations endeavor to rationalize their fears by ever-increasing armaments. In either case the ultimate result is self-destruction. Unless the mad scramble for supremacy in arms is checked, its reasonable result can only be another world war.

RACIAL HATRED

Within the last few years another ancient barrier has reared its head in the rising tide of racial hatred. Hitler's anti-Semitic campaign has resulted in virtual boycott of Germany by Jews in America as well as other parts of the world.

INTENSE NATIONALISM

Both as a cause and as a result of all these barriers a spirit of intense and narrow nationalism has arisen in most of the nations of the world. An attitude of distrust and suspicion of all things foreign prevails. The motives of foreign statesmen are impugned, and charges of intrigue and selfishness on the part of foreign diplomats are frequent. Evidence of hostility toward European nations can be found in public and private expressions of opinion by American citizens. Newspapers frequently exhibit such an attitude in their news columns and editorial comment. It is not uncommon to hear the statement in this country that "All Europe is a hotbed of intrigue and is trying to get the United States involved in it."

Thus we have a world beset by ills. A racial hatred causes an ache here, tariff discrimination a pain there. National grievances are heard on every hand. Dictators have seized power in several countries, and the people of those countries have, for the present at least, surrendered much of their freedom.

While I was in Europe this summer serious-minded and responsible men everywhere expressed their fear of war. At that time the immediate fear was that Italy would make war upon Ethiopia. That has now been done. The British feared Italian designs upon their Empire and possible war. The French are in constant fear of an attack by Germany, particularly under the Hitler regime, and they fear the danger of a combination between Italy and Germany. Russians are alarmed over the danger of an attack from Germany on one side and from Japan on the other. The democratic nations of Europe all fear the warlike designs of dictators. As one responsible European said to me, "A dictator is like Mephistopheles, in that he goes about seeking whom he may devour."

Is it any wonder that most of our modern writers and statesmen are pessimistic? Recently Frank H. Simons declared, "No system of organized peace is possible under present economic conditions." In the address of President Roosevelt a few days ago to the Congress, he asserted:

"Not only have peace and good will among men grown more remote in those areas of the earth during this period (since 1933) but a point has been reached where people of the Americas must take cognizance of growing ill will, of marked trends toward aggression, of increasing armaments, of shortening tempers—a situation which has in it many of the elements that lead to the tragedy of general war. * * * To say the least, there are grounds for pessimism."

All this presents a gloomy picture indeed. It raises the age-old question of whether humanity has the stuff in it to save itself. I must admit the outlook tests one's faith in the ability and integrity of the race to preserve what it has achieved and to make further progress.

While the gloomy side of the picture predominates, there are streaks of light to be seen. In most of the nations of Europe, as well as in America, economic conditions are improving. In some parts of the world, as in America, they are improving rapidly. Heroic efforts are being made to deal with the matter of trade barriers. In the United States under the law providing for reciprocal trade agreements the State Department has done noble work. A number of important agreements have been entered into with other nations reducing tariffs and removing other restrictions to trade. This process is going on throughout the world, and foreign trade is showing a substantial increase.

Everywhere in Europe I found a deep desire for peace. I am convinced that 90 percent of the people of the world want peace. The responsible statesmen in the democratic nations of Europe are seeking to follow a policy that will promote peace and will prevent the spreading of the Italian-Ethiopian conflict into a general European war. At Geneva this summer over 50 nations, through their representatives, strongly committed themselves to the principles of the League Covenant in opposition to aggression and war. Never in the history of the world has there been such a massing of sentiment in opposition to a campaign of military aggression. Every action of the League of Nations has been designed to prevent or end war without bringing on armed conflict between the nations which are members of the League and Italy. League action has been limited to financial and economic sanctions in the hope of avoiding armed conflict and at the same time of asserting an effective pressure upon the aggressor to bring an end to the war.

Any serious study of foreign affairs must, it seems to me, result in two very definite conclusions.

First. Most of the problems plaguing the nations are international in character.

Second. Remedial action, to be successful, must be of a type agreeable to and concurred in by all nations.

Some of the powerful nations of the world have not yet accepted a system of working out their mutual ills in a manner agreeable to all.

The United States is still trying to solve many international questions without cooperation with other nations, yet every barrel of oil and every bale of cotton shipped to Italy at this moment is immediate proof that we cannot be disinterested and aloof. Nothing is more certain than that the problems arising out of our foreign trade are international in character and must be solved by an international remedy.

NEUTRALITY

Today America is trying to be neutral. Neutrality, according to the dictionary, means no active assistance to any belligerent. Under that definition one cannot conceive of a course under modern conditions by which the United States could be neutral. During the World War, and prior to our participation, the United States attempted to pursue a policy of neutrality. And yet it is certain that her course was of great assistance to the Allies to the detriment of Germany. This was due, of course, to the fact that Great Britain controlled the seas and could effectively blockade Germany.

In 1935 the Congress enacted a neutrality bill requiring the President to place an embargo upon arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerents upon the outbreak of war. The President has declared such an embargo in the Italian-Ethiopian war. It is perfectly clear that the effect of this embargo is to benefit Ethiopia to the disadvantage of Italy. The application of such an embargo to Japan and China in the event of a war between them would work to the distinct advantage of Japan. Under any plan that has been suggested, so far as I know, the result would be similar; that is, work to the advantage or disadvantage of one party or another to the conflict.

There are about five different courses that have been suggested to keep us out of war.

First. That the old rules and forms of international law established before 1914 should be followed. These would preserve the doctrine of freedom of the seas. Under this course a neutral nation would be permitted to trade in war time as in peace, except where ports were effectively blockaded. Neutral ships could be searched on the high seas for contraband. This is the course pursued by the United States during the World War prior to our participation as a belligerent and which led us into the war. This course has caused us to become involved in every major European war where a maritime power was a belligerent.

Second. It is suggested that no exports to belligerents be permitted on American vessels; that vessels of such belligerents should be permitted to come to our shores and obtain the goods. This is sometimes called the "cash-and-carry" plan. This would, of course, mean the ruin of American shipping interests. It would mean surrender of freedom of the seas and would place the United States at the close of the war at the complete mercy of the shipping interests of other countries. It would mean giving active assistance to the nation that commands the seas. Such a proposal would not deal with the dangerous and difficult problem of transshipment of our exports by neutrals to the belligerents.

Third. A complete embargo upon all exports to belligerents. During the Napoleonic war in 1807, this was tried by the Jefferson administration, with results so distressing to industry in the United States that an aroused public opinion forced repeal of the embargo acts. We then proceeded to trade as usual and got into the War of 1812. It is not likely this proposal will receive serious consideration by Congress.

Fourth. A compromise proposal such as is contained in the administration bill introduced on January 3, a few days ago. This bill extends the provision for an embargo upon arms, ammunition, and implements of war; it gives the President power by proclamation to limit export of necessary war materials to the normal amount in peacetime, with further provisions restricting travel on belligerent ships and loans to the warring nations. This is the sort of bill which is likely to be enacted by the present Congress. It is obvious, of course, that such a bill does not avoid discrimination as to one or the other of the belligerents. It may be in favor of the aggressor or the victim. It will probably prevent the most effective application of economic sanctions by the League nations, and thus prolong the present war. And in the event of a future war between Japan and Russia, for instance, since Japan buys over one-quarter of her imports from the United States, our policy would give vital aid to Japan. The trouble is that in modern times real neutrality is not possible. We do not live in a neutral world.

COLLECTIVE SECURITY

Fifth. The final course that has been suggested is cooperation with the other nations of the world in measures undertaken to prevent or stop war. This would mean working with other nations in such measures. It would mean at this time that the United States would cooperate in carrying out sanctions—more specifically, in placing an embargo upon those articles and commodities such as coal, oil, iron, and steel that have been interdicted by the League. It will mean, of course, a change in the conception of neutrality. This takes time. It is unlikely that any such cooperation with the League of Nations will be considered by the present Congress.

This is the situation today; but tomorrow America will find it necessary to take part in a system of collective security among the nations. Under modern civilization the interdependence of nations will make such a course inevitable. The demand for law and order and progress among the nations of the world will develop a system similar to that which has grown up in every civilized community in the world. This will determine the relations of America and Europe tomorrow.

NATIONAL HOUSING PROGRAM—ADDRESS BY SENATOR WAGNER

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, on December 3, 1935, the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], who speaks with exceptional authority, delivered an important address on the National Housing Program before the National Public Housing Conference in New York City. I ask unanimous consent that his address may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I felt deeply honbred when invited to speak under the auspices of the National Public Housing Conference, an organization known throughout the country for the distinction of its leadership and the quality of its services. Those of you here today are not recruits but veterans in the campaign for better housing. You have always glowed with the ardor of every humanitarian endeavor.

But while there is nothing new about your services, you have heretofore been in the relative obscurity of those who do the real spade work, who translate public need into public demand. It is only very recent events that have brought you complete recognition upon the threshold of fulfillment. First of all, it was the depression that revealed not only to the penetrating social worker but to the average man everywhere the ugliness and squalor in the underprivileged lives of the slum dwellers. Then it was the victory over hard times that brought renewed faith in our united capacity to remove such ugliness from the American scene.

No well-informed New Yorker needs to be told about the slums, and it is certainly no pleasure to review their sordid history. But it is easier for us to hear about these conditions than it is for the victims who are oppressed by them every moment of their lives. The time has come to face the whole truth with realism and to act upon the facts.

Every new study of the slums creates a fresh impact of tragedy and horror against our hearts and minds. This very year we have learned in greater detail about the more than half a million families in this rich city who barely exist in substandard homes. It may seem overprecise to attempt to divide their misery and destitution into different gradations or degrees. Certainly we know that the people even at the top layer of this underprivileged group suffer severely enough. But I cannot refrain from noting that the 23,000 families at the very bottom are paying, and can afford to pay, rentals only one-third of the amount necessary to secure decent living quarters.

Perhaps most New Yorkers and those who do not live here have been too prone to magnify the differences between this city and the rest of the country. In respect to terrible housing conditions I wish for the sake of the rest of the country that the difference did exist. But, on the contrary, searching inquiry by the Department of Commerce indicates that in American cities at large at least 20 percent of the homes lack elementary sanitary facilities and are not fit for decent living. And when we turn from the metropolis to the countryside we find conditions even worse. Despite the much-heralded joys of rural living, there are many States today where only one home in a hundred has a bathtub; only two in a hundred any kind of running water. Generalizations are often dangerous, but it is safe to generalize about housing in the United States. For millions of people, through no fault of their own, housing is wretched and disgraceful. One-third of the total population live in homes injurious to their health and endangering their safety and morals.

"Health, safety, and morals" has become a phrase that is bandied about rather loosely. We should never allow it to become a mere legalism, a stereotyped slogan devoid of real meaning. We cannot be reminded too frequently that where the sun is not permitted to cast its healthful rays into the tenement room, 3 out of every 4 babies are afflicted with rickets; the danger of contracting tuberculosis is 30 times as great as under normal conditions; the infant mortality rate is 3 times as high as among the well-to-do. It is easy to collect these figures. But only several generations of bitter experience can reveal the cumulative effect of undernourishment and dampness and cold upon millions of unfortunates, who spread the contagion of their infirmities among society at large.

The conditions that impair health are not consistent with safety. Year after year we find that conflagrations in New York are most numerous and most dangerous in the crowded and rotting old-law tenements built before 1901. In 1934, 81 human beings were needlessly burned to death in the firetraps of this city.

The boon companion of poverty and disease is crime. The pioneer work done by the Cleveland crime survey years ago has now been supplemented by the research of the New York City Housing Authority. We now know that in the worst slum area of Manhattan, the number of arrests per thousand people is two and one-half times as great as in nonslum areas. We know also that the dragnet of the law enmeshes women within its folds four times as frequently within the slums as elsewhere.

Even more shocking have been the discoveries with regard to the young. The rate of juvenile delinquency is four times greater in the worst slum area of Manhattan than in nonslum areas. An earlier Chicago study drew an even more vivid contrast by comparing a very poor section of the city with one of the most prosperous. It found that lawlessness among children was over 300 times as great in the Loop as it was on the North Shore.

This juvenile delinquency, and the high truancy records that accompany it, are but phases in the process by which the underworld is becoming a hunting ground reserved for the young. If we regard all persons under 21 years of age as juvenile, we find that three-quarters of all delinquents are between 18 and 16. Over one-half of all serious crimes are committed by people who have not celebrated their twenty-sixth birthday. Only some of us believe that almost all criminals are products of social mistreatment. But none of us would deny that when children on a large scale go astray, the injury that they can do to society is trivial compared to the injustice that society has perpetrated against them.

Fifty years ago the juvenile offender was thrown into a common jail, there to learn mastery in transgression from the hardened criminal. We pride ourselves on our progress since then. We have created special laws, special courts, special judges, and special houses of correction. But withal, we have hardly scratched the surface of the problem because we have not attacked it at the source. For every child of the slums who enjoys a playground, 11 are forced into the streets, there to be thrown up against every evil influence of the city. Millions are subjected to living conditions that blunt the intellectual and moral development of the average child, and that produce, even in the exceptional child, seething resentments likely to make him an exceptional criminal. To attempt correction only after the child reaches a court is as foolish as it would be to make people live in swamps, and then to provide grand hospitals for the isolation and treatment of malaria.

Occasionally one hears the claim that the corruption of the young is not due to bad housing and the slums, but rather to the streets, or the home environment, or heredity, or a multitude of other causes. Those who voice these objections are either indulging in hair-splitting and unreal distinctions, or they are the selfish few who attempt to block progress by indirect methods. Of course, all the social tragedies of mankind are part of a tangled web into which are woven the strands of many causes. But in attempting to untangle the web, we must begin somewhere. And if our concept of the home as the center of civilization has any meaning, how can we begin better than by creating the necessary conditions of a happy and healthy home life?

This is not empty theory. It is based upon experience. A study in Liverpool showed that when families were relieved of slum conditions their annual tuberculosis death rate fell from 4 per thousand to 1.2 in the short space of 4 years. It is reliably estimated that about 90 percent of those who have had an opportunity to get away from the slums have soon proved themselves in every respect the equal of any element of the population.

Closely connected with these human considerations are the economic aspects of the slum problem. A study of a large representative city showed that the per capita cost to society for the care of fire hazards, juvenile delinquency, disease, poor relief, and insanity, was seven times as great in the slums as in other areas. In addition, there is the unavoidable loss in industrial efficiency, when men and women are driven to work undernourished in body and spirit, with lowered resistance against industrial disease and accident. Finally, we must not neglect to consider the corroding effect upon democratic principles and practice, when so many see themselves denied the basic opportunities for living full lives.

It is indeed disconcerting to note that slum-living has taken on a more permanent character in recent years. When our population and industries were expanding rapidly, when the Nation was young and large waves of immigration succeeded one another, the slums were taken over from time to time by newcomers. These newcomers first pushed the older occupants into better living quarters, and then in their turn moved upward as their conditions improved. While it was never nice to think of anyone living in the slums, at least we comforted ourselves with the thought that it was merely the first step in a constant progress. Perhaps the picture was never as rosy as we thought it. But in any event, the situation today is certainly different. Millions of people are now finding the slums not a starting place but a perpetual habitat. They were born in the slums, they are spending their whole lives there, and they will die there if nothing is done to help them.

To state this development in another way, we are passing from an age when the worthy individual could help himself to an era when we must rely more and more upon cooperative action. No longer is it easy for a man to build his own home, to go prospecting in the West, or to rise rapidly in industry. Society has become more stratified. There is, of course, no reason why we should abandon hope or cut short our efforts to raise wage standards, or lose our objective of giving dignity to all occupations. But we need to realize fundamentally that individual action must be supplemented by a well-planned and coordinated housing program for the people of the country.

A program of this kind must include not only slum clearance and low-cost housing but also the development of better homes for people of moderate means, and the replacement of obsolescence of all types. In every phase of this program, from top to bottom, private industry should and must bear by far the major portion of the undertaking. Such a requirement is consistent with our practices and consonant with our principles of economics and government. The rebuilding program which this country needs, involving an expenditure, almost entirely by private agencies, of about $65,000,000,000 over a period of 10 years, would prove a boon to every trade. It would absorb the technological unemployment caused by the machine process. It would place our national prosperity upon the sound foundation of a healthy condition in the durable-goods industries.

But low-cost housing for the wage earner of the lowest income cannot be left to private industry alone. On this issue experience speaks decisively. Limited-dividend housing corporations, even at their best, have not reached the really low-income groups, but rather the skilled workers and professionals. In New York, under the Housing Act of 1926, the average monthly rental has been between $10 and $11 per room. This touches only the needs of those whose earnings are between $1,500 and $2,500 per year, or only one-third of the population in normal times. Between the first tenement house survey 26 years ago and 1932, the families occupying old-law tenements declined only by seven-tenths percent per year. At that rate, it would take about a century and a half to get the city decently housed. We cannot afford to wait that long.

It is elementary that private enterprise, no matter how unselfish, and no matter how well executed, must operate at a profit. It is clear also that private enterprise alone could not make any profit by providing the poor with more costly housing than they are able to pay for. But that is just the kind of housing that millions of people must receive if they are to be decently housed at all. No family earning less than $1,500 a year can buy suitable lodging. And even in 1929, over 42 percent of the families in America fell below that income level. Twenty-one percent, indeed, were earning less than $1,000 annually. To care for these groups, there must be private industry plus public help.

The object of public housing, in a nutshell, is not to invade the field of home building for the middle class or the well-to-do, which has been the only profitable area for private enterprise in the past. Nor is it even to exclude private enterprise from major participation in a low-cost housing program. It is merely to supplement what private industry will do, by subsidies which will make up the difference between what the poor can afford to pay and what is necessary to assure decent living quarters.

This subsidy idea, like schools and parks, hospitals and public libraries, embodies the principle that the distribution of our national income has not been entirely just, and that the interests of all the people require that the Government play its part in promoting improvement.

No one who has studied the widely successful European experience will talk sincerely of housing the poor decently without acknowledging the need for public subsidy. In England, large grants have not only raised standards of living, but also helped every part of the building industry and contributed mightily to the restoration of better times.

The bill that I introduced at the last session of Congress, and that I believe will be pushed to a successful conclusion when Congress meets again, is built around this principle. While the subsidy must be Federal, the initiation, the supervision, and the major part of the financing of a home-building program must be left to the localities. This is desirable not only from the administrative point of view, but because homes are part of the fabric of community life. They express sectional and regional habits and ideals. They must reflect spontaneous impulses of the people themselves.

I feel sure that everyone will become enlisted in this campaign to tear down the slums. There is involved here not merely the removal of delapidated buildings that are eyesores in the center of prospering cities; not merely a program for civil reform or economic improvement. There is involved the destruction of suffocating dwellings from which children of tender years are driven into the streets of vice and crime. There is involved the introduction of joy and health into the barren lives of millions of parents and their children. What heart can fail to beat in sympathy with a project to supplant disease with health, to replace discrimination by opportunity, and to do all those things that transfer human liberty from an idle dream to an inspiring reality?

ASSOCIATE JUSTICE WILLIAM GASTON—ADDRESS BY SENATOR BAILEY

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I present, and ask that there be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, an able and interesting address delivered at Raleigh, N. C., by the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], upon the occasion of the centennial celebration of William Gaston, distinguished Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of North Carolina from 1833 to 1842.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The present Commonwealth of North Carolina is unique in that its white population is not less distinctly English than England itself. North Carolina is no melting pot. If in the Western World there is an old England, it is within the boundaries of North Carolina. We are in truth but an extension of that England across the Atlantic which now for 3 centuries has presented to all other nations the example of a people competent under all conditions, equal to every demand, flourishing throughout 10 generations of increasingly rapid change, and at the last standing forth, amid crumbling structures of government, serene, contained, and forward—the most stable of all the peoples of the Old World.

England's capacity lies altogether in her competence to produce as need requires strong men with power to command the confidence of the masses, the while they have maintained in public and private life the noble ideals and virtues received from Heaven and proved by the experience of the race of mankind—the virtues of morality, of courage, of tolerance, of common sense, of religion—a capacity in the people to appraise such men at their worth and, therefore, to prefer them to all others. The demagogue gets nowhere in England, and may Heaven continue to grant North Carolina the same deliverance.

Our North Carolina heritage is no common heritage. We draw today our life as a people from 1,000 years of English experience, 700 in England, 300 in America; an experience of the progress of virtuous men and women, to liberty, and in that liberty to self-reliance and self-competence. It is a heritage that no one generation may destroy, that no series of calamities may take away. It is in the blood of a thousand years that fails not to reproduce after its order. Not infrequently it is said that North Carolina has not brought forth famous warriors, statesmen, scientists, or men of letters. But it cannot be said that she has failed to produce great men or that she has failed to work out a noble civilization.

In the first half of the eighteenth century, the formative period of our Commonwealth, upon our scene four men of the first magnitude, men comparable to the great in any age—Nathaniel Macon, William Gaston, George Badger, and William A. Graham. Granted that none of them attained unto the fame their greatness deserved, all they lacked was the accident of station. Each of them commanded, from their more eminent associates in the national life, tributes of deference and encomium that leave no doubt of his stature measured by the recognized great. Each of them left memorials in achievement and utterances that continue to exalt them after the lapse of many decades.

Tonight, 100 years after one of these—William Gaston—made his crowning contribution to our Commonwealth, the church from which he drew the heavenly standards and moral ideals that guided his exalted earthly course celebrates his character and invites its children and all others to recur to his deeds and thoughts, confident of their inspiring power, and not less confident that the crowded decades since he ceased to move upon the earthly scene have produced in this region no more lofty example, no more noble man. I would present him as a youth who sent a perfect model of filial piety and diligence in every man-making task; as a lawyer who adorned and elevated a great profession; as a statesman whose conduct commanded the highest eminence; as a citizen who exalted his relation to the State; and a churchman who was faithful to his church until the uttermost. Unequal to and unworthy of the task as I am, I gratefully accept the honor and humbly seize an opportunity as great as it is rare.

As a youth, as a student, as a man, a citizen, lawyer, jurist, and churchman, William Gaston was distinguished by the mold in which the soul was cast—and that mold was fashioned by his Catholic mother, a widow from the time when he was 3 years of age. He was undoubtedly gifted in rare degree in natural endowments, but it appears that his best gift from his earliest youth was his singular susceptibility to a saintly mother's devoted influences. Reviewing his career as a whole, there is but one reconciliation of the child, the man, the jurist, the Christian, and the statesman—and that is his steadfast concern to be true to all that was noble, his responsiveness to the holy hopes of a pious mother, a concern that wrought in him an integrity of character, a breadth of learning and loftiness of conduct that exceeded his other achievements, noble as they were. One must, in order to appraise him, behold him as the man produced by incessant and tireless self-improvement, beginning in early infancy, guided all the way by the highest standards of piety, and an unfaltering adherence to the noblest ideals; receiving at length the offer of the highest honors the State could give, and having added to these the highest honorary degrees of Columbia, Pennsylvania, Princeton, Georgetown, and other universities.

William Gaston's father was of French Huguenot descent; born in Ireland, a physician by profession, a graduate of Edinburgh Medical College, and a surgeon in the English Army. He resigned this position and emigrated to our New World, settling at New Bern. His mother was an English lady, Margaret Sharpe. The son was one of two children of this union, the other being a daughter, who became the wife of our Chief Justice John Louis Taylor. He was born 1778, in the years of our American Revolution.

The little and happy family was all too soon to be overwhelmed by disaster. An ardent Whig and supporter of the Revolution, the father was shot to death "over the heads of his wife and children" by the Tories, for no reason other than that he was a captain of volunteers in the cause of our country's independence. Years later William Gaston referred to this event in a speech in the Congress of the United States, when challenged for his moderation and his counsels of peace with respect to our course with England, by remarking that he "was baptized an American in the blood of a murdered father."

It is not unlikely that this dire affliction had an incalculable influence upon Gaston's career and character. He became at once the only son of a widow of scant means—a child of misfortune, whereas he had been born a child of fortune. The mother never recovered from her grief. Her path through life was the path of sorrow. But she was not without recourse. She was a devout Catholic, a true Catholic, who found in her church not the antidote to grief but the means to triumph over every woe that life might bring, the Heavenly guidance in every hour of darkness, the faith to carry on, and the moral ideals that qualified her to be the mother of a noble daughter and a great son.

So far as kindred were concerned, the widow and her little children were alone in the southern part of the new Republic, but in faith she possessed the heritage of all who suffer in all worlds and all ages. She was not alone, but rather was compassed about by a great cloud of witnesses. The broken heart could not yield. It is recorded of her that she was a woman of prudence and energy and that she reared her children in the faith from which she drew the strength to endure and triumph. To precept she added example, and to example precept. To say what would have been the event had the father lived would be to speculate. It is enough to record that out of a home so dark the light of a mother's faith has shone a century and a half, and never more brightly than now, when a proud and grateful people bear witness that death and a hundred years, which have swallowed up hundreds of millions in a common oblivion, have not only not been sufficient to quench the flame of the life of a child of that darkened home, but rather bear witness to its power.

I cannot resist the temptation of the moment; I would bid you bow at the feet of the daughters of sorrow, the mothers of the great. I would speak to many of the present day the word of cheer—there is no disaster, there is not power sufficient to overthrow a mother who loves her children, and sustained by piety the while she pours out her life to bring them up in the fear of the Lord and the faith of her church. The darker the night the brighter shines the light of a mother's faith. The deeper the waters the more moving at length the tide upon the shore.

The first student to enroll in the Catholic college at Georgetown, D. C., was William Gaston, aged 13 years. The mother managed that and his preparation for that. The first of a long and increasing line, it was a good omen for this institution, since grown to national importance, that he was pronounced "the best scholar and the most exemplary youth in the college." So he set an example to all who have followed him to Georgetown. Most appropriately have the authorities named the main hall of Georgetown University in his honor.

After 18 months of too earnest pursuit of his studies he returned to his mother's home—there to remain, studying in the local academy until 1794, when he entered Princeton College, from which within 2 years he graduated with the highest honors of his class. One catches a fresh insight into his soul when he reads that, after his State had laid its highest honors at his feet and he had made a long succession of conquests, he continued to say that the proudest moment of his life was when he informed his mother of his graduation at the head of his class. Confidently, may it be added that to the son's pride was added the mother's joy; that her grief was turned to gladness as she saw of the travail of her soul and was satisfied. For heavenly service she had received a heavenly reward.

A brief period of studies in the law, and he entered upon his profession, at the age of 20 years, under most auspicious conditions—having for his career every qualification of his exacting calling—the combination of learning, of capacity to learn, of nobility of character, forensic capacity, of untiring industry, and the sense of duty in the public service rather than ambition to accumulate riches. Excellence was his motive. He was successful from the outset.

I must be content, in order to comport with the demands of this occasion, to say that he shortly attained a widely recognized primacy at the bar, and at length so far achieved that the great John Marshall is reported to have said of him that he would be willing to resign as Chief Justice if he could be assured that Gaston would take his place. Mr. Justice Story rated him one of the four great American lawyers of his time. Chancellor Kent sought his assistance in more than one deep problem. His most competent rival at the bar, George Badger, bore witness that in John Marshall's court Gaston was all in all—that he had never known a judge so to depend on a lawyer as Marshall depended on Gaston.

But it was in the public rather than private life that William Gaston was destined to fulfill his career. At the age of 30 he was speaker of the house of commons, serving as such two terms. At 35 he was a Representative in the Congress, where he served two terms with Webster, Calhoun, and Clay, becoming one of Webster's most cherished associates and his ally in a number of great causes. He was a member of the State senate in 1817, 1818, and 1819. And he served thereafter in the house of commons in 1824, 1827, 1829, and 1831. In 1833 he became associate justice of the supreme court, to serve 11 years, the remainder of his life, with rare distinction. And he served also as a member of our constitutional convention of 1835; altogether, nearly 30 years in the public service, notwithstanding great and exacting duties at the bar.

Nevertheless, he could declare in the presence of the witnesses: I have never sought office—the office sought me.

As a jurist the late Mr. Justice Connor records that the records of our supreme court disclose that in a hundred years Gaston has been overruled in only one instance. What he wrote as law remains the law to this day. His most famous opinion was that in the State v. Will—probably the most notable case in all our reports. In this case he broke new ground by declaring the rights of the slaves as against felonious attack by their masters, and delivered from the sentence of death a Negro who, under great provocation, had slain an overseer in circumstances which the court held could not justify a verdict of murder.

As legislator Gaston was active in four forums—the house of commons, the State senate, the National House of Representatives, and the constitutional convention. He could have been United States Senator, but refused on the ground of duty to the bench. He was a great lawyer and a great lawmaker. But the role of justice was to him the path of duty.

One obtains a measure of Gaston's great powers in debate when he learns that in the Congress, notwithstanding he served only two terms, it is recognized that he unhorsed Henry Clay, the greatest of American legislative leaders, in the debate on the Previous Question, to which he brought against Clay's genius a knowledge of the history of the subject and a cogency of reasoning that were overwhelming, and produced an address that must be included in any list of the classics of the Congress.

Nevertheless, it is clear that Gaston's interest was in his State and that he preferred his law practice with service in our legislature to service in the Congress. For it must be recorded that notwithstanding his well-won prestige in that body and the opportunity it offered for national fame, he voluntarily withdrew from it in 1817, refused to offer for the Senate, and served almost without intermission in the Legislature of North Carolina, until elevated to the supreme court. Perhaps fame had no more power to seduce him than money, although he frankly avowed his ambition for distinction. Surely he delighted in the engagements of his profession, the life at home, the association with his own people, and the service in the legislature. Reaching this decision from his character, one concludes that the voice of duty was the voice that moved him to renounce the national arena for service amongst his own people.

In his first term of his legislative service he drew the act regulating the inheritance of real estate—a system of descents that remains the law with only slight changes. In 1818 he was, as Battle declares, most influential in the establishment of the supreme court—practically in the form in which it exists to this day. For this he is entitled to the epithet—father of the supreme court. And it may be revealed for our Raleigh hearers that to him is due a lasting debt for his efforts to rebuild the capitol at Raleigh, thus doing much to establish our city as the State capital against a very powerful political movement.

He was the great pacificator between our east and west, and the line he drew and the provisions he made for the election of a certain number of senators west of that line and a certain number of representatives east of it, arranging a balance of power between the sections, brought about a great period of peace, and likewise determined in no small degree our politics since. To these services he added an ardent interest in public education and a noble devotion to our university, which he served as trustee 30 years.

Altogether, he was the commanding figure of his time in the legislature of this State, and his power to command rested not upon politics or catering to popular agitation or partisan antipathies. He was a Federalist and the last of the great figures of that party. He was not a man of popular manner or proclivities. He is described by Mr. Creecy as standing in the convention as reserved and aloof—and leading by reason of the sheer force of his excellence. In the heyday of slavery, for example, he did not hesitate to denounce it in unmeasured terms. Fortunate for him he lived in a day when the electorate looked to legislators to do right, to be honest and fearless, and despised the demagogues who sought office by fraudulently sowing discontent and catering to emotional demands. The Absaloms sat at the gate in vain when such as Gaston could so hold the popular confidence that, notwithstanding he did not please the masses with vain promises, he served them capably and with a heart as honest as it was fearless, and a mind that comprehended their problems far better than they.

With such a background it remained for the constitutional convention of 1835 to provide Gaston with the opportunity of his life, the occasion to render one of those services which the generations do not suffer to be forgotten. All that he had learned at his mother's knee, all that Georgetown and Princeton could give, all the noble gifts that he had acquired, all his experience as a lawyer, lawmaker, and jurist were now to serve him and serving him to serve all men forever in the cause of freedom of conscience.

The constitution undergoing revision provided in the thirty-second article:

"No person who shall deny the being of God or the truth of the Protestant religion shall be capable of holding any office or place of trust or profit in the civil department within this State."

The proposition in the convention was to strike out the word "Protestant" and insert the word "Christian."

The issue was the sectarian test of office. The stake was toleration primarily, religious liberty in the last analysis.

The debate had gone against the amendment until Gaston arose. He held the floor 2 days in a great historical argument. When he sat down the issue had been decided, and the battle for toleration had been fought almost single-handed, and it had been won.

Gaston had repeatedly been elected to office notwithstanding this section of the constitution. He was a Catholic, and everyone knew that he was. He was sworn to support and maintain the constitution. It had been his view that the section which appeared to disqualify him was repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and to the Constitution of North Carolina. On this view of the matter he had long ago, after consultation with the most eminent authorities, reached his conclusion, and his argument left no doubt of its soundness. But he was not content to rest his case on the legalistic basis, however firm. His soul was aflame with the right of conscience and the freedom to worship God.

He avowed his Catholicism without apology. And so far from apologizing for it, he gave to the convention an exposition of the Catholic's relation to his church and the State that to this day leaves nothing to be desired. With all earnestness he drew in definite lines the distinction between his allegiance to his State and his vows to his church. There was, he declared, no conflict. There could be no question of allegiance—the word related wholly to the relationship to the State. There could be, therefore, no point upon the question of allegiance. There was nothing in his religion tending to impair his allegiance to North Carolina; on the other hand, there was much to fortify that allegiance.

No nobler or braver words than Gaston's have been uttered in behalf of the separation of church and state.

He proudly pointed to the policy of toleration under Calvert in Maryland, and with no little force referred to Roger Williams and his policy of religious liberty in Rhode Island. He seems not to have made the distinction between religious toleration and religious liberty, but he left no doubt of his devotion to both. While he made no avowed choice, his argument at its height, as I shall hereafter show, was for religious liberty.

The heart of his great argument is to be found in his exposition of the right of Americans to worship God according to the dictates of their consciences and the lights before them without civil interference, pains, or penalties. In this he was fortified by the Constitution of the United States and the spirit of our Commonwealth and Republic. He had to deal for the most part with prejudices and the spirit of political accommodations, and these he attacked with devastating power.

It is not to be wondered that Gaston's utterance, so effective to present the position of his church and establish the democratic right of representation according to the popular will, is preserved by the Catholic Historical Society. Its usefulness may seem long since to have been expended, since both Catholics and Protestants have for decades agreed upon its truth—the course Gaston advocated being the course approved throughout our land. But as a memorial of a great statesman representing his church in a crucial hour, and as the final argument against religious tests of office, it well deserves preservation for all generations.

I make no apology for prolonging this address to the extent of quoting from Judge Gaston's argument, which I have so unworthily described, sufficiently to convey in his own words some impression of its high character and of the great capacity of the man who conceived it.

Hear him on the freedom of the soul:

"If there be any subject upon which the interference of human power is more forbidden, than upon others, it is on religion. Born of faith—nurtured by hope—invigorated by charity—looking for its rewards in a world beyond the grave—it is of Heaven, heavenly. The evidence upon which it is founded, and the sanctions by which it is upheld, are addressed solely to the understanding and the purified affections. Even He, from whom cometh every pure and perfect gift, and to whom religion is directed as its author, its end, and its exceedingly great reward, imposes no coercion upon His children. * * * He causes His sun to shine, alike on the believer and the unbeliever, and His dews to fertilize equally the soil of the orthodox and the heretic. No earthly gains or temporal privations are to influence their judgment here. * * * But civil rulers thrust themselves in and become God's avengers. Under a pretended zeal for the honor of His house, and the propagation of His revelation,

"Snatch from His hand the balance and the rod;
Rejudge His justice—are the God of God."

Let us not be deceived. These words are not as out of date as I just now appeared to suggest. They are needed in this age, as well as in Gaston's. There are dictatorships of recent origin that proscribe religion, that describe our religion as "the opiate of the people", that seek to destroy Christianity, that persecute a great race both on account of race and religion; millions on our continent are today deprived of religious liberty; and there are forces operating even in our land which, given the power, would in the name of communism deny to our people the consolation of the cross and the hope of eternal life.

And now on the separation of church and state:

"The alliance between king and church, or between state and church, by which the latter has been taken into the keeping of the civil power, has sprung not so much from a zeal for religion, not so much even from bigotry or fanaticism, as from the crooked policy of tyrannical men. A law-church is a convenient instrument for rulers, whether with or without religion. It enlarges their dominion by extending it over the minds of their subjects. It puts at their disposal the high places in the church and enlists in their service its ministers and teachers. It makes kings and princes and magistrates the heads of God's spiritual kingdom, and renders it sacrilege as well as treason to resist their sway. Thus has the religion of peace and brotherly love been held up as the pretext for tyranny and persecution, and its holy name been desecrated to purposes of plunder and outrage."

Hear his tribute to Roger Williams:

"The next example of religious freedom, secured in the original and fundamental institutions of a state, was given to the world by the great and amiable Roger Williams, the founder of Rhode Island, and one of the most distinguished ornaments of the Religious Society of the Baptists. This extraordinary man, at the age of 30, had matured a doctrine which secures to him imperishable fame. A fugitive from religious persecution in England, 'he had resolved in the capacious recesses of his mind the nature of intolerance—and he, and he alone, had arrived at the great principle which is its only effectual remedy. He announced his discovery under the simple proposition of the sanctity of conscience. 'The civil magistrate should restrain crime, but never control opinion—should punish guilt, but never violate the freedom of the soul' (1 Bancroft's History, 398). 'In the unwavering assertion of his views he never changed his position; the sanctity of conscience was the great tenet, which, with all its consequences, he defended as he first trod the shores of New England; and in his extreme old age it was the last pulsation of his heart. But it placed the young emigrant in direct opposition to the whole system upon which Massachusetts was founded, and gentle and forgiving as was his temper, prompt as he was to concede everything which honesty permitted, he always asserted his belief with temperate firmness and unbending benevolence' (Ditto, 399). It was impossible that with these fixed principles of enlarged liberality he should not often have come in opposition to the fierce doctrines which then obtained. The persecuted Pilgrims of Massachusetts were such zealous lovers of civil and religious freedom that they would fain keep it all to themselves. They could not abandon the idea of punishing heresy as a crime against the state, and of upholding God's law by human force. 'Magistrates were selected exclusively from members of the church. With equal propriety, reasoned Williams, might a doctor of physic or a pilot be selected according to his skill in theology and his standing in the church.' It was objected to him that his principles subverted all good government.

"The commander of the vessel of State, replied Williams, may maintain order on board the ship and see that it pursues its course steadily, even though the dissenters of the crew are not compelled to attend the public prayers of their companions. But the controversy finally turned on the question of 'the rights and duties of magistrates' (thereby meaning civil rulers) to guard the minds of the people against corruption, and to punish what would seem to them heresy. Magistrates, Williams asserted, are but the agents of the people or their trustees, on whom no spiritual power in matters of religion can be conferred, since conscience belongs to the individual, and is not the property of the body politic; and with admirable dialectics, clothing the great truth in its boldest form, he asserted, that 'the civil magistrate may not intermeddle even to stop a church from apostacy and heresy', and that 'equal protection should be extended to every sect and every form of worship.' With corresponding distinctness, he foresaw the influence of his principles upon society. 'The removal of the yoke of soul oppression', to use the words in which, at a later day, he confirmed his early views, 'as it will prove an act of mercy and righteousness to the enslaved nations, so it is of binding force to engage the whole and every interest and conscience to preserve the common liberty and peace.' (Ditto, 401.) Compelled to fly, because of these obnoxious opinions, in winter snow, and stormy weather, for 14 weeks, not knowing what bread or bed did mean, often without fire, food, or companion, often without a guide and with no shelter but a hollow tree, he at length found a safe refuge and kind treatment among the Narragansett Indians. From them he purchased an extensive territory, and there founded the Commonwealth of Rhode Island, wherein the will of the majority was to govern in all civil things, and God alone respected as the ruler of conscience."

"The Catholics in this State are very few, and those who have had no opportunity of knowing them personally, and have learned their tenets only through the medium of their enemies, cannot be much blamed for crediting the most ridiculous falsehoods. It has been asked whether the allegiance of Catholics to the Pope be spiritual only, and the learned gentleman from Halifax has unquestionably shown that they do not owe him civil allegiance. Sir, I object in toto to the term 'allegiance', as characterizing the connection between the Catholic and the chief bishop of his church. I owe no allegiance to any man or set of men on earth, save only to the State of North Carolina, and so far as she has parted with her sovereignty, to the United States of America. The charge that Catholics owe allegiance to the Pope is wholly false. Spread over the whole earth—speaking different tongues, subjects or citizens of different governments, beings of different races and complexions—they are connected by a spiritual tie, the tie of one and the same faith, which constitutes them one spiritual family or church. For the regulation of this widespread church, an ecclestiastical or spiritual government is indispensable. This is mainly confided to the bishops of the several dioceses and of these, the first in rank and jurisdiction is the Bishop of Rome. To him, subject to well-defined laws and well-ascertained usage, is committed the chief administration. To him, and to them, and to every spiritual or ecclesiastical teacher, acting within his proper sphere, respect and obedience are due. But no man owes to him or them, or any of them, the duty implied by the term 'allegiance'; the obligation of personal fidelity, the obligation of defense, as an equivalent for the benefit of protection.

"His authority, their authority, is spiritual only—has no connection with civil duties—and is enforced only by spiritual censures.

"He has not, and they have not, any more right to interfere with a man's obligation to his country or his fellow men than civil rulers have to interfere with a man's spiritual concerns. Catholics peremptorily deny that the church has any temporal power or any right to interpose in the regulations of government, and hold themselves bound to resist, even unto death, as tyrannical usurpation, all attempts at such interference."

On the Catholic and freedom:

"But it has been objected that the Catholic religion is unfavorable to freedom—nay, even incompatible with republican institutions. Ingenious speculations on such matters are worth little, and prove still less. Let me ask who obtained the great charter of English freedom but the Catholic prelates and barons at Runnymede? The oldest, the purest democracy on earth is the little Catholic Republic of San Marino, not a day's journey from Rome. It has existed now for 1,400 years, and is so jealous of arbitrary power that the executive authority is divided between two Governors, who are elected every 3 months. Was William Tell, the founder of Swiss liberty, a Royalist? Are the Catholics of the Swiss Cantons in love with tyranny? Are the Irish Catholics friends to passive obedience and nonresistance? Was Lafayette, Pulaski, or Kosciusko a foe to civil freedom? Was Charles Carroll of Carrolton, unwilling to jeopard fortune in the cause of liberty?"

And now on the duty of public men:

"But gentlemen declare themselves afraid, alarmed, lest they should give a shock to prejudice, and this is spoken of as if it were some dreadful and appalling calamity. Suppose they should; what is the mighty mischief? It may impose upon them necessity, if they wish to stand well with their neighbors, to explain the reasons by which they have been influenced, and to prove the propriety of their course. This is some inconvenience, indeed, but surely no one expects that the way of duty is to be always smooth and pleasant, a mere primrose path of dalliance. It is possible, however, that the inconvenience may be greater than this. They may not be able to convince all their constituents that the decision was right. Such may be the ignorance, or prejudice, or excitement at home that it will not immediately yield to reason. And has it come to this?

"Is all our boasted patriotism an empty name? Is a public man to risk nothing for the public good? Shall he model himself after Mr. By-Ends, of Fair-Speech, in the Pilgrim's Progress? This distinguished personage was desirous to accompany Christian and Faithful in their pilgrimage to the Celestial City, but then he made it a rule 'never to sail against wind or tide' and always 'had the luck to jump in judgment with the present state of the times, whatever it might be.'

"I am humbled—I almost despair of my country—when I find honorable men clothed with the holy trust of passing in judgment on the things which make for the lasting freedom, honor, and happiness of this people hesitating to do right—looking over their shoulders—fearing that they may run counter to a partial or temporary excitement at home, and thus yield a petty advantage to some miserable factious demagogue in the contest for popular favor. It would seem as if the tenure of office had become a species of privileged villainage—public trust to be held only on the render of base services. Favor is not worth having, if it is to be propitiated or secured upon these terms."

I cannot conclude without a brief reference to Gaston's great address to the students at our university—an address treating of the proper course and conduct which becomes those who would do well in life—I commend it to every young man and woman. I quote:

On the demagogue:

"Honestly seek to serve your country, for it is glorious to advance the good of your fellow men, and thus, as far as feeble mortals may, act up to the great example of Him in whose image and likeness you are made. Seek also, by all honest arts, to win their confidence, but beware how you prefer their favor to their service. The high road of service is indeed laborious, exposed to the rain and sun, the heat and dust; while the bypath of favor has, apparently, at first, much the same direction, and is bordered with flowers and sheltered by trees, 'cooled with fountains and murmuring with waterfalls.' No wonder, then, that like the son of Abensina, in Johnston's beautiful apologue, the young adventurer is tempted to try the happy experiment of 'uniting pleasure with business, and gaining the rewards of diligence without suffering its fatigues.' But once entered upon, the path of favor, though found to decline more and more from its first direction, is pursued through all its deviations, till at length even the thought of return to the road of service is utterly abandoned. To court the fondness of the people is found or supposed to be easier than to merit their approbation. Meanly ambitious of public trust, without the virtues to deserve it; intent on personal distinction, and having forgotten the ends for which alone it is worth possessing, the miserable being, concentered all in self, learns to pander to every vulgar prejudice, to advocate every popular error, to chime in with every dominant party, to fawn, flatter, and deceive, and become a demagogue. All manliness of principle has been lost in this long course of meanness; he dare not use his temporary popularity for any purposes of public good, in which there may be a hazard of forfeiting it; and the very eminence to which he is exalted renders but more conspicuous his servility and degradation. However clear the conviction of his judgment, however strong the admonitions of his, as yet, not thoroughly stifled conscience, not these, not the law of God, nor the rule of right, nor the public good, but the caprice of his constituents, must be his only guide. Having risen by artifice, and conscious of no worth to support him, he is in hourly dread of being supplanted in the favor of the deluded multitude by some more cunning deceiver. And such, sooner or later, is sure to be his fate. At some unlucky moment, when he bears his blushing honors thick upon him—and well may such honors blush—he is jerked from his elevation by some more dextrous demagogue, and falls, unpitied, never to rise again."

And finally on our country and the Constitution:

"If it must be so, let parties and party men continue to quarrel with little or no regard to the public good. They may mystify themselves and others with disputations on political economy, proving the most opposite doctrines to their own satisfaction, and perhaps to the conviction of no one else on earth. They may deserve reprobation for their selfishness, their violence, their errors, or their wickedness. They may do our country much harm. They may retard its growth, destroy its harmony, impair its character, render its institutions unstable, pervert the public mind, and deprave the public morals. These are indeed evils, and sore evils; but the principle of life remains and will yet struggle with assured success over these temporary maladies. Still we are great, glorious, united, and free; still we have a name that is revered abroad and loved at home—a name which is a tower of strength to us against foreign wrong and a bond of internal union and harmony—a name which no enemy pronounces but with respect and which no citizen hears but with a throb of exultation. Still we have that blessed Constitution which, with all its pretended defects and all its alleged violations, has conferred more benefit on man than ever yet flowed from any other human institution—which has established justice, insured domestic tranquillity, provided for the common defense, promoted the general welfare, and which, under God, if we be true to ourselves, will insure the blessings of liberty to us and to our posterity. Surely such a country and such a Constitution have claims upon you, my friends, which cannot be disregarded. I entreat and adjure you, then, by all that is near and dear to you on earth, by all the obligations of patriotism, by the memory of your fathers who fell in the great and glorious struggle, for the sake of your sons whom you would not have to blush for your degeneracy, by all your proud recollections of the past and all your fond anticipations of the future renown of our Nation, preserve that country, to uphold that Constitution. Resolve that they shall not be lost while in your keeping, and may God Almighty strengthen you to fulfill that vow!"

Lest the hearer suspect that I have overrated my subject, let me quote the estimate of him by Mr. R. D. W. Connor, late professor of history in our university, now the National Archivist, as follows:

"Though now half forgotten, in his own day Gaston was one of the most eminent of American statesmen and jurists. Probably no other American who had so brief a public career ever enjoyed among his contemporaries such an extraordinary wide and favorable reputation for statesmanship and legal learning. Aside from a few terms in the State legislature his career as an officeholder began and ended with two terms in Congress and 11 years on the Supreme Court of North Carolina. Two-thirds of his adult life was spent as a country lawyer in private practice. Yet during those years jurists and party leaders in every section of the Union laid their problems before him and begged for light. Story and Kent consulted him on knotty questions of law; Webster and Marshall on grave constitutional problems. A Senatorship, a Cabinet position, were his for the acceptance; and in 1824 the son of Alexander Hamilton urged him to come to the rescue of the Hamiltonian conception of the Union by running for the Whig nomination in opposition to Webster and Clay for 'the Presidential choice.' To all these calls he turned a deaf ear in order to devote himself to the administration of justice on the supreme court of his native State."

In the year 1842—7 years after his greatest utterance—while yet serving as associate justice, and in the full flower of a life maintained upon the noblest level, within and without, William Gaston passed from the earthly scene which he had long adorned and from the presence of the generation which he had so nobly served. He had lived 64 years; he had wrought full half a century, for he began early in building his character and his intellectual capacity. Notwithstanding death came suddenly, his lamp was trimmed and burning. Without intimation of his end, it overtook him even as he testified to his faith in God. Had he known of its approach, it would not have been otherwise—save for dear thoughts of the mother who gave him life and faith and instructions, of friends and comrades in the beautiful and triumphant pilgrimage through the years of hours and faculties of which he had dutifully made the most, of unwavering fidelity to his church, of a humble trust in his Redeemer, which had increased even as his powers of intellect and his fame had increased, and of a happy assurance that he would live beyond the grave here in minds made better by his presence, and eternally in the blest abode of all the children of God.

He had borne witness in rare degree that man is made in the image of God, is but little lower than the angels, and by His grace we may be counted worthy to be called the sons of God.

THE AGRICULTURAL SITUATION—ADDRESS BY SENATOR BANKHEAD

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD a radio address delivered by the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] January 14, 1936, on the agricultural situation.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The decision in the Triple A case directly touches the firesides of more families than any other decision ever rendered by the Supreme Court.

Two cases involving the doctrine of States' rights, the Dred Scott decision and the Hoosac Mills case, will stand out in the history of legal jurisprudence as of paramount importance in human, social, and economic values. The Dred Scott decision led to the War between the States, with all of its devastating and horrible consequences. The Triple A decision strikes down, at least temporarily, a program which has carried financial relief and buoyant hope into the homes of millions of farmers, displacing discontent, despair, and desperation.

The ground upon which the Court elected to base its holding that Congress had no power to spend money to provide for the welfare of agriculture, if it means what it says, is more far-reaching than has yet been fully grasped by the American people. The Court held that while Congress had the power to tax and spend for the national welfare, that it could not do so in aid of agriculture through contracts with farmers, because that would invade the reserved rights of the States. The Court held that the condition of agriculture could not be a situation of national concern, but was one involving only local conditions, regardless of widespread similarity of such local conditions.

That is the same as saying that one's body covered with smallpox pits is affected with widespread local conditions, but that no general condition of the person is involved. It is truly disturbing to most thoughtful citizens, regardless of their views about the wisdom of the Triple A law, to know that our highest court has written into the lawbooks the fiat that Congress has no power to tax and spend for agriculture as a subject affecting the national welfare, and that as the regulation of agricultural production covers only local conditions the exclusive power to deal with it is reserved to 48 separate States. It holds, however, that industrial plants, located within the States, may be aided by tariff taxes under the commerce clause of the Constitution. In short, while agriculture cannot be aided under the general-welfare clause because it is composed of separate local units, industry, though composed of separate local units, does not, like agriculture, fall under the States' rights doctrine.

Representatives of the people and true supporters of the Constitution have sufficient ingenuity, courage, and patriotism to find a way to give a reasonable and just application of the letter and spirit of the Constitution to the end that the welfare of millions of farmers who produce the food and clothing for all the people of our country may be treated as affecting the national welfare.

Before the controvery can be finally settled, the doctrine of "equal rights to all and special favors to none" should, and will, be given application to agriculture, alongside of industry, finance, and commerce.

Since the deflation of 1921 and the passage of the McCumber-Fordney Tariff Act, the farmers have been knocking at the door of Congress for relief. Congress passed the "equalization" bill at the insistence of farmers' organizations. Mr. Coolidge vetoed it as unconstitutional.

Following a promise to Senator BORAH, Mr. Hoover called Congress in special session to increase tariffs on farm commodities. Industrialists swarmed down on Washington and took charge of the bill. It emerged with ineffective tariff rates on farm products, but with such highly effective rates on manufactured products that the Smoot-Hawley Act brought on a world-wide tariff war. The result was that the farmers lost the major part of their foreign markets. Instead of getting relief under that act, the farmers got more distress.

The first ray of hope given the farmers of the Nation was contained in the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

If I had the power to portray a true picture of the misery, the physical wants, the mental anguish, and soul despair in the average farm home during 1930, 1931, and 1932, and all the time progressively growing worse, I could not have any satisfaction in doing so. The recollections are too horrible to revive in a vivid way.

After nearly 3 years of administration of the Triple A, we find a different story, especially with producers of basic agricultural commodities and with the city people in the agricultural areas. With a few exceptions, farm prices have not yet reached parity—fair exchange prices with industrial commodity prices; a fair exchange between the products of the labor of those on the farm and the labor of workers in the mills, factories, and other industrial plants.

The total received by the average cotton farmer for his entire crop, a year's work, during the dark days of the depression was about $200. The average income of the cotton farmer has been more than doubled. Paltry though the increased income may be at best, it spells the difference between poverty and destitution and loss of homes on one side, and, on the other side, encouragement to labor on—not as mere "hewers of wood and drawers of water" but in a spirit of manly pride, conscious that they are free-born, independent, patriotic American citizens, carrying on the work of their pioneer ancestors, proud of their blood, devoted to their families, ambitious for their children, faithful to their churches, friendly with their neighbors, and a hospitable host to any decent stranger.

Last week the farmers, though not free from troubles, felt that they were on a safe road, which would lead them out of the wilderness of debt and despair. They looked to the future with a new hope and a new feeling of security. There had come to most of them a new outlook and a splendid satisfaction that at last their Government had recognized that agriculture, after carrying for generations the load of industrial development by buying at tax-protected prices and selling at world market prices, would henceforth be granted compensatory benefits.

Two coordinate branches of the Government, the legislative and executive, both elected by the people, approved this new balanced program in our country's economic system. The Supreme Court has refused to give its approval. The farmers grieve and look to the leaders to find a substitute for a plan condemned by the Supreme Court, that will be as good or better than the one just rejected.

Consumers in the industrial and commercial areas are rejoicing because they look for a reduction in the cost of food. Looking at immediate savings, they overlook other results of equal or greater importance. They decline to appraise the interdependence of agriculture, industry, and commerce. They forget that the purchasing power of more than half the people of the Nation is based directly upon the earning and spending power of the farmers. They totally ignore the relationship between industrial, commercial, and financial operations, and the purchasing and debt-paying power of the trade area into which business sends its capital and the products of the mills and factories of the industrial sections.

If agriculture is forced back to the conditions which prevailed before the Triple A became a law, it is certain that there will also be a return to the same conditions that then prevailed in the industrial and commercial sections.

The waybills of four railroads operating in the South show that the first year after the farm program went into effect shipments of industrial and manufactured goods originating in the 16 Northeastern States increased 39 percent. It is common knowledge that since that time the increase has been much larger. New registration of automobiles increased by 38 percent in 1934 over 1933 on farms and in towns of less than 10,000. Since that time the percentage is much higher. The farmers' money has been flowing to the industrial centers and increasing pay rolls, to the advantage of city consumers of farm products.

Protective-tariff advocates have persistently urged the farmers to support protection on the ground that, notwithstanding prices of things bought by the farmers would be higher, the farmer would be benefited in a compensating way through the increased purchasing power of industrial workers to buy farm products.

Is it fair now for buyers of farm commodities in industrial and commercial centers to insist that the benefits flowing to them from tariff taxes should be retained and that the benefits flowing to the farmers from processing taxes should be abandoned? Processing taxes increase the cost of rice, flour, hog products, and cotton textiles. Protective tariffs increase the cost of practically everything the farmer buys.

More than half of the money paid out for food goes, not to the farmers, but to individuals and firms engaged in transporting, handling, processing, storing, financing, selling, and delivering that food.

In 1932 the average retail value of bread made from 1 bushel of wheat was $4.24. The farmer got only 39 cents of it, or less than one-tenth of the money consumers were paying out for their bread. In 1935 the retail value of the same amount of bread was $5.17, an increase of 93 cents. Of that increase the farmers got 47 cents, or only slightly more than half. City workers got the balance.

Since the Supreme Court decision there have been a few reductions, but for the most part processors and distributors have hastened to tell consumers that they cannot expect big price drops, because the cost of raw material is really only a very minor part of the retail price.

If the Government aids industrial groups and sections, through tariff taxes, thereby increasing prices of their products for the benefit of those groups or sections, who can sincerely and honestly say that it is not fair to also give agricultural groups and sections the benefits of a processing tax on wheat, hogs, and cotton and rice, although the costs of those agricultural products are thereby correspondingly increased?

If Federal machinery for aiding farmers to collectively adjust their supply to reasonably fit consumptive demands is not provided, and if excessive production again reduces the agricultural areas to distressing living conditions, the city consumers who are now rejoicing at the Supreme Court decision will find factories slowing down, retail sales diminishing, bank deposits decreasing, salaries and wages reduced, and unemployment increased.

Few things could be more unfortunate than a resistance, by city consumers of agricultural products, to a program intended to promote in a reasonable way the welfare of 6,500,000 farm families and all the town and city people in the agricultural sections of our country. Such a division of the people will have in many domains of activity unwholesome and unhappy reactions and results.

Critics of this administration have denounced the "plow under" of cotton and pigs and refer to reduction in acreage planted to other crops as a "plow under" performance. You hear nothing from the same critics about the "plow under" production-control activities of industry, the scarcity doctrine, under which industry plowed into the streets 16,000,000 men and created far more scarcity of output than the farmers ever thought of doing. Who started the plowing-under practice? Under what administration did an agency of Government advise the farmers to plow under every third row? Under what administration were 19 battleships, costing $277,695,994.34, plowed under the sea?

What is Congress going to do? I feel that I can say with assurance that it will do whatever it can do to hold the gains made by the farmers. We must conform new legislation to the decision of the Supreme Court. It is believed by the friends of the farmers in Congress that a new program can be devised that will enable the farmers, if their spirit of cooperation is sufficiently strong, to avoid price-ruining surpluses, and while doing so to receive the aid of rental or benefit payments.

The time element is very important, especially to the cotton farmers. Their situation is worse than the wheat, tobacco, and hog producers. When this year's crop comes in the market, a carry-over of 8,500,000 bales will be in the warehouse. A new crop of 14,500,000 bales (and it may be 18,000,000) would provide a supply of 23,000,000 bales for a world consumption of 12,000,000. There must be action and quick action to prevent such a disaster. Let me assure the people in the Cotton Belt that their leaders here are working day and night to produce the most effective plan that can be devised under existing judicial limitation. Good progress has been made, and the work will be pursued with tireless effort. A bill will be on its way through Congress in a few days. The prices of other basic commodities will not immediately go much lower. That is due to reduction in surpluses—the adjustment of supply.

When the 1936 crops come to market without aid from the Government in acreage adjustments, surpluses will again pile up, and prices will go down. More work, more expense, and less income. Hog producers may not receive the blow until 1937, but it will jolt them at that time. The refusal by the Supreme Court to pass on the constitutionality of the Bankhead Cotton Act leaves that act in full force and effect. The operation of that act should deter noncooperating farmers from planning for large increases in cotton planting. If it serves the purpose of staying plans and steadying conditions until a new Triple A law can be enacted, carrying the usual benefit payments conditioned upon a proper balanced production on farms, there will be demonstrated full justification for the passage of the Bankhead Act, and its continuance by an overwhelming vote of the cotton producers.

THE PHILADELPHIA NAVY YARD—ADDRESS BY REAR ADMIRAL WATTS

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by Rear Admiral W. C. Watts, commandant of the League Island Navy Yard, given at the Rotary Club of Philadelphia, November 18, 1935. It was my privilege to be a guest speaker in company with Rear Admiral Ernest J. King, Chief of the Bureau of Aeronautics, at the time Admiral Watts gave this address. It shows in a clear and comprehensive manner the contribution the Navy is making to the civic life of eastern Pennsylvania, Delaware, and New Jersey, and to the development of aviation through the medium of the Naval Aircraft Factory. This speech has been read by Commander J. A. Saunders, aide to the Naval Committee, and Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], chairman, and they concur with me in the opinion that the discourse of Admiral Watts will be of interest to members of the Naval Affairs and Appropriations Committees.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Toastmaster, distinguished guests, and Rotarians of Philadelphia, when I was asked to address you on this naval aviation night sponsored by your club, I was told that my subject should be the Relationship of the Philadelphia Navy Yard to the City of Philadelphia, and I realized at once that I would consequently have to ask your indulgence in departing for a time from the aviation theme of the evening. It is true that the navy yard does include the naval aircraft factory as one of its most important units, about which more later, but I hope I may be excused if I touch also, in handling the subject assigned me on some topics having no relationship to aviation. In any event, my old friend Admiral King has so admirably treated a most vital and interesting feature of naval aviation and the next speaker will so delight us all, I am sure, on another specially important phase of the matter, that there is not much left for a representative of the navy yard here to contribute on the subject.

I take it that you are all more or less familiar in a general way with your navy yard, as you really should be as good citizens, and I do not want to embark on a complete description of it or to bore you with too many facts and figures in discussing its relationship with your great city. To set out to explain how this relationship is a very close one also seems unnecessary to me, for it must be obvious that any very large and complicated establishment, employing thousands of your citizens, must constitute a real part of the life of the community in which it is located. That such is true in the case of the navy yard is emphasized by the fact that at present there are employed within its 1,000-acre area a total of about 7,700 regular civilian employees, the vast majority of whom are citizens of Philadelphia. The monthly pay roll of these men and women is about $1,100,000, and I am sure the significance of this figure is apparent to you businessmen of Philadelphia.

There are now under construction at the yard two 10,000-ton cruisers, two destroyers, and four large sea-going Coast Guard cutters, this program representing a total expenditure in the yard of about $34,500,000. Work will soon start on another destroyer, the construction of which was recently assigned to this yard. When this work load reaches its peak about next spring it is expected that about 1,400 more men will be employed, but thereafter, unless additional work is assigned to the yard, it will be necessary to discharge large numbers of men. The yard has already initiated efforts to procure additional work, particularly the construction of the battleship which it is rumored may be included in next year's program, but I wish now to point out how important this matter also is to Philadelphia if a serious increase in its unemployed and a marked reduction in the spending power of the navy yard are to be avoided. The wisdom of active interest in this matter on the part of the rotary club and similar organizations in this city is clearly indicated.

While on the subject of unemployment, it is a pleasure to inform you of the considerable part in its relief that is being taken by the navy yard in a direct manner. We have, from the start in 1931, been very active in obtaining approval for numerous projects under first certain emergency legislation of the previous administration, and then under N. R. A., C. W. A., L. W. D., and finally now under W. P. A. and P. W. A., and at present there are employed in the yard on W. P. A. projects more than 3,100 persons obtained from the State employment office in Philadelphia, these being additional to the regular yard force above mentioned, and being employed on work particularly well adapted to existing policies and contributing greatly to improved efficiency in the yard. Since February 1931 funds have been allotted for unemployed relief projects in the naval establishments in Philadelphia in an aggregate amount of $10,400,000, of which $3,335,000 was assigned from the last appropriation of Congress for emergency relief. Our relations with the relief authorities, both of the State and of the city, have been most cordial, and we have received numerous compliments regarding the manner in which our relief projects were initiated and are being handled. The first men in Pennsylvania who were put to work under the new program last summer found relief from their distress in employment on navy-yard projects successfully pushed through to early authorization. I feel strongly that no more suitable employment could be found for these men than in this work of improving the facilities of a navy yard, and the results to us are of tremendous value.

Also the very considerable amount of new buildings being erected in the yard, particularly at the aircraft factory, by local contractors, has furnished employment on these P. W. A. projects to what now is a total of about 345 men additional to all those previously mentioned. So I hope you will feel that the yard is serving a useful purpose also in the relief of unemployment, surely a phase of its relationship to Philadelphia which appeals to us all in these critical times.

It should be remembered that workmen in nearly every mechanical trade are required in a navy yard such as the one in Philadelphia, the only yard to include an aircraft factory and a boiler laboratory, in which latter considerable service is rendered to commercial concerns by conducting highly scientific tests for them. Thus it serves as a great training institution for industry, and it has been possible to maintain the apprentice training school, a system that has had to be abandoned because of its cost by many commercial concerns in the recent hard times. Young men in this way are given an excellent opportunity with pay to receive technical and general education, and to qualify for rating in one of the many trades needed in the yard. The Philadelphia Board of Education recognizes the value of this system for young men of this community and supplies a teacher who devotes his full time to the instruction of the apprentices, a service that I am glad to have this opportunity of acknowledging with our great appreciation. Unfortunately the number who seek appointment to this school is far greater now than the quota of about 30 annually which we are authorized to accept. When a competitive examination for such appointments was recently held by the Civil Service Commission, through which agency all our regular force must be obtained, there were over 6,500 applicants, and I only wish we could take many more of them.

Philadelphia and the Delaware River has always been a great shipbuilding center from the very earliest days when William Penn gave the first impetus in that direction in 1683 by ordering the building of a small seagoing ship, the Amity, for the Free Society of Traders. The Philadelphia Navy Yard, now officially classified as primarily a building yard, earnestly strives to live up to the high traditions of ship construction of which this region may be so justly proud. We owe very much to the excellent labor market, particularly in shipbuilding trades, which has thus been built up in this vicinity, and we trust that we may always be able to serve it well.

The navy yard is also fortunate that it is situated in the very heart of the manufacturing center of the United States, facilitating greatly the expeditious procurement of all the immense amount of material and articles required to maintain a well-equipped ship and aircraft building and repair plant, and to meet the needs of the fleet. In addition to purchases made by the Navy Department in this vicinity, local purchases by the supply department of this navy yard average about $3,000,000 per annum, an item of no mean importance to business interests here. To give an idea of the extent of the business side of the yard, there were received by the supply officer during the past year material and equipment costing over $15,000,000, and his issues in those 12 months amounted in value to even more than this sum. The value of his stock in hand is usually about $26,500,000, and all these figures do not include the business of the aircraft factory, which is also very considerable, as noted later.

This being naval aviation night for this club, I want to allude particularly to this naval aircraft factory in our navy yard, which plays an important part in the general scheme for the administration of naval aviation. The factory is organized as a separate department of the yard and, through the commandant, is controlled largely by the Bureau of Aeronautics of the Navy Department, whose distinguished Chief you have had the pleasure of hearing this evening. It has its own manager and its own supply department, and is located in its own distinct area of the yard, occupying the entire eastern end of League Island. It employs about 1,400 men and women, with a pay roll of about $220,000 per month, these figures being included in those already given for the yard as a whole. The total cost of operating the factory is about $4,000,000 per year, which is its contribution to Philadelphia's economic life blood. Its supply department received articles in the past year costing about $12,000,000, and its annual issues exceeded that sum by a million and a quarter dollars. The value of its stock on hand is about $10,000,000.

The naval aircraft factory has a varied mission. It is a central depot for the service of supply, where purchase and distribution to ships and operating stations of practically all naval aeronautical supplies are centralized. It is a central repair base, for both the Navy and the Coast Guard, and a manufacturing unit for airplanes and engines, and serves as an experimental station for all types of aeronautical test and research. It is equipped with highly developed laboratories for research and testing of aeronautical engines and structures, and for many operating and flight problems. Its flight activities require an extensive modern flying field and beach. Mustin Field, while not a commercial operating field, does serve as a very useful terminus for Federal and State planes, and makes an ideal emergency landing lighted field directly on the Camden-Washington Airway.

Besides its contribution to Philadelphia's economic life, the aircraft factory, being a Government-owned institution, not operated for profit, can and does maintain the highest standards of design and workmanship in the aeronautical art. These standards of design and workmanship, determined and maintained, and the findings of its laboratories available, except in confidential matters, to the entire aviation industry, together with the trained personnel in both professional and mechanical callings which the factory constantly turns out into that industry, are invaluable contributions toward attaining practical and safe commercial and military aviation.

There are other important departments of the yard about which I would like to speak, but lack of time forbids anything but the briefest mention. The medical department, which renders medical services to the civilian employees, including W. P. A. workers, who unfortunately sometimes sustain injuries in the yard; the disbursing department, which pays all wages and salaries to civil and naval personnel and pays the bills of the yard, a monthly disbursement in all of about $1,750,000; the marine barracks and the receiving station, which are the military branches of the yard; the two large schools for young officers, the marine basic school and the naval finance and supply school—all these have their important share also in the relationship of the yard to the city.

Then, too, many think of the navy yard as the only naval unit in Philadelphia, but there are numerous others of great importance to a well-rounded naval organization and that in some cases have specially close relations with the local community, as, for example, the fine new naval hospital, where 250 veterans from this area are hospitalized, and the hydrographic office, which is of such great value to the maritime interests of the port (naval home). The naval inspection services in Philadelphia have constant contacts with many local manufacturing concerns. The marine depot of supplies employs many civilians, as does the naval ammunition depot at Fort Mifflin, and Navy and Marine recruiting offices are available here for enlisting into the regular services as many of the vast number of applicants as their regulations permit. Though the naval air station at Lakehurst has no very direct relationship to Philadelphia, it also is a unit of the fourth naval district, of which also I have the honor of being commandant, and it plays such an important part in naval aviation as the center of airship training and experiment that I cannot refrain from at least mentioning it for that reason.

All these varied naval activities in the vicinity of Philadelphia have made a considerable impression, I believe, on the consciousness of the community, and I am happy in paying a tribute tonight to the very hearty support they all receive from the municipal authorities and business interests of the city. While I feel that their presence here does contribute very materially to the welfare and prosperity of Philadelphia, we in our turn are very grateful for what the community and its government does for us in many ways. I think it may be said that Philadelphia, particularly as regards its officials and its institutions and organizations, is an unusually navy-minded city. I can speak from my own experience of the past year and a half in saying that I have had nothing but the most whole-hearted support, interest, and sympathy from all to whom I have turned for assistance in matters that frequently arise affecting both the yard and the city. Likewise, the many hospitalities and courtesies that have been extended to the Navy, both those of us stationed here and those who have come here in ships of the fleet, on the part of the city government and many of the clubs, societies, and organizations in Philadelphia, have been conspicuous and most highly appreciated.

As I took occasion to point out in another public address, Philadelphians are most unusually hospitable and kind to anyone in the Navy who comes here with any previous association with them, and I reiterate this fact now with the greatest possible emphasis, particularly as this tribute to Philadelphians was omitted from the newspaper accounts of my former address.

There are at present about 385 active-list officers of the Navy, commissioned and warrant, who are on duty at the navy yard or in Philadelphia, of whom about 140 are attending special schools in the yard or taking special postgraduate courses in educational institutions of the city. About 120 of these are quartered in the navy yard or at Fort Mifflin, though they spend much of their off-duty time uptown, but all the remainder, about 265, together with about 120 retired officers, of whom the vast majority are married, live in Philadelphia or its immediate vicinity.

This, of course, represents an almost negligible portion of the population of this great city, but from our point of view it is quite a large Navy community to be domiciled in any one locality. I mention the figures primarily, however, to show that there are considerable opportunities for contacts on the part of Philadelphians with officers of the Navy, who always welcome opportunities to fraternize and discuss affairs of mutual interest with any civilian friends with whom they may be able to make acquaintance. There are many such contacts now, I am happy to say, but the more they can be developed among those of the service who come here as strangers, the more intimate still will become the relationship between the Navy and the city, a result of mutual benefit to both, I feel sure.

The number of enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps permanently stationed in Philadelphia is rather small, about 700 in all, of whom 570 are marines, the largest single unit being at the marine barracks at the navy yard, composed of about 320 men, many of whom are attending special schools at the marine barracks and supply depot. Relatively few of these enlisted men are married, and the great majority consequently live in the yard. They are treated finely in Philadelphia and seem to make friends quickly, so that duty here is sought by many of them. At times, when crews for new ships are being assembled at the receiving barracks, there are many more enlisted men of the Navy here, and the experience in Philadelphia of these transients becomes more of a problem, as is true in the case of the crews of visiting ships. Officers of the Navy are most deeply interested in the welfare of their men, and I am always specially pleased when entertainment of any sort for the enlisted men is arranged, as has on occasions been so splendidly managed here in Philadelphia.

Another point of contact with men deeply interested in the Naval Establishment is offered by the large number of naval and marine reservists in this area. In addition to the two battalions of Naval Reserves, one in Philadelphia and one in Camden, the two Marine Corps Reserve battalions and the reserve aviation squadron, there is a great number of men here enrolled in the volunteer reserve, for all the many specialized branches of the Navy. All of these men are showing high patriotism, which is most commendable, and they and the organizations which they represent are deserving of your fullest support. I would be very remiss if not paying this tribute to this fine group of citizens of this vicinity.

It is true, also, that the naval personnel stationed in and about Philadelphia is but a small portion of the whole Navy, but nevertheless it does represent the Navy and, small though it is, it stands ready, as the Navy always and everywhere does, to be of such service to the city as it can in any emergency or calamity in which the employment of Federal force might become necessary or helpful. God forbid that such a situation may ever arise in Philadelphia, but, if it unhappily should, the representation of the Navy here can be counted on, I assure you, to live up to the best traditions of its service, so often demonstrated elsewhere under such conditions.

The very fact that the navy yard and its naval personnel are symbols of a great branch of the national defense brings out what I feel should be the most important feature in their relationship to the city of Philadelphia. If their presence here can serve to stimulate patriotic inspiration and to arouse interest among our citizens in their Navy, much good to our Nation will result. The Navy is largely dependent for its development on the attitude of public opinion toward it. Such attitude is much more apt to be favorable if the public is thoroughly familiar with the Navy, or some part of it, and acquires an interest in it and its needs and problems through direct contact with its representatives.

Philadelphians are more and more conscious all the time that a great navy yard is located nearby. Last Navy Day the unprecedented number of 93,600 visitors, by actual count, came to the navy yard, which is indeed a most gratifying proof of their interest in seeing what was arranged specially for that day. It stimulates us greatly and improves the morale of both naval and civilian personnel to feel that the public is interested in our work. If only the yard could become so well known that its interests and welfare would be a subject of frequent thought and discussion in the civilian community here, then, indeed, our relationship with Philadelphia would redound still further to the welfare of our Navy and our Nation. I know that so powerful an organization as this Rotary Club can be of great assistance in arousing such interest, and I submit such an effort to you as a fine, patriotic undertaking, a purpose for your fellowship in service, which I feel will appeal to so fine a representation of loyal Americans.

In conclusion, let me express my great pleasure in being with you all this evening and in having the privilege of addressing you. We all appreciate greatly the compliment shown to the Navy by your dedication of this occasion to a naval subject. I thank you sincerely for all this and for your attention, and you have my very best wishes for the continued success and welfare of the Rotary Club of Philadelphia.

THE MERCHANT MARINE—REPORT OF T. W. VAN METRE

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the American Merchant Marine Conference at New York City, November 18–19, 1935, appointed an expert to give some consideration to the question of the American merchant marine. Prof. T. W. Van Metre, professor of transportation of Columbia University, prepared a report on the subject. The report is brief but very illuminating. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Accordingly, T. W. Van Metre, professor of transportation, Columbia University, was engaged for this purpose. In presenting Professor Van Metre's findings herewith the committee wishes to express its sincere appreciation for his valuable services in preparing this final draft.

I. MERCHANT MARINE POLICY

The United States is a great commercial nation possessing a water-borne foreign and domestic trade greater in volume and in value than that of any other country in the world. It should have a merchant marine adequate to the needs of that commerce, a merchant marine which will not only protect that commerce and promote its normal expansion in times of peace, but which will preserve that commerce in time of war; and should this country become involved in war, a merchant marine which can be employed for national defense as an auxiliary of the Navy. The ships of this merchant marine should be built in American shipyards and they should be manned by American crews.

It is impossible to establish an arbitrary figure as to the desirable size of the merchant marine, but it does not seem unreasonable to hold that it should ultimately be sufficiently large to carry at least one-half the water-borne foreign trade of the country. This does not mean that half the Nation's export and import trade on all ocean routes with which the trade passes should necessarily be carried in American ships. On some routes, especially those to nearby countries which have little or no merchant shipping, the proportion carried in American vesels should be greater than one-half, while in other routes it seems reasonable to suppose that for many years to come at any rate, the proportion will be less.

At the present time the proportion of American foreign trade carried in American ships is considerably less than one-half. In all of the country's important trade routes there are reasonable prospects for a healthy growth of American shipping, and on several routes there is a genuine desire and need for ships which are larger, faster, and better equipped than those at present in use. The steady revival of foreign trade now in progress should make possible the expansion of the American shipping industry. The operation of ships superior in type and speed to those now employed will serve to stimulate trade.

If the United States is to have a merchant marine adequate to the needs of its commerce and suitable for use as a means of national defense, one fact must be accepted. Government aid is indispensable. The cost of construction of ships in foreign shipyards is much less than the cost in American yards, and the cost of operating ships under foreign flags is less than the cost of operating under the American flag. It is impossible for American ships to compete wholly upon a commercial basis with foreign vessels. Without Government aid American shipping now engaged in foreign trade would soon wither away, the American flag would virtually disappear from the high seas, and the merchant marine would soon revert to the conditions which prevailed before the World War.

Whatever plan of aid is employed, it should be, as nearly as possible, of a permanent character. A policy, based upon careful study of all facts and upon past experience should be adopted, and once adopted, it should be firmly adhered to. It is only under such a policy, wisely and carefully administered, that needed ships can be built and replacements and additions made as they become necessary. In other words, if permanence of the merchant marine is to be secured, there must be permanence of national policy.

In the determination of the general character of the merchant-marine policy the first question to be decided is whether governmental aid shall take the form of complete government ownership and operation of shipping or of private ownership and operation with a Government subsidy. Between those alternatives there should be no question as to the proper choice. Not only is Government ownership and operation contrary to American tradition and practice, but the lesson of experience is that its results have been highly unsatisfactory. The American merchant marine should be privately owned and privately operated.

II. FORMS OF GOVERNMENT AID

At the present time the operators of various American ship lines receive Government aid in the form of mail subventions paid in pursuance of contractual agreements with the Postmaster General. While this method of Government aid has been helpful in restoring and in encouraging the further development of the shipping industry, the opinion is general that it would be well to replace it by a system of direct subsidies—subsidies for both the construction and the operation of ships engaged in foreign trade. Should Congress decide to discontinue mail subventions and in their place give direct subsidies, it should be clearly understood that the lines now possessing mail contracts should be adequately protected in the rights acquired under their contracts. The contracts were entered into in good faith, and they should be scrupulously adhered to until their expiration in all those cases in which it is impossible to make an adjustment satisfactory to the contract lines.

The construction subsidy should equal the difference between the cost of foreign and American construction. Various ways have been suggested as to how this subsidy should be paid. One suggested method is that the Government contract for the ships, pay for them, and sell them to the operators at the price determined by the cost of construction in foreign yards. A more preferable method, however, would be for the American operator to contract with the shipbuilder, the Government contributing a sum equal to the difference between foreign and domestic cost. There are distinct advantages to be derived from the supervision and direction of the process of construction by the operator himself. Contracts for construction should be let as the result of competitive bidding, and since the Government has a definite financial interest there should be no objection to the supervision of the bidding by proper governmental authority.

The present construction loan fund should be continued at least for a few years. It is to be hoped that eventually the merchant shipping business of the United States will be established upon a basis strong and substantial enough to make it attractive to the investing public. Until this comes to pass, however, Government aid in financing the operator's share of the cost of construction seems to be essential. This loan fund should be available to the builders of ships for the coastwise trade as well as for ships engaged in foreign trade.

It should be the policy of the shipping industry to keep the merchant marine up-to-date. Obsolete vessels should be scrapped and suitable vessels built to replace them.

It has been suggested that a considerable saving in the cost of ship construction would be effected by adopting quantity production to a limited extent—that is, by constructing duplicate vessels. Unquestionably if it were possible to use standardized ships there would be a saving in construction costs. Experience seems to indicate, however, that the possibilities of standardization are not great because of the widely varying requirements of vessels traversing different routes and employed in different trades. Where a saving in cost is manifestly possible this method of construction should be adopted.

The operating subsidy granted to American ships in foreign trade should be such as to bring about equality between the American operator and his foreign competitor. The chief differences between their costs are the plainly visible items in the cost of ship operation, such as wages, supplies, equipment, insurance, repairs, and administrative expenses. There may also be differences arising from advantages possessed by the foreign operator in the form of subsidies, subventions, or some form of governmental aid or preference. None of these differences of cost are permanently the same. They fluctuate because of changes in prices, changes in wage rates, and occasionally because of aberrations of currency. The frequency with which changes may occur indicates that there should be some degree of flexibility with respect to the payment of the operating subsidy, adjustments being made wherever warranted by changed conditions.

The operating subsidy should be a matter of contract between the operator and the Government. The time of this contract should be as nearly possible the life expectancy of the ship for the operation of which the subsidy is to be paid.

III. ADMINISTRATION AND REGULATION

The success of a merchant-marine policy such as outlined above will depend in a very large measure upon the manner of its administration by the Government. The work for administering the law should not be given to any existing executive department or bureau, but to a new and independent commission or "maritime authority", such as provided for in the bill now under consideration by Congress. This authority should devote its undivided time to giving effect to the Nation's merchant-marine policy.

Replies received indicated a preference that some of the members of the authority be men who have had actual experience in some branch of the shipping industry. While it is probably too much to expect, under any system of government, that appointments to be made without regard to political affiliation, yet nothing could be worse than to have appointments a matter of political regard and favor. The merchant marine problem is not a matter of politics, and under no circumstance should it be permitted to become so.

What is more important than place of residence, politics, and perhaps even experience, is that the members of the authority be honest and impartial, and, above all, possessed with a thorough and a sympathetic understanding of the purpose of the law they are to administer. For, let it be said again, the ultimate success of any merchant-marine policy which may be adopted will depend chiefly upon its administration.

While the most important function of the proposed maritime authority will be the administration of the ship-subsidy legislation, it will also have other duties to perform.

The chief question which has arisen with regard to other possible duties of the proposed authority concerns the matter of shipping regulation: Shall the authority have regulative as well as administrative duties? Shall the regulatory functions now exercised by the Shipping Board Bureau, and such other regulative authority over shipping as may be needful, be given to this body?

The preponderance of opinion among shipping interests is in favor of giving the duties connected with shipping regulation to a maritime authority. The most valid objection to such a course arises from the fact that the administrative duties of the authority will have to do chiefly with shipping engaged in foreign trade, while such regulation as there may be will apply for the most part to vessels engaged in domestic commerce. It has been proposed that the duty of giving effect to legislation for the regulation of shipping be given to the Interstate Commerce Commission, which regulates transportation by rail and by highway. Some ship operators favor this course, but the majority are distinctly opposed to the regulation of shipping by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Should such regulation be entrusted to the maritime authority or to some other body, some provision should be made for the coordination of the work of the separate regulatory bodies to the end that harmonious policies would prevail, under which all forms of transportation would receive the recognition due to their importance and their peculiar characteristics.

It is in connection with the promoting of the development of a merchant marine that the maritime authority will find its real opportunity for noteworthy achievement. With regard to this function its authority should be broad in scope, and it should not be hampered by a too precise and meticulous definition of its powers.

Inevitably the authority must have an intimate relationship with those shipping companies that are the recipients of Government aid in the form of loans and subsidies. It should therefore have power to exercise supervision in the accounting practices of those companies even to the extent of requiring a reasonable degree of uniformity. The regulation of accounting practice need not be so extensive nor so detailed as that applied to railroads. The unsound practice of establishing a limit upon profits or of recapturing any portion of profits should by no means be adopted, though there would seem to be no valid objection to a requirement that profits above a stipulated amount should be applied to the extinction of Government loans.

IV. THE PROBLEM OF COMPETITION

There is no business in which competition is greater than in the business of shipping engaged in foreign commerce. It is a field which is open to all people of all nations.

As in other types of business enterprise in which a large proportion of the costs is fixed, and independent of the volume of business actually done, this competition, if subjected to no discipline or control, inevitably becomes destructive to the point of demoralization and ruin of the business. In recognition of this fact the Government has permitted American shipping companies to participate in steamship "conferences", having as their purposes not the elimination of all competition but the elimination of those competitive methods and practices usually designed as "cutthroat competition", the indulgence in which leads to irreparable loss and eventually to financial disaster. The practice of keeping competition within reasonable bounds by participating in conferences should be permitted to continue, and if possible it should be further developed by joint action of Government and steamship operators.

The effectiveness of conferences depends upon their stability and their permanence. Since the usefulness and value of conferences have been admitted, the steamship operators should be permitted to employ the best means known to secure their continuing stability. It seems unreasonable to permit the operators to organize a conference and then deprive them of the instruments for making the conference effective. Not only should they be enabled to establish a greater degree of solidarity among conference members but they should be placed in a position to secure the support and patronage of shippers. To this end the practice of granting deferred rebates to shippers should be legalized.

V. CONCLUSION

During the last 15 years the shipping legislation which Congress has enacted has been distinctly helpful. The Jones Act of 1920 and the Jones-White Act of 1928 indicate a desire on the part of the Government to bring about the creation and the maintenance of a merchant marine adequate to the needs of American commerce. Experience under these laws has been valuable in indicating what should be the nature of a permanent merchant-marine policy. It is a hopeful and encouraging sign that Congress evinces a willingness to enact the legislation necessary to give effect to a policy which, under wise and prudent administration, will lead to the development of a merchant marine such as the United States should possess.

The current revival of foreign commerce indicates a brighter picture for the merchant marine. Shipping depends for its employment upon commerce. As commerce grows the shipping industry becomes more thriving and prosperous. The negotiation of reciprocal-trade agreements with foreign countries under which without detriment to American industries the exports and the imports of the United States may be increased is favored by the shipping industry.

The shipping industry of the United States gives employment directly to more than 200,000 persons and indirectly to many thousands more. All of the money which the Government may appropriate for subsidies in the shipping industry is used in the employment of American labor and in the purchase of goods produced by American labor. With reasonable stimulation and aid the shipping industry will become an important factor in the restoration of economic prosperity.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief statement, to which I invite the attention of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY].

I was very anxious to have taken up and considered this morning House bill 9870, providing for the payment of adjusted-service certificates. The Senator from Oregon spoke to me and expressed a desire that the bill go over until tomorrow.

I appreciate the fact that some special orders have been entered into with regard to the session of today. I do not desire to inconvenience any Senator, nor to press the bill if certain Senators desire to read the report, and so forth. I ask the Senator from Oregon whether there is any objection to taking up the so-called "bonus" bill today for consideration.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, there has been an unbroken practice, which I have followed, of objecting to the consideration of any bill until it has lain over a day under the rule. By virtue of the unanimous-consent agreement entered into on Monday, I think probably that rule has been violated; but, in all fairness to the Members of this body, I think the bill should lie over in order that an opportunity may be had to read the report. Therefore, I shall object to the consideration of the bill today, as I should in the case of any other bill.

Mr. HARRISON. I may say to the Senator that I have no doubt the committee has complied with the rules with reference to filing the report on the bill. Not only has that been done, but we have rushed the Government Printing Office in order that the members of the Finance Committee might receive on yesterday afternoon copies of a hearing of a confidential nature and a report on the bill. So I think we have complied with the rules. Since the Senator feels as he does, however, would he object to entering into a unanimous-consent agreement that we may take up this measure immediately after the convening of the Senate at 12 o'clock noon tomorrow?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I stated specifically and definitely my objection to the consideration of the bill today, as I would in the case of any other bill that might come up under the same circumstances. I have no objection to a speedy consideration of the bill. So far as I am personally concerned, I am willing to take it up at any time after today; but I insist that it shall not come before the Senate today.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to submit a unanimous-consent request. Before doing so I hope the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Democratic leader, will ask that the Senate take a recess at the conclusion of today's session, instead of adjourning, so that we may begin the consideration of House bill 9870 at 12 o'clock tomorrow, immediately upon the convening of the Senate, if that will meet his wishes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I have no objection to entering into the arrangement suggested by the Senator from Mississippi. Does he wish the request at this time?

Mr. McNARY. Let me suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that he first propound his unanimous-consent request. Failing in that, he may propose action of the kind he has indicated.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think that would be the better course.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent that on the convening of the Senate tomorrow, if it shall recess, the Senate shall immediately proceed to the consideration of House bill 9870; that if the Senate shall adjourn, it shall proceed to the consideration of the bill immediately after the expiration of the morning hour.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business today it take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLT in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE CALENDAR

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the special order, the calendar will be called for the consideration of unobjected bills.

USURY IN THE DISTRICT—RECOMMITTAL

The first business on the calendar was the bill (S. 396) to amend section 1180 of the Code of Laws for the District of Columbia with respect to usury.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, this bill has been pending on the calendar for a long time. I think it should be either considered or recommitted.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Another bill has been introduced in lieu of Senate bill 396, and I have no objection to its being recommitted.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

BILLS, ETC., PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 213) to amend section 113 of the Criminal Code of March 4, 1909, Thirty-fifth Statutes 1109 (U. S. C., title 18, sec. 203), and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McGILL. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1506) to change the name of the Pickwick Landing Dam to Quin Dam was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 574) relative to Members of Congress acting as attorneys in matters where the United States has an interest was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The resolution (S. Res. 35) authorizing the Committee on the Judiciary to investigate certain phases of the National Recovery Act was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

REGULATION OF SMALL LOANS IN THE DISTRICT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1162) to regulate the business of making small loans in the District of Columbia, and to amend an act to regulate the business of loaning money, etc., approved February 4, 1913.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This bill has been heretofore considered by the Senate, and the amendments reported by the committee have been agreed to. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.,

DEFINITIONS

SECTION 1. (a) "Lender", as used in this act, is any individual, copartnership, firm, association, or corporation engaged in the District of Columbia in the business of lending money upon which interest, fees, and charges totaling more than 6 percent per annum upon the unpaid principal balances of such loan are paid or charged, whether with or without security of any kind, direct or collateral, tangible or intangible, except national banks, licensed bankers, credit unions established under the act approved June 23, 1932 (47 Stat. 326, c. 272, sec. 1), and under the act approved June 26, 1934 (48 Stat. 1216, c. 750), trust companies, savings banks, building and loan associations, or real-estate brokers, as defined in chapter 4, title 20, of the Code of the District of Columbia, and pawnbrokers. Pawnbrokers are those who lend money upon physical security and keep possession of such security during the period of the loan: Provided, That any of the above-excepted national banks, licensed bankers, trust companies, and savings banks may operate under the provisions of this act upon securing a license so to do.

(b) "Procurer", as used in this act, is any individual, copartnership, firm, association, or corporation engaged in the District of Columbia in the business of procuring or securing money or its equivalent for another when said person, copartnership, firm, association, or corporation is paid anything of value for the procurement of said money or its equivalent.

(c) "Person", within the meaning of this act, includes individuals, firms, partnerships, associations, and corporations.

(d) "Superintendent", as used in this act, means the Superintendent of Insurance for the District of Columbia.

(e) For definitions of "interest", "charges", and "fees", see section 12.

SEC. 2. Every lender shall obtain a license for doing business and it shall be unlawful to engage in any such business without procuring such license. A procurer shall be deemed to be and treated as the agent of the lender in all matters relating to the loan.

SEC. 3. Each license granted under the terms of this act shall date from the 1st day of November in each year and shall expire on the 31st day of the October following, unless prior thereto it be suspended, revoked, or surrendered as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 4. Applications for licenses under this act shall be made under oath to the Superintendent upon forms furnished by him, and every such application, in addition to such other information as may be required by the Superintendent, shall specify by name the person to whom the license is to be granted, and in case the applicant is a firm, partnership, or association the names of all persons comprising said firm, partnership, or association shall be given, and in case the applicant is a corporation the names of all the officers and directors and the place of incorporation of such corporation shall be given. If any change in the personnel of a firm, partnership, association, or corporation shall thereafter occur, the licensee shall forthwith notify the Superintendent of such change.

Upon the expiration of each license the licensee may apply, in the same manner and form as aforesaid, for a renewal thereof.

The Superintendent shall investigate every application, either for an original license or for any renewal thereof, and shall either approve or reject it.

SEC. 5. Upon the filing of an application for a license, if the Superintendent shall find the financial responsibility, experience, character, and general fitness of the applicant, and of the members thereof if the applicant be a firm, partnership, or association, and of the officers and directors thereof if the applicant be a corporation, such as to warrant the belief that the business will be operated honestly, efficiently, and in accordance with the provisions and purposes of this act, he shall thereupon approve the application. Upon such approval of the application by the Superintendent the applicant shall—

(a) Pay to the collector of taxes a fee as hereinafter provided in section 6;

(b) Deposit with the auditor for the District a bond as provided in section 7;

(c) Designate in writing the Superintendent as resident agent as provided in section 8.

Thereafter the Superintendent will issue the license as hereinafter provided in section 9.

SEC. 6. Upon approval by the Superintendent of any application, either for an initial license or any renewal thereof, the applicant shall pay to the collector of taxes a fee of $200: Provided, That licenses issued at any time after the beginning of the license year shall date from the 1st day of the month in which the license is issued and end on the last day of the license year above prescribed and payment shall be made of the proportionate amount of the annual fee; but no fee shall be prorated to an amount less than $50. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia may increase or decrease the above license fee as the cost of supervision, inspection, and regulation may require.

SEC. 7. Upon approval by the Superintendent of any application, either for an original license or any renewal thereof, the applicant shall deposit with the auditor for the District of Columbia a bond in due form in the penal sum of $2,000 with two or more sureties or duly authorized surety company to be approved by the Commissioners. The bond shall be payable to the District of Columbia and shall be conditioned that the person applying for the license will comply with the provisions of this act and with any regulations promulgated hereunder and shall pay all damages occasioned by reason of any misstatement, misrepresentation, fraud, or deceit, or any unlawful act or omission of any licensed person, made, committed, or omitted in the business conducted under such license, or caused by any other violation of the said act or regulations in carrying on the business for which such license is granted. One or more recoveries upon such bond shall not vitiate the same, but it shall remain in full force and effect: Provided, however, That the aggregate amount of all such recoveries shall not exceed the full amount of the bond. Upon the commencement of any action or actions against the surety upon any such bond for a sum or sums aggregating or exceeding the amount of such bond the Superintendent may require a new and additional bond in like amount as the original one, which shall be filed with the auditor for the District within 10 days of the demand thereof. Failure to file such bond within the prescribed time shall constitute cause for the revocation of the license theretofore issued. Any suit or action against the surety on any bond required by the provisions of this section shall be commenced within 1 year from the accruing of the cause of action thereon.

If at any time, in the opinion of the Superintendent, the sureties, or any of them, shall become irresponsible, the person holding such license shall, upon notice from the Superintendent, give a new bond, and failure to give a new bond within 10 days after such notice shall operate, in the discretion of the Superintendent, as a revocation of such license.

SEC. 8. Upon the approval of an application by the Superintendent, the applicant shall, in writing, appoint the Superintendent the true and lawful attorney of such applicant, upon whom all lawful process in any action or legal proceeding against him (the said applicant) may be served, and therein shall agree that any lawful process against him which may be served upon him or his said attorney, as herein provided, shall be of the same force and validity as if served upon the applicant, and the authority thereof shall continue in force irrevocably so long as any liability of the applicant in the District shall remain outstanding. Such process shall be served by leaving the same with the Superintendent or his deputy, and service thereof upon such attorney shall be deemed service upon the principal. The Superintendent shall forthwith forward such process by mail to the applicant. The deposit by the Superintendent or his deputy of such process sent by registered mail in a sealed envelope, postage prepaid, in the United States mail and service of such process, shall not be effectual until the same has been so mailed and received by the applicant, and registered receipt shall be prima facie evidence of the notice of service to such applicant. Such appointment shall be valid and existing not merely for the 1-year term of the license but until the license of the applicant and the renewals thereof are surrendered, discontinued, or revoked. Such written appointment shall be deposited with the Superintendent.

SEC. 9. Upon approval of an application, and upon receipt of evidence of the payment to the collector of taxes of the required fee, and the deposit with the auditor of the required bond, and the deposit of the appointment of the Superintendent as resident agent, the Superintendent shall issue the license as applied for and approved. Licenses shall be prepared in duplicate, one copy of which shall remain with the Superintendent and one copy shall be transmitted to the applicant. The latter copy shall be printed in conspicuous size and color and shall be impressed with a seal approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. This copy of the license shall be kept conspicuously posted in the place of business of the licensee and shall not be transferable or assignable. Such license shall remain in full force and effect until it is surrendered by the licensee or revoked or suspended as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 10. No more than one place of business shall be maintained under one license, but nothing herein contained shall prevent the Superintendent from directing the issuance of more than one license to the same licensee for different places of business upon compliance with all provisions of this act governing an original issuance of a license.

No change in the place of business of the licensee shall be made without the approval of the Superintendent.

SEC. 11. Every licensee shall—

(1) Deliver to the borrower at the time a loan is made a statement upon which there shall be printed in the English language, all in type not smaller than 8 point, (a) a copy of sections 11 (this section), 12, and 21 of this act; (b) in clear and distinct terms the amount of the loan, the date on which it is made, the date of its maturity, the nature of the security, if any, for the loan; (c) the name and address of the borrower or borrowers and of the lender and the procurer (if any); (d) the agreed rate of interest and the charges and fees, showing clearly by items the nature of the charges and fees; and (e) any other information which the Superintendent may require to be so given.

(2) Give the borrower a plain and complete receipt for all payments made on account of any such loan at the time such payments are made, specifying the amount applied to interest or charges and the amount, if any, applied to principal, and stating the unpaid principal balance, if any, of such loan.

(3) Permit payment to be made in advance in any amount on any contract of loan at any time, but the licensee may apply such payment first to all interest in full at the agreed rate to the date of such payment, and any charge or fee not previously credited or paid.

(4) Upon payment of the loan, stamp indelibly every obligation signed by the borrower with the word "paid" or "canceled", and release any mortgage, restore any security or pledge, cancel and return any note, and cancel and return any assignment given to the licensee by the borrower.

SEC. 12. (A) "Interest" as used in this act means an amount of money or other thing of value required to be paid as compensation for the loan of money or credit. It includes any and all charges, fees, expenses, demands, discounts, commissions, brokerage, bonuses, including notarial and examination fees, and all other charges of any character made, directly or indirectly, for any purpose by any lender, procurer, appraiser, or any other person in connection with the lending or procuring of money or credit, except the fees hereinafter specified.

The total interest (as above defined) which may be charged or received by a lender, his agents, representatives, officers, and employees (total for all such persons concerned in the loan) in respect to any loan shall not exceed 2 percent per month on the monthly unpaid principal balances of the loan. Interest shall not be compounded. Neither interest nor fees shall be deducted from the principal of the loan.

(B) "Fees" as used in this act means the fees specified in the following schedule.

For the purposes of determining the fees allowable hereunder, loans are divided into three classes and the fees allowable are as follows:

(a) Loans of $35 or less for a period of 30 days or less without collateral (so-called "character loans"). In these loans a fee not to exceed $1 (in addition to interest and charges as above defined) may be charged and received for a credit report or investigation, but only if such report or investigation is actually secured or made by the lender or procurer. In these loans a total of 50 cents as interest and other charges (in addition to the $1 just referred to) may be allowed on each such loan.

(b) Loans of any amount for more than 30 days and loans of more than $35 for 30 days or less, without collateral (so-called "character loans"). In these loans fees not to exceed $3 (in addition to interest and charges as above defined) may be charged and received for credit reports or investigations at the rate of $1 per report or investigation, but only if such reports or investigations are actually secured or made by the lender or procurer. Such credit reports or investigations may concern either the borrower or proposed endorsers.

(c) Loans on collateral. On these loans the following fees may be charged and received:

For the recording of chattel mortgage, not to exceed $1;

For the examination of titles, not to exceed $3.

Insurance premiums actually paid for insurance protection of the collateral security where such protection is necessary and does not already exist. The insurance which the borrower may be required to take shall not exceed the amount necessary to protect the total amount of the loan.

(C) No interest or fee of any kind or description, in addition to the foregoing schedule, may be charged or received by any lender, procurer, or any other person in connection with any loan.

Such fees as are allowed under the foregoing schedule may be charged only upon the original loan and may not be charged upon any renewal thereof.

The borrower shall be permitted to repay the full amount of the loan, with the interest, fees, and charges due, at any time, and in the event of such payment shall not be charged interest on the loan beyond the date of the payment. Likewise the borrower shall be permitted to pay in advance of the date specified in the contract of loan one or more installments and in the event of such greater payments no further interest on that amount so paid shall be charged or received.

In cases of loans upon collateral security where the physical property supporting the collateral remains in the possession of the borrower (such as loans upon automobiles or other personal property) and the borrower is in default on the due date and the lender has a right to repossession of the property and does so repossess the property, the lender may charge and receive the actual fees incurred and expended by him in such repossession, but only in the amount so actually expended by him and actually paid by him to some other concern for the services rendered.

SEC. 13. The provisions and restrictions of this act shall be applicable to loans not in excess of $300, and whenever a licensee under this act shall make any loan in excess of $300, interest and charges on the said excess shall be governed by other law.

SEC. 14. Every licensed lender shall keep a register approved by the Superintendent in which shall be entered, accurately and truthfully, in the English language—

(a) The name of every person granted a loan.

(b) The amount of such loan.

(c) Interest charged or received, showing both rate and amount.

(d) Charges, by items, made or received.

(e) Fees, by items, charged or received.

(f) Whether the loan was made directly or if at instance of a procurer and the name of such procurer.

(g) Endorsements, if any.

(h) Collateral accepted, if any.

SEC. 15. Every licensee shall keep in his place of business such books, accounts, and records as will enable the Superintendent to determine whether such licensee is complying with the provisions of this act and of the regulations hereunder. Each licensee shall preserve such books and records, including cards used in any card system, for at least 2 years after making the final entry on any loan recorded therein.

Every licensee shall, on or before the 1st of each February, file a report with the Superintendent, giving such information as the Superintendent may require concerning the operation of the licensed business during the preceding calendar year. Such report should be made under oath, and upon a form prescribed by the Superintendent, and an analysis and recapitulation of such report shall be published once each year, at a time to be fixed by the Superintendent. The Superintendent may require under oath, and on a form prescribed by him, additional special reports as he may deem necessary for proper supervision of the business of the licensee.

SEC. 16. The Superintendent may, as often as he may determine, personally or by a duly designated agent, investigate the loans and business and examine the books, accounts, records, and files used therein of every licensee, and for that purpose the Superintendent, or his duly designated agent, shall have free access to the offices and places of business, books, accounts, papers, records, files, safes, vaults, or any depositary of all such licensees.

SEC. 17. The Superintendent may forthwith revoke any license issued hereunder if, after investigation and hearing, he finds that—

(1) The licensee has failed to maintain in effect the bond or bonds required under the provisions of this act; or

(2) The licensee has failed to comply with any demand, ruling, or requirement of the Superintendent lawfully made hereunder; or

(3) The licensee has violated any provision of this act or of the regulations hereunder; or

(4) Any fact or condition exists which, if it had existed at the time of the original application for license, would have warranted the Superintendent in refusing to approve the application; or

(5) The licensee has, in respect to the licensed business, committed any act which may be deemed to be contrary to public policy.

The Superintendent may, without notice or hearing, suspend any license for a period not exceeding 20 days, pending investigation.

The Superintendent may revoke or suspend the particular license with respect to which the grounds for revocation or suspension may exist, or, if he shall find that such grounds are of general application to all the places of business operated by such licensee, he may revoke or suspend all the licenses issued to such licensee or such licensees to which the grounds apply, as the case may be.

Whenever the Superintendent shall suspend or revoke any license issued hereunder, he shall forthwith execute in duplicate a written order to that effect, one copy of which shall be forwarded to the licensee, and one copy retained in the office of the Superintendent. Any order of suspension or revocation may be reviewed by the Commissioners upon application duly made to and granted by them. Any such application for review of any action of the Superintendent taken under the provisions of this act shall be made within 30 days from the date of such order of said Superintendent.

Where any license has been revoked, no such licensee shall be entitled to apply for further license for a period of 6 months. Where the revoked license has been issued to a copartnership or corporation no member of said copartnership or corporation nor officer or director shall be entitled to apply for a license for a period of 6 months.

The Superintendent may reinstate any suspended licensee or, after the expiration of 6 months, issue new licenses to a licensee whose license or licenses shall have been revoked, if no condition then exists which would warrant the Superintendent in refusing originally to issue such license.

Any licensee may surrender any license by delivering to the Superintendent the licensee's copy of the license and a written notice that he thereby surrenders said license. Such surrender shall not in any way affect any civil or criminal liability for acts committed prior to such surrender.

No revocation, suspension, or surrender of any license shall in any way affect the obligation of any lawful contract between any licensee and any borrower.

SEC. 18. No business for which a license is issued hereunder shall be conducted in any residential district within the District of Columbia.

SEC. 19. No licensee conducting any business permitted by this act shall publish or cause to be published any false or fraudulent or misleading information, representation, notice, or advertisement, nor shall such licensee give any false information, or make any false promises or false statements concerning the lending or procuring of money as provided herein.

SEC. 20. The making of any contract for or relating to the lending or the borrowing of money or credit in which any term, condition, or part thereof, whether relating to principal, interest, charges, fees, or other terms, and whether expressed or implied, verbal or written, is in violation of any provision of this act, or of any part of any provision thereof, is hereby expressly forbidden and prohibited and, if made, such entire contract and every part thereof shall be deemed to be wholly illegal and void as in violation hereof.

SEC. 21. This act is to be construed liberally to effect its intent and purpose. Any subterfuge, device, plan, scheme, or individual act (including among other things the adjustment or arrangement of the period or amount of a loan) designed or used to evade or avoid any of the provisions of this act is hereby prohibited and declared to be in violation hereof. The transferring of loans or the referring of borrowers from one lender to another, upon the suggestion of the lender or his representative, for the purpose or with the effect of avoiding any provision of this act (including particularly those relating to renewals or the maximum amounts of loans), and any agreement, understanding, or practice of lenders for such purpose or with such effect, shall be deemed to be a violation of this act.

SEC. 22. Any person, copartnership, firm, association, or corporation violating any of the provisions of this act or the regulations hereunder, shall, on conviction thereof in the police court of the District of Columbia, be punished by a fine of not more than $200 or imprisonment for not more than 30 days, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 23. Prosecutions for violations of any of the provisions of this act or the regulations hereunder shall be on information in the police court of the District of Columbia by the corporation counsel for the District of Columbia or any of his assistants.

SEC. 24. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and empowered to make all rules and regulations necessary in their judgment for the enforcement of this act, and not inconsistent therewith.

SEC. 25. Each section of this act, and every provision of each section, is hereby declared to be an independent section or provision, and the holding of any section or provision of any section to be void, ineffective, or unconstitutional, for any cause whatever, shall not be deemed to affect any other section or provision thereof.

SEC. 26. The act entitled "An act to regulate the business of loaning money on security of any kind by persons, firms, and corporations other than national banks, licensed bankers, trust companies, savings banks, building-and-loan associations, and real-estate brokers in the District of Columbia", approved February 4, 1913, as amended, is hereby repealed insofar as its provisions are inconsistent with the provisions of this act and except insofar as it provides for the regulation of businesses not covered by this act.

SEC. 27. This act shall become effective 90 days after the date of its enactment and shall not affect loans made before the passage of this act which have not matured before the effective date of this act.

SEC. 28. This act may be cited as the "District of Columbia Small Loan Act."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1820) to provide warrant officers of the Coast Guard parity of promotion with warrant officers of the Navy was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

REGULATION OF COMMERCE IN FIREARMS

The bill (S. 3) to regulate commerce in firearms was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I think there should be an explanation of this bill. I have not had an opportunity of studying the report. I shall be obliged if the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] will make a brief explanation of the bill.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the Attorney General has been very insistent on better regulation of commerce in firearms. After due consideration of his proposals and the proposals of the Special Committee on Crime, which investigated the subject, this bill was worked out.

I may say that all these bills were opposed by the American Rifle Association and the American Revolver Association; but there is full agreement as to this particular bill, which simply provides that firearms which are shipped in interstate commerce must be shipped under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce, and that only those persons who are licensed to ship in interstate commerce or who are given a special permit by the Department of Commerce may ship such arms. The bill has no reference whatever to the possession of firearms. It has to do simply with the transportation of firearms in interstate commerce.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, let the bill go over. It is a pretty far-reaching measure, and I wish to have a chance to study it.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina withhold his objection for a moment? I know the sincere desire of the Senator from South Carolina not to have any injustice done. I beg of him that he will shortly read the bill to be sure that there is not an infringement of the rights of individuals in the various States.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I have no desire to be captious about it, but I know there is a trend here to restrict trading in firearms, and I prefer to study the principle involved before I give my consent to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I can quite understand the Senator's attitude; but of course we realize that firearms, particularly small arms, revolvers, are possessed in larger numbers in the United States than anywhere else. Since the war a million or more have been imported from abroad, and they are found in the hands of juvenile delinquents. This bill has no reference whatever to the individual in the State, on the farm, or in the home.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the Senator is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained. The clerk will call the next order of business on the calendar.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 7680) to amend the act of May 18, 1934, providing punishment for killing or assaulting Federal officers was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3072) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, was announced as next in order.

Mr. NYE. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2665) to change the name of the Department of the Interior and to coordinate certain governmental functions was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMITH. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2969) to authorize the deportation of criminals, to guard against the separation from their families of aliens of the noncriminal classes, to provide for legalizing the residence in the United States of certain classes of aliens, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. RUSSELL. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

LONGSHOREMEN'S AND HARBOR WORKERS' COMPENSATION ACT—RECOMMITTAL

The bill (S. 2791) to amend the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act was announced as next in order.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, I move that this bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, as certain amendments are to be offered.

The motion was agreed to.

CLAIMS OF ALTA MELVIN AND TOMMY MELVIN

The bill H. R. 4436, an act conferring jurisdiction upon the United States District Court for the Western District of Washington to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claims of Alta Melvin and Tommy Melvin, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the United States District Court for the Western District of Washington to hear, determine, and render judgment, as if the United States were suable in tort, upon the claims of Alta Melvin and her son, Tommy Melvin, both of Seattle, Wash., for damages resulting from injuries received by them when the automobile in which they were riding was struck by a United States Army truck from Fort Lawton, Wash., at the intersection of Twenty-eighth Place West and Gilman Avenue in Seattle, Wash., on June 21, 1932.

SEC. 2. Suit upon such claims may be instituted at any time within 1 year after the enactment of this act, notwithstanding the lapse of time or any statute of limitations. Proceedings for the determination of such claims, and appeals from and payment of any judgment thereon, shall be in the same manner as in the cases of claims over which such court has jurisdiction under the provisions of paragraph 20 of section 24 of the Judicial Code, as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, Calendar No. 1232, being Senate bill 1102, of the same title and to the same purport, will be indefinitely postponed.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1826) for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service to include employees in the legislative branch was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3160) to amend the law relating to residence requirements of applicants for examination before the Civil Service Commission was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 8555) to develop a strong American merchant marine, to promote the commerce of the United States, to aid in national defense, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COPELAND. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

WILLIAM MITCHELL

The bill (S. 2804) to authorize the payment of retired pay to William Mitchell was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is hereby authorized to place the name of William Mitchell upon the unlimited list of retired officers in the United States Army as a colonel and to pay to the said William Mitchell the retired pay that he would be entitled to if now upon the active list of the Army by reason of the distinguished service rendered to his country by the said William Mitchell, who enlisted as a private on May 14, 1898, and advanced through all the grades to the rank of brigadier general and resigned his commission on February 1, 1926.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2134) to prohibit employers from influencing the vote of their employees in national elections was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over, Mr. President, in the absence of explanation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

ESTABLISHMENT OF AIR CORPS TECHNICAL SCHOOL

The bill (S. 3398) to establish the Air Corps Technical School and to acquire certain land in the State of Colorado for use as a site for said Air Corps Technical School and as an aerial gunnery and bombing range for the Army Air Corps was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill is the special order and will be passed over.

VACATIONS TO GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

The bill (H. R. 8458) to provide for vacations to Government employees, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask that this bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Civil Service. I do not see the chairman of the committee present, but I am sure that action would meet with his approval.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, as I understand, this bill and the following one have been thoroughly considered by the committee. Everybody interested has had a chance to study the bills, and I am frank to say, with all due courtesy to the Senator from Tennessee, that I believe the majority of the Senate are in favor of the bills. I object, at the moment, to recommittal of the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, several of the departments, notably the Navy Department, have requested that they be heard in regard to the measure. They have not been heard; and I believe it will probably expedite a hearing on the bill if it be recommitted to the committee. I move that the bill be recommitted.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I have to raise the question of order. Under the unanimous-consent agreement under which we are proceeding a motion to recommit is not in order unless the Senate takes up the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I withdraw the motion, and object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

SICK LEAVE FOR CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES

The bill (H. R. 8459) to standardize sick leave and extend it to all civilian employees, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

ESTATE OF JOHN GELLATLY, DECEASED

The bill (S. 3409) for the relief of the estate of John Gellatly, deceased, and/or Charlyne Gellatly, individually, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I desire to have the attention of the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], the author of the bill. This measure involves considerations which, I think, were not brought to the notice of the committee, and to which the committee should have an opportunity of giving attention. I ask the Senator from New York if he will consent to a recommittal of the bill to the Committee on Claims, which reported it, in order that the representatives of the Smithsonian Institution and others may be heard on the bill. I myself should like to have an opportunity of appearing. I think it is fair to state to the Senator from New York that I am opposed to the bill. I feel, in any event, that it should be considered more fully by the committee.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, of course, I wish to accede to the request of the Senator from Arkansas. The surrogate judge in New York City had a very strong conviction that if the property involved were in the possession or within the jurisdiction of the court, he would under no circumstances permit the transfer to the Smithsonian Institution, because it was the property of the widow. However, I have no objection to the recommitment of the bill, with the understanding that at the time of the hearing there shall be a full opportunity for those of us who believe the bill is meritorious to be heard. But since the Smithsonian Institution has a direct monetary interest in this matter, and feels it has not been heard and its case presented, I shall not object to the recommittal of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENT OF PLANT QUARANTINE ACT OF AUGUST 20, 1912

The bill (S. 2983) to amend the Plant Quarantine Act of August 20, 1912, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will not the Senator from Washington explain the purpose of this bill? I make the inquiry for the reason that I received a letter noting some objection to the bill.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, this bill makes mandatory the provisions of the old act of 1912 under the terms of which the Secretary of Agriculture was given the discretionary right to prohibit the importation of narcissus and iris bulbs into the country on the ground that they were pest-infested.

In 1923, under the old act, the Secretary put into effect an order which prohibited the importation of these bulbs. From 1923 to 1933 various reports were made by the Department of Agriculture, which are quoted in the report of the committee, showing that it was impossible to inspect these bulbs against infestation. In other words, the insect gets into the middle of the bulb, and in order to find out whether or not a bulb is infested the entire bulb has to be destroyed. The committee has set forth numerous quotations from the Department of Agriculture from 1926, at the time the act went into effect, until 1933, saying that the importation of these bulbs should be prohibited. Despite that record, in 1935 the Department issued an order that commencing December 15, 1936, the regulation would be removed, and that the bulbs could be imported into this country.

The purpose of this bill is simply to put into effect the order which was effective from 1926, and will be effective until December 15, 1936, under the present order of the Department.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I yield.

Mr. KING. It seems to me that where authority is given to the Secretary of Agriculture to issue an order absolutely barring the importation of iris, that would be satisfactory. If, as the Senator states, it is impossible to determine whether or not a bulb is infested, obviously the Secretary of Agriculture has authority under the act to order importations prohibited.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I would agree with the Senator if the record did not disclose the facts as they exist. I say frankly that this bill does not meet with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture. He takes the position that it is now possible to make these inspections. Against that we submit, in the committee report, a record of over a 10-year period in which they were constantly making the statement, every time the question came up, that it was not possible to protect against this infestation.

In addition to that, the State departments of agriculure of both the States of Oregon and Washington have filed reports setting forth definitely their view that at the present time it is not possible to protect without an absolute barring—that it is not possible to inspect these bulbs.

The bulbs came into a port. In order to inspect them each bulb must be completely opened. After the bulbs reach the fields, if they are not opened, and if there is an insect in them, the infestation spreads, and it is impossible to stop the spread after that time. I say frankly that there is dispute with the Department of Agriculture, but I am basing my argument entirely on a record which the Department of Agriculture made over a period of 10 years, as late as July 20, 1933, when the Chief of the Bureau of Entomology and Plant Quarantine, United States Department of Agriculture, said this:

Classes of plants that we know are likely to bring in pests from specific localities should be definitely excluded.

That statement was made in reference to a request for a ruling upon iris and narcissus bulbs, and it was about such bulbs that he was talking at that particular time. I see no reason for a change of attitude on the part of the Department of Agriculture. There is nothing in the record which supports it. Their own record supports the contrary position. The state departments of both Oregon and Washington say that it is absolutely impossible to control this pest unless these bulbs are absolutely barred.

Mr. RUSSELL. I have received some letters objecting to the passage of this bill. I know nothing whatever of the merits of the measure, but, in view of these letters, until I may have an opportunity to investigate the complaints filed with me, I shall be compelled to request that the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 3420) to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, by providing for the regulation of the transportation of passengers and property by aircraft in interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 6402) for the relief of Julia M. Crowell was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

BILL INDEFINITELY POSTPONED

The bill (S. 3030) granting the consent of Congress to the Rockland-Westchester Hudson River Crossing Authority, State of New York, to construct, maintain, and operate a highway bridge and causeway across the Hudson River between a point in the vicinity of the village of Nyack, Rockland County, and the village of Tarrytown, Westchester County, N. Y., was announced as next in order.

Mr. COPELAND. I ask that this particular bill be indefinitely postponed. The question is taken care of in another bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be indefinitely postponed.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1645) to provide for the creation of a commission to examine clear height of bridge to be constructed over Hudson River was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1424) to amend the Packers and Stockyards Act of 1921 was announced as next in order.

Mr. CAREY. I ask that the bill be passed over.

Mr. LEWIS. I ask that the bill be passed over so it may be examined a little further. Does the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] desire to have it taken up at this time?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I make the point of order that objections have been made to the present consideration of the bill, so it goes over automatically.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2820) to amend the Public Works Appropriation Act of 1935 making available not to exceed $1,000,000 for the alteration of carriages of three thousand two hundred 75-millimeter guns now in storage was announced as next in order.

Mr. COPELAND. I wish to object to the consideration of my own bill. I am not satisfied with the amendments made to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

EXTENSION OF PUBLIC-SCHOOL BUILDINGS, NORTH DAKOTA

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3093) to provide funds for cooperation with Sanish School District No. 1, Mountrail County, N. Dak., for extension of public-school buildings to be available for Indian children, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments, on page 1, line 3, after the words "authorized to be", to strike out "expended, from any moneys now available and applicable, or that may become applicable hereafter available, for construction under provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act, approved June 16, 1933" and to insert in lieu thereof "appropriated, from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated"; and on page 2, line 7, after the word "school", to strike out "district, subject to such further conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior" and to insert in lieu thereof "district: Provided further, That this appropriation shall be reimbursed in not more than 30 years, without interest, either through reducing the annual Federal tuition payments for the education of Indian pupils attending such school, by the acceptance of Indian pupils in such school without cost to the United States, or in such other manner as the Secretary of the Interior may direct: And provided further, That plans and specifications shall be furnished by local or State authorities, without cost to the United States, and upon approval thereof by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, work shall proceed under the direction of local or State officials, payment therefor to be made monthly on the basis of work in place and upon vouchers approved by a responsible official of the Indian Service", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $30,000 for the purpose of cooperating with Sanish District No. 1, Mountrail County, N. Dak., for extension and improvement of school buildings: Provided, That the expenditure of any moneys so appropriated shall be subject to the condition that the schools maintained by said district shall be available to all the Indian children of the district on the same terms, except as to payment of tuitions, as other children of said school district: Provided further, That this appropriation shall be reimbursed in not more than 30 years, without interest, either through reducing the annual Federal tuition payments for the education of Indian pupils attending such school, by the acceptance of Indian pupils in such school without cost to the United States, or in such other manner as the Secretary of the Interior may direct: And provided further, That plans and specifications shall be furnished by local or State authorities, without cost to the United States, and upon approval thereof by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, work shall proceed under the direction of local or State officials, payment therefor to be made monthly on the basis of work in place and upon vouchers approved by a responsible official of the Indian Service.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 3393) to create a Federal Board of Foreign Trade was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that the bill be passed over.

GRAIN FUTURES ACT

The bill (H. R. 6772) to amend the Grain Futures Act to prevent and remove obstructions and burdens upon interstate commerce in grains and other commodities by regulating transactions therein on commodity futures exchanges, to limit or abolish short selling, to curb manipulation, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I move that House bill 6772 be recommitted to the Committee on Agriculture as there are many features of the bill to be considered and it ought not to be acted upon by the Senate at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. McNARY. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to the recommittal of the bill. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I understood there was objection. The Senator from Illinois moved that the bill be recommitted. That was objected to. The bill is just about to pass. If the Senator does not desire it to be considered, he will have to make objection.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, under the circumstances, of course I shall ask that the bill be passed over. However, I understand from the highest administrative sources that recommendation has been made that this bill be recommitted for ironing out certain provisions which ought not to be in the bill. At the proper time I, as chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, will move that the bill be recommitted.

I now ask that the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

RESEARCH AND EXPERIMENT STATION, SALT LAKE CITY

The bill (S. 2424) to provide for the establishment and maintenance of a central research and experiment station of the Bureau of Mines at Salt Lake City, Utah, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think there should be an explanation of that bill by its author.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon and other Senators are aware of the fact that in Pittsburgh, for instance, there is a station which is devoted to the examination of coals and their byproducts. The station is maintained by the Government. It is very valuable because of the scientific information that is thus obtained and disseminated throughout the United States. In the West there is no such station dealing with the iron ores and metallic reserves of that great region.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2424) to provide for the establishment and maintenance of a central research and experiment station of the Bureau of Mines at Salt Lake City, Utah, which had been reported from the Committee on Mines and Mining, with amendments, on page 1, line 5, before the word "research", to insert "central", and in line 10, after the word "substances", to strike out "(including coal, oil, gas, and the hydrocarbons)", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to establish and maintain in Salt Lake City, Utah, under the Bureau of Mines, a research and experiment station, the province and duty of which shall be to handle, and to disseminate information concerning, major problems of basic interest arising in connection with (1) inquiries and investigations into the mining, preparation, treatment, and utilization of ores and other mineral substances; and (2) the improving of conditions in the mining, quarrying, metallurgical, and other mineral industries; safeguarding life among employees; preventing unnecessary waste of resources; and other matters contributing to the advancement of these industries.

SEC. 2. The present experiment station of the Bureau of Mines at Salt Lake City, together with all its powers and duties, official records and papers, property, personnel, and appropriations made or allocated for its use, shall be transferred to the station established under the provisions of section 1.

SEC. 3. For the purposes of this act there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $50,000 for each fiscal year thereafter.

SEC. 4. The Secretary of the Interior is authorized, in his discretion, to cooperate with the State of Utah in carrying out the provisions of this act and for such purpose to accept lands, buildings, or other contributions from said State.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the establishment and maintenance of a research and experiment station of the Bureau of Mines at Salt Lake City, Utah."

INVESTIGATION OF PRODUCTION COST OF PULPWOOD

The resolution (S. Res. 195) directing the Tariff Commission to investigate the production costs of wood pulp or pulpwood was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the United States Tariff Commission is directed, under the authority conferred by section 336 of the Tariff Act of 1930, and for the purposes of that section, to investigate the differences in the costs of production of the following domestic articles and of any like or similar foreign articles: Wood pulp or pulpwood.

Mr. ROBINSON subsequently said: I ask unanimous consent that Senate Resolution 195, which was just agreed to, be reconsidered, with a view to investigating the question. I recall that the resolution was adopted once before, and I should like to refresh my memory regarding it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I note the absence of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. Will not the Senator from Arkansas wait until the Senator from Idaho comes into the Senate Chamber before he makes his request?

Mr. ROBINSON. I am compelled to leave the Chamber at 2 o'clock, so I make the request now, and if it is objected to I shall give notice of a motion to reconsider. In view of the procedure we are following—the resolution was just agreed to by unanimous consent—I could have objected; but my attention was diverted at the moment the resolution was taken up and adopted.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, what is the calendar number of the resolution?

Mr. ROBINSON. It is Calendar No. 1499, a resolution directing the Tariff Commission to investigate the production costs of wood pulp or pulpwood. I recall that this resolution was agreed to on a previous occasion, and that, upon the statement I made, the Senator from Idaho consented to a reconsideration of the resolution.

I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the resolution was agreed to be reconsidered.

Mr. McNARY. For the purpose of further consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ROBINSON. To restore it to its place on the calendar.

Mr. McNARY. Is the request made in order that opportunity be given for further investigation of the purposes of the resolution?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; and to take it up in a more orderly way when it can be discussed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the vote by which Senate Resolution 195 was agreed to is reconsidered, and the resolution is restored to the calendar.

INTERNATIONAL MANUFACTURERS' SALES CO. OF AMERICA

The bill (H. R. 4178) for the relief of the International Manufacturers' Sales Co. of America, Inc., A. S. Postnikoff, trustee, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like an explanation of this bill. The amount involved is very large.

Mr. LOGAN. I call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the fact that the Seventy-third Congress, after consideration, passed the same bill that we now have before us. Then at the previous session of the present Congress the Senate again passed the bill. When it went over to the House, the House had a separate bill on the same subject providing for the same relief. The House passed its bill, which increased the amount some two or three hundred thousand dollars, as I recall. When the bill came back to the Senate and was referred to the Committee on Claims, the Committee on Claims adhered to its previous findings and offered an amendment reducing the amount to conform to the action which the Senate had heretofore taken. If the amendment shall be adopted and the bill shall be passed, it may have to go to conference.

Mr. KING. May I inquire whether the State Department or the War Department or Navy Department—and I assume that perhaps one or the other of the latter departments has some interest in this matter—has recommended the passage of the bill?

Mr. LOGAN. As I recall, the State Department has considered it heretofore. May I say to the Senator from Utah that there has never been any controversy, so far as I know, about the justice of the claim. The amount is large. The corporation was taken over, as the Senator may recall, by a war board created during the war; shoes were turned over to it and sold and distributed through the agents of the war board, and by reason of the order of President Wilson it was not possible for them to collect this money. The Senate committee held lengthy hearings upon the question and we reduced the amount to what we thought was a fair amount. The House has increased the amount, and we have taken the same position as was taken by the Senate committee heretofore, that the lesser amount should be adopted.

Mr. KING. I withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4178) for the relief of the International Manufacturers' Sales Co. of America, Inc., A. S. Postnikoff, trustee, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 7, after the words "sum of", to strike out "$968,748.12" and to insert in lieu thereof "$658,050", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the International Manufacturers' Sales Co. of America, Inc., A. S. Postnikoff, trustee, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $658,050 in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States for losses sustained by the said International Manufacturers' Sales Corporation of America, Inc., during the years 1918 and 1919, while engaged, at the invitation of the United States Government, in furnishing articles of necessity to the Siberian population of Russia under and in pursuance to the plan formulated by the War Trade Board in the fall of the year 1918 for extending economic aid to the Siberian population of Russia, said losses having been incurred through the inability of the said International Manufacturers' Sales Co. of America, Inc., to exchange the Russian rubles received from the sales of said articles of prime necessity into American dollars because of the regulation issued by the Federal Reserve Board under date of February 14, 1919, under authority of the Executive order of January 26, 1918, prohibiting the exportation or importation of Russian rubles or the transfer of funds for their purchase by persons or dealers in the United States: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 5 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 5 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

DOUGLAS B. ESPY

The bill (H. R. 1550) for the relief of Douglas B. Espy was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHEROKEE FUEL CO.

The bill (H. R. 1299) giving jurisdiction to the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claim of the Cherokee Fuel Co. was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 3257) to amend the World War Adjusted Compensation Act was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2869) to legalize the use of emergency relief funds for the construction of armories for the National Guard was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 8599) to provide for a change in the designation of the Bureau of Navigation and Steamboat Inspection, to create a marine casualty investigation board and increase efficiency in administration of the steamboat inspection laws, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COPELAND. I ask that House bill 8599, just stated, as well as Calendar No. 1518, being Senate bill 2003, be passed over. I know the Senator from Wisconsin desires to say something about both bills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bills will be passed over.

SHIPPING ACT, 1916

The bill (S. 3467) amending the Shipping Act, 1916, as amended, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Did not the Senator from New York ask that that bill be passed over?

Mr. COPELAND. No, Mr. President; this is a meritorious bill and ought to be passed. The purpose of the bill is to protect against fraudulent billings, to prevent an article being billed as one substance when as a matter of fact it is something else. The bill ought to be passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill (S. 3467) amending the Shipping Act, 1916, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Shipping Act, 1916, as amended, is hereby amended by inserting after section 16 a new section to read as follows:

"FALSE BILLING

"SEC. 16A. Any shipper, consignor, consignee, forwarder, broker, or other person, or any officer, agent, or employee thereof, who shall knowingly and willfully, directly or indirectly, by false billing, false claim, false representation, or any other device or means, whether with or without the consent or connivance of the carrier, its officer, agent, or employee, obtain or attempt to obtain transportation for property by any common carrier subject to the provisions of the act at less than the regular rates or charges then in force by such common carrier; or who shall knowingly and willfully, directly or indirectly, by false claim, false representation, or other device or means, obtain, or attempt to obtain, any allowance, refund, or payment in connection with or growing out of the transportation of such property, whether with or without the consent or connivance of the carrier, its officer, agent, or employee, whereby the compensation of such carrier shall be less than or different from the regular rates or charges in force by such common carrier at the time of such transportation, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction thereof in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, be subject for each offense to a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $3,000."

REIMBURSEMENT OF MEMBERS OF THE NAVY AND MARINE CORPS

The bill (H. R. 4799) to provide for the reimbursement of certain officers and enlisted men or former officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps for personal property lost, damaged, or destroyed as a result of the earthquake which occurred at Managua, Nicaragua, on March 31, 1931, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sum or sums, amounting in the aggregate not to exceed $38,487.04, as may be required by the Secretary of the Navy to reimburse, under such regulations as he may prescribe, certain officers and enlisted men or former officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps, for losses of and damages to reasonable and necessary personal property resulting from the earthquake which occurred at Managua, Nicaragua, on March 31, 1931: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2003) to amend section 13 of the act of March 4, 1915, entitled "An act to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States, to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion, and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereto, and to promote safety at sea" was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As the Chair understands, it has been agreed that this bill should be passed over.

DR. DEXTER P. REYNOLDS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3284) to provide for the issuance of a license to practice the healing art in the District of Columbia to Dr. Dexter P. Reynolds, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, notwithstanding any limitation relating to the time within which an application for a license must be filed, the Commission on Licensure to Practice the Healing Art in the District of Columbia is authorized and directed to issue a license to practice the healing art in the District of Columbia to Dr. Dexter P. Reynolds, Washington, D. C., in accordance with the provisions of the first paragraph of section 24 of the Healing Arts Practice Act, District of Columbia, 1928.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York explain the bill?

Mr. COPELAND. Dr. Reynolds was out of the city when the bill covering the general subject matter was passed. He was a legitimate practitioner here. He returned afterwards and found that he was debarred by reason of the law which had been enacted. The Commissioners, however, and the Licensure Commission feel that this is a meritorious bill and that it ought to pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STEAM-BOILER INSPECTION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2953) to provide for the inspection and control and regulation of steam boilers and unfired pressure vessels in the District of Columbia, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "Boiler Inspection Act of the District of Columbia."

SEC. 2. Wherever the word "person" is used in this act it shall include individuals, firms, partnerships, associations, and corporations.

SEC. 3. There is hereby constituted a boiler inspection service in the Engineer Department of the District of Columbia, to be composed of the following: (a) A boiler inspector who shall be qualified by training and experience in the construction and operation of steam boilers and unfired pressure vessels, and who, under an official designated by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, shall have charge of the enforcement of the provisions of this act and of the regulations promulgated hereunder; (b) such assistant boiler inspectors as may be necessary, qualified by training and experience in the construction and operation of steam boilers and unfired pressure vessels; (c) and such other employees as may be necessary for the proper performance of the work. All such officials and employees shall be appointed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and their compensation shall be fixed in accordance with the Classification Act of 1923, as amended.

SEC. 4. No person shall use or cause to be used any steam boiler operating at a pressure in excess of 15 pounds per square inch, or operating at a pressure less than 15 pounds per square inch unless provided with an unassisted gravity return, or any unfired pressure vessel operating at a pressure in excess of 60 pounds per square inch and having a capacity in excess of 15 gallons, except such vessels as may be exempted by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, without having first obtained a certificate of inspection from the boiler inspector.

SEC. 5. No person shall operate or cause to be operated any boiler or unfired pressure vessel, referred to in section 4 hereof, at a pressure greater than that permitted by the certificate of inspection, or while feed pumps, gages, cocks, valves, or automatic safety-control devices are not in proper working condition, or in violation of any of the regulations promulgated hereunder by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 6. The boiler inspector, or one of his assistants, shall inspect annually all boilers and unfired pressure vessels for which a certificate of inspection is required by section 4 of this act, and shall determine by actual tests the condition thereof from the standpoint of safety and fitness for operation. If such boiler or vessel be safe and fit for operation, the boiler inspector shall issue the certificate of inspection which shall state, among other things, the pressure per square inch such boiler or vessel may be allowed to carry. This certificate of inspection shall be displayed in a conspicuous place in close proximity to the boiler or vessel covered thereby. In the case of a steam boiler or unfired pressure vessel which is regularly inspected at least once a year by an insurance company duly licensed in the District of Columbia and approved by the Commissioners of the said District as to its inspection service, where a report of such inspection filed within 30 days after such inspection with the boiler inspector shows any such boiler or unfired pressure vessel to be in a safe and insurable condition, such inspection and report may take the place of the inspection hereinbefore provided and the certificate of inspection may be issued upon such report.

SEC. 7. The boiler inspector may in his discretion revoke or suspend the certificate of inspection provided in section 4 of this act if at any time he shall find any boiler or unfired pressure vessel covered by such certificate to be unsafe or unfit for operation.

SEC. 8. Steam boilers and unfired pressure vessels located in or upon self-propelled boats or vessels or boats or vessels owned or operated by the United States, or upon locomotives, street cars, busses, or other vehicles, operated under the regulations of any Federal agency or the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia, shall be exempt from the provisions of this act.

SEC. 9. There shall be paid to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia for the issuance of a certificate as required by this act fees to be fixed from time to time by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for the annual inspection of each steam boiler or unfired pressure vessel, commensurate with the cost of inspection, with power to fix higher fees for the issuance of a certificate where the inspection in connection therewith is made on a Sunday or legal holiday. When an inspection report is filed by an insurance company with the said boiler inspector, showing that a boiler or unfired pressure vessel has been inspected and found to be in a safe and insurable condition as provided in section 6, there shall be paid to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia a fee of $1 prior to the issuance of a certificate of inspection.

SEC. 10. The boiler inspector and his assistants shall have the right to enter, in the performance of his or their duties, at all reasonable hours, all premises on which a steam boiler or unfired pressure vessel is being installed, operated, or maintained, and it shall be unlawful for any person to deny admittance to any such inspector or assistant or to interfere with him or them in the performance of his or their duties.

SEC. 11. The boiler inspector shall keep in the office of the boiler inspection service all applications made, and a complete record thereof, as well as of all certificates issued. He shall also keep a complete record of each boiler and unfired pressure vessel inspected, and such other records and data pertaining to the boiler inspection service as may be directed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 12. The use of any steam boiler or unfired pressure vessel in violation of any of the prohibitions or requirements of this act, or of the regulations promulgated under the authority hereof, shall constitute a common nuisance, and the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia may maintain an action in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, in the name of the District of Columbia, to abate and perpetually enjoin such nuisance.

SEC. 13. If any person shall violate any one or more of the provisions of this act, or of regulations duly promulgated hereunder, the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia, or any of his assistants, shall file an information in the police court in the name of the District of Columbia, and upon conviction such person shall be subject to a fine not to exceed $100 or to imprisonment for not more than 90 days, or both, for each and every violation thereof, and each violation shall constitute a separate offense.

SEC. 14. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and empowered to make such regulations as they may deem proper to carry out the provisions of this act and to fix the fees herein provided.

SEC. 15. All laws or parts of laws relating to boiler inspection in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed: Provided, That no provision hereof shall be deemed to amend, alter, or repeal the act approved February 28, 1887, as amended, being an act to regulate steam engineering in the District of Columbia.

SEC. 16. If any provision of this act or the application thereof to any person or circumstance is held invalid, such invalidity shall not affect other provisions or applications of the act which can be given effect without the invalid provision or application, and to this end the provisions of this act are declared to be severable.

SEC. 17. This act shall become effective 6 months from the date of its approval. The regulations and schedule of fees herein provided for shall be promulgated by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and printed in one or more of the daily newspapers published in the said District but shall not be enforced until 30 days after such publication or until the effective date of this act. Amendments to the regulations or new or additional schedules of fees, when and as the same may be adopted, shall likewise be printed in one or more of the daily newspapers published in the said District, and no penalty for violation thereof or payment of new or additional fees prescribed shall be enforced until 30 days after such publication.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the present law in the District of Columbia is wholly inadequate to meet the situation. There is only one inspector of boilers, and the demands which are made upon his time render it impossible for him to make proper inspections. The result has been that there have been a number of catastrophes; boilers have exploded and persons have been injured. After thorough investigation, the District Commissioners, in cooperation with the necessary officials, have recommended this bill. The Senate committee examined it carefully and recommends its passage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REGULATION OF AUTOMOBILES VISITING IN THE DISTRICT

The bill (S. 3161) to amend section 13 (c) of the District of Columbia Traffic Acts was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Utah; Is it proposed that the driver of a vehicle who comes from another State into the District may be prevented from driving his car in the District?

Mr. KING. The general purpose of the bill is to subject nonresidents who operate motor vehicles within the District of Columbia to the same regulations respecting traffic which are enforced against residents of the District.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Utah how much time a visitor from one of the States would have to acquire a permit?

Mr. KING. As I recall, there is no provision dealing with that question. As I have indicated, nonresidents enjoy some advantages denied to residents of the District who are operating motor vehicles under permits or licenses obtained from the District authorities. It is sought to have nonresidents submit to the same regulations which control the residents of the District.

Mr. ROBINSON. Submit to what? I did not hear the statement of the Senator.

Mr. KING. Nonresidents are to be governed by the same rules and regulations as to traffic as are those residing within the District and who are operating under District licenses.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is not that true without any special statute? Does not the law of the District relating to traffic apply to visitors as well as to residents?

Mr. KING. Nonresidents, as I recall the provisions of existing law, are not made amenable to a number of regulations to which residents must conform.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the advantage given nonresidents?

Mr. KING. I do not have the present law before me, but my recollection is that the authority conferred upon the District Commissioners to revoke or suspend automobile-operators' permits issued to local residents contains broader power than that conferred upon the Commissioners to suspend or revoke the right of nonresidents to operate cars within the District. My recollection is that the Commissioners may revoke the permits of residents for any cause deemed by the Commissioners, or their representative, to be in the interest of the public safety; but the law discriminates in favor of nonresidents, as against residents of the District, in that the Commissioners, in dealing with nonresidents who operates cars within the District, may not revoke permits unless the nonresident has been convicted of driving his car within the District under the influence of intoxicants or drugs. In other words, the present law is believed by the Commissioners to be too liberal in favor of nonresident drivers within the District and to impose upon residents more stringent rules and regulations respecting traffic.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think, with a view to reserving the rights of the country boys and others from out of town, I will ask that the bill go over until an opportunity may be afforded to examine it more carefully.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On objection, the bill will be passed over.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

The bill (H. R. 9870) to provide for the immediate payment of World War adjusted-service certificates, for the cancelation of unpaid interest accrued on loans secured by such certificates, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COUZENS. That is the so-called "bonus" bill, and I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

MEASUREMENT OF VESSELS USING THE PANAMA CANAL

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 2288) to provide for the measurement of vessels using the Panama Canal, and for other purposes.

SIXTEENTH ANNIVERSARY OF EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, on most of the anniversaries of the eighteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution I have addressed the Senate on the evils of beverage alcohol and the methods of its suppression.

The repeal of the eighteenth amendment, which became effective on December 5, 1933, and its replacement by the twenty-first amendment, which retains national power over interstate liquor shipments, introduced another epoch in connection with the age-old and ever-present liquor problem.

Occurrences since the repeal of the eighteenth amendment have shown that the dangers of the liquor traffic to the Nation have multiplied with the disappearance of national prohibition.

We can repeal legislative and constitutional enactments but we cannot repeal the nature of a physical poison.

Developments since the repeal of the eighteenth amendment continue to demonstrate the value of prohibition in Nation and in State.

These developments show that such is the nature and power of the liquor traffic that no unit, national, State, nor otherwise is able to handle it with any substantial degree of success once the legal and constitutional barriers are broken down.

Observe what has happened since the revocation of the eighteenth amendment.

Nearly all the States now have the license plan or State monopolies or dispensaries, the license plan predominating. In most of these States the abuses and the evils of the old-time saloon have returned, with added viciousness and debauchery. Women have become patrons in such numbers and with such persistence that the words "feminine barfly" have become a shameful addition to our language. Mr. Martin Nelson, secretary-treasurer of the Keeley Institute, the largest liquor-cure institution in the country, said last month that drinking among women had increased materially since the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, that the open saloon was again in evidence, that the number of women patients at the Keeley Institute increased 14 percent during the first 10 months of 1935, but that the gain in number of patients was probably not comparable to the actual increase in the number of women who have become habitual drinkers in recent years. Mr. Nelson added that of the women taking the cure for the drink habit 90 percent were married, 77 percent were housewives, the remainder being divided among school teachers, nurses, bookkeepers, salesladies, office workers, and restaurant keepers.

Already there are more places where legalized liquor is sold in the area where all prohibition has been abolished, State and National, than there were in the entire country at the time of the adoption of the eighteenth amendment. Before national prohibition there were 177,790 saloons. Now, by best estimates, there are more than 200,000 retail outlets. Beer is sold amid new surroundings—in hardware stores, groceries, restaurants, drug stores, and other places, which women and children frequent.

The Brewery Age of October 1935 announced that Mrs. Norma V. Young, home economics editor, who writes for the Los Angeles Examiner as "Prudence Penny", would speak before the United States Brewers Association's national convention at Los Angeles, October 23, 1935, on What Shall We Do About the Women? She was expected to give many suggestions to the industry on how to sell women beer. Perhaps the most significant statement made by "Prudence Penny" in her address to the brewers was one not to forget the younger set, saying:

> You will have to appeal to the coming generation, and while I have the greatest respect for the wisdom and experience of our elders, it is the teaching you do now for our younger generation that is going to help you increase your percentage of beer consumed by women.

Since the repeal of the eighteenth amendment the number of deaths and accidents due to drinking drivers of automobiles and drinking pedestrians has reached the highest point ever known. It was shown last year through figures gathered from official sources by Dr. Theron Wendell Kilmer, police surgeon, of Hempstead, N. Y., in a paper read before the Thirty-fifth Annual Convention of the New York State Association of Chiefs of Police at Utica, N. Y., that in the country as a whole the number of drinking drivers had increased 11 times more in 1934 over 1933 than the number of cars had increased in 1934 over 1933.

The gravity of the traffic-accident problem has brought about an organized effort upon the part of many groups to institute safety campaigns in individual cities and in the Nation at large. Despite all safety campaigns and public discussion, however, the indications are that the number of accidents and fatalities in 1935 will equal, or almost equal, those of 1934—an all-time high.

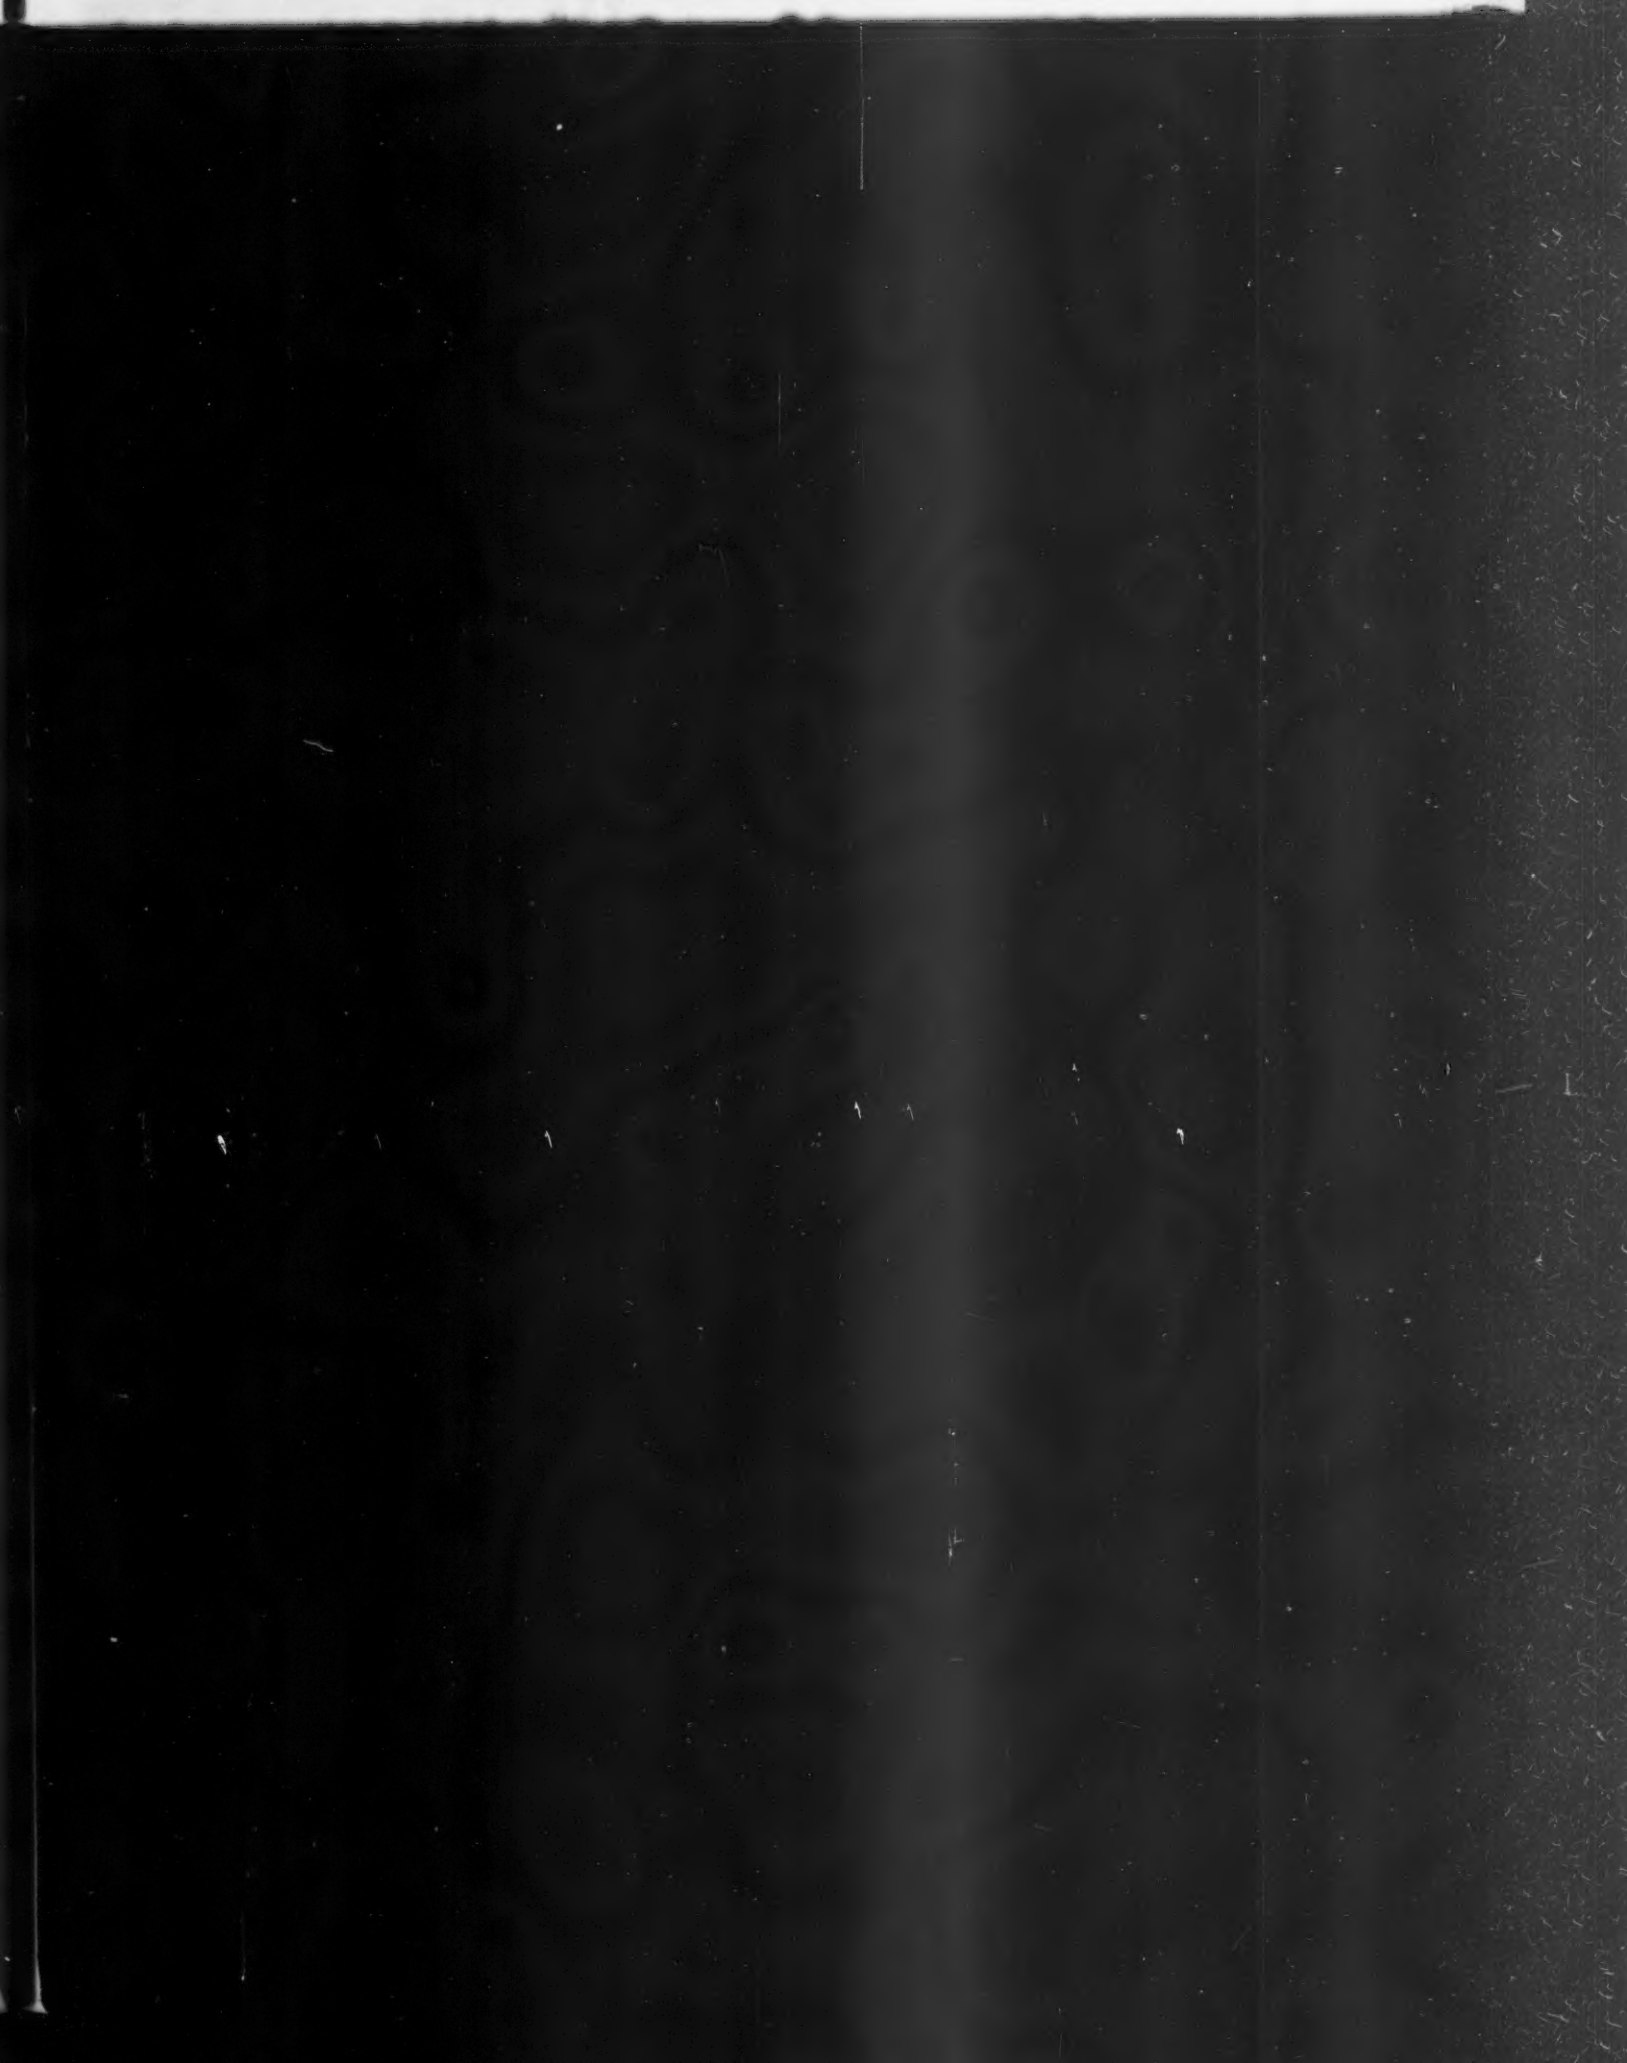
Since repeal the insurance companies are facing more extensively than ever the effect of the use of alcoholic beverages by applicants for insurance. The Northwestern Life Insurance Co., one of the large and representative companies of the Nation, reports that according to its experience indulgence in alcohol shows an increase of 149 percent as a cause of rejection for insurance among men and women under 30; that for all ages the increase in rejections involving alcoholic excesses is 25 percent since the prerepeal days of 1931 and 1932. This company states that an examination of its accepted insurance applications for the spring of 1935 as compared with the same period in 1932 discloses an increase of 74 percent in the proportion of applicants using alcoholic beverages; that this figure includes all reports of indulgence, occasional as well as habitual, young people showing a much greater increase than any other age group with a gain of 138 percent in users of intoxicants among those under 30. Analyzing its rejections, the company states that each age group showed an increase due to indulgence in alcohol, except the group over 45, which showed a slight decline since repeal, the average increase of all ages being as heretofore stated 25 percent, and for the group under 30 as also heretofore stated 149 percent.

Mr. Walter C. Hill, president of the Retail Credit Co., said in a paper before the medical section, American Life Convention, April 1935, that there was a steady rise in hazards to insurance companies of drivers of automobiles and of pedestrians associated with liquor; that available records indicated a relatively large number of accidents to either the driver or a second party where one or both were under some influence of liquor; that the hazard of the slowing-up effect of alcohol on the driver covered the small end of the picture, the greatest toll coming from pedestrians affected by alcohol on account of their larger numbers. It will be noted that Mr. Hill did not include children and older people unaffected by alcohol who are perpetually imperiled on roads and streets by auto drivers whose mental reactions are crippled by even moderate quantities of alcohol.

With approximately 25,000,000 motor vehicles crowding American highways and moving at modern speed rates, it is nothing less than complicity in murder to enhance the use of beverage alcohol by giving it a legalized status.

Beverage alcohol and auto driving will not mix. Beverage alcohol and machinery will not mix. Beverage alcohol and progress will not mix. Beverage alcohol and right conduct will not mix. Beverage alcohol and law observance will not mix.

We were told that repeal would promote temperance. How completely the records repudiate that assertion! They show that tax-paid withdrawals of distilled spirits, including alcohol for consumption, rose from a little more than 6,000,000 gallons in 1933, the last year of national prohibition, to nearly forty-two and a half million gallons in 1934 and to nearly eighty-two and a half million gallons in 1935. They show that tax-paid withdrawals of fermented malt liquors for consumption rose from about six and a half million barrels in 1933 to a little more than 32,000,000 barrels in 1934 and to nearly 42,000,000 barrels in 1935. Remember that liquors withdrawn for industrial uses are for the most part tax-free. Recalling the verdict of the ages that social abuses increase largely in proportion to the quantity of alcoholic liquors consumed, we may well turn with a shudder from any attempt to measure the inferno these figures suggest.



We were assured that bootlegging and illicit selling would largely disappear with the return of the legalized liquor traffic. In reply, I refer to excerpts from testimony last year before the Senate Finance Committee by the National Civic Federation. This federation is not a prohibition group, but an organization which has been making a study of the liquor question as well as other matters of national significance. The Federation stated to the Senate Finance Committee that bootlegging, rum running, and illicit selling were depriving Federal and State Governments of more than $300,000,000 annually in collectible revenues; that Federal Alcohol Commissioner Choate had expressed the fear in April 1934 that seizure of illicit plants for the first 3 months of that year indicated the year's total would amount to 7,952 illicit plants with a combined annual capacity of 271,623,000 gallons, while actually the year's total was much larger; that since conditions in 1935 were admittedly no better than in 1934 it must be conceded that no less than 50 percent of distilled spirits consumption was not being tax paid.

Repeal has not been followed by anything like effective regulation or control. It has not decreased the consumption of alcoholic beverages. It has not promoted temperance. It has not reduced crime. It has not eliminated the bootlegger, the gangster, the kidnaper, nor the illicit distiller. The revenue it produces is not a source of relief to the taxpayer, because every dollar of liquor revenue means the extraction of eight or ten additional dollars from the pockets of the consuming public for the purchase of intoxicating beverages. It cannot make any contribution, therefore, to prosperity. It has been marked by an increasing number of arrests and commitments for driving while drunk or drinking, and for offenses growing out of the use of liquor, by the return of the saloon, with women and girls conspicuous among patrons, servers, and bartenders.

The American Businessmen's Research Foundation of Chicago, an organization devoted to a constructive endeavor to solve the liquor question, announced a five-point appraisal of the liquor traffic in the United States on the 1st of January 1936.

The statement began with the assertion that the beginning of 1936 and the end of the first 2 calendar years of the legalized liquor traffic had disclosed the social and economic menace of a legalized trade in beverage alcohol.

The five points in this connection were in substance as follows: First, that this traffic had again been revealed as the only legalized business which gave its patron no value in return, but products that promoted disorder, destroyed efficiency, bred physical disability, mental derangement, and moral irresponsibility; second, that unlike any other industry it directly diverted an amount now growing annually into billions from legitimate business without any equivalent to its customers; third, that in failing to return this equivalent it was a fraudulent competitor with all other American industry; fourth, that the national advertising and high-pressure sales program of the liquor traffic through the press, the radio, the movies, the billboards, the mails, and other channels of publicity was a destructive influence in that it bred potential disaster not only to every other business but physically and otherwise to millions of American industry's legitimate customers; and, fifth, that the revenue apology faded completely when the economic, social, educational, and political waste in the wake of the reopened saloon was considered, as well as the further fact that the people were paying 10 times as much as the revenue received by the Government out of their own pockets directly for liquor or for liquor's share in the annual crime and accident bill.

As man's struggle to conquer liquor has continued through the centuries, the problems of drink have become, year by year, more and more social in their character and less a matter of individual determination. This process has been accentuated in comparatively recent years by countless inventions and mechanical devices which have served to increase the momentum of the conditions under which we live; which have served to bring human beings into more immediate, numerous, and vital relationships with each other, and which have increased the chances we as individuals possess of injuring and bringing harm to our fellow men. There was never a period in the history of our country when the acts of a drinking man would constitute such a menace to the safety and happiness of others as they do today.

Dr. Arthur D. Bevan points to the social significance of the liquor problem by stating emphatically that the greatest factor of law control in the interest of the health of the Nation would be the elimination of alcoholic drink; that this is not tyranny—that it is progress, it is science, it is civilization; and that civilization is often compelled to protect the individual against himself.

It was because of the social significance of the liquor problem in this country that, 16 years ago, we as a Nation banded together to protect ourselves from the menace of drink and the degrading influences of the liquor traffic. It was to protect our society from the ravages of alcohol upon the human body, to lift us above drink-caused poverty, to crush the saloon with all its degrading influences, and to blast the liquor interests from their strangle hold upon the political life of this country that we turned to Nation-wide prohibition as the most effective weapon against liquor. The problem had long ceased to be exclusively an individual one.

Society has the right to expect that each individual will so conduct himself as to make a reasonable and substantial return on the investment which it has made in his protection, his education, and his environment. The individual who poisons himself with alcohol infringes that right. He cannot make himself as useful and as effective a member of society as if he did not so abuse himself. Especially does he betray society when he makes himself a detriment and a menace.

There are those who make the assertion that the eighteenth amendment was a violation of personal liberty. Let us examine that statement. A drug, a narcotic, in any form, whether it be opium, alcohol, cocaine, morphine, or any similar article, will destroy the capacity to exercise liberty in the vast majority of victims.

Who is he that asserts a personal right to engage in a trade or business that cripples the human body, destroys or absorbs the earning power and the property of men, and shatters the happiness of others? I tell you there are no such personal rights, and no property rights, in a practice such as this. Why is this true? Because the rights of society are superior to the indulgence, the appetite, or the greed of individuals.

No single word in our language has been subjected to more perversion and misinterpretation than the word "liberty." As one has said, "There is scarcely a sin or crime against God or man that has not, some time or other been honored and dignified by the word 'liberty.'" Personal liberty does not imply, and it has never implied, the right to kidnap, the right to embezzle, the right to blackmail, the right to bribe, or the right to drive others to poverty, broken health, or shame through the promotion of a traffic in a drug, by purchase, use, or sale, that produces these results.

No; true liberty has never had any such meaning in our history. Liberty to our fathers, and to us, means liberty regulated and ordered. No one can deny that the right of the individual ends where the rights of others begin. As Albert E. Sawyer, formerly with the University of Michigan Hospital, and an authority on business management, once said, society takes an interest in the conduct of the individual in an amount proportionate to the power and ability of the individual to influence the health, the happiness, and the welfare of others.

Naturally, as our social and economic structure becomes more and more complex, as industrial machinery, fast moving trains, automobiles, and airplanes come into existence, the power and the play of individual action must be curbed and prohibited more and more in the interest of all.

For instance, as millions on millions of people became dependent on meats and other foods shipped from packing houses it became necessary to prohibit in the interest of all the sale and shipment of unclean, impure, and dangerous foods, and the right of an individual to eat what he pleased was not permitted to interfere with the general right to protection. As criminal elements began more and more to impose on the weak and the unsuspecting by the sale of quackeries and poisonous drugs, it was demanded that such practices and products be made the subject of rigid prohibitions and restrictions. As opium began to work its way into this country, our Government stepped in to prohibit it, except for its established scientific uses.

These prohibitions and restrictions were applied not in violation of personal liberty but to give birth to and to nourish true personal liberty and to preserve in the individual the power to exercise personal liberty. They were applied to make possible an environment in which the individual could be truly free and could have every legitimate chance of making his contribution to society. Such freedom is certainly not to be sacrificed to the so-called liberty to indulge a personal appetite.

Beverage alcohol undermines the moral, mental, and physical strength of multiplying millions and thus cripples the foundations of democracy, self-government, and progress. It imperils liberty because liberty is the power to choose the right and to take advantage of opportunity. An article whose consumption impairs this power through the corruption of the springs of thought and energy, of health and will, as does this liquid poison, is a destroyer of liberty, and its tolerance is not an emblem of freedom.

It is public enemy no. 1, and the only way to handle it is to destroy it.

DECISION OF SUPREME COURT IN A. A. A. CASE

Mr. MINTON obtained the floor.

Mr. TRUMAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLT in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, this morning I announced the necessary absence of certain Senators, and I should like to have the announcement repeated on this roll call.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, it is with great deference that I rise to address this distinguished body at this time. I propose to discuss very briefly the recent decision of the Supreme Court, in which it held the Agricultural Adjustment Act unconstitutional. Lawyers of far greater distinction than I, and statesmen of proven wisdom and ability who honor this body by their presence, are better able to discuss it than I. However, the gravity of our present situation constrains me to attempt at this time the expression of my own views on this important decision and the problem to which it relates.

As a lawyer I have the greatest respect for the Supreme Court. I accord to their decisions the respect that is due them. However, I cannot help remembering that in each case argued before the Court some good lawyer finds that he is mistaken about what the Constitution provides, and very frequently some members of the Court are mistaken. Of course, Congress would not be expected to know! In other words, what the Constitution provides rests in the minds and hearts of nine eminent and distinguished gentlemen of the Court who have the last guess. They have the last guess because they have decreed it so, and we have accepted it as a part of our jurisprudence that the Court shall have the last guess. This guess may be by any varying majority, and sometimes they even take a second guess.

I mention these facts only to remind Senators that there is nothing sacrosanct about the opinions of the Court. Unlike the law of the Medes and Persians, their opinions can be changed. I hold no brief for this most important opinion of the majority of the Court. I disagree with the majority emphatically. I think their opinion is the most strained, forced construction of the Constitution, and the most highly flavored political opinion to come from that Court since the Dred Scott decision.

I accept the Court's decision in the same spirit in which Abraham Lincoln accepted the Dred Scott decision, when he said, first, in his debate with Douglas:

> Somebody has to reverse that decision, since it is made, and we mean to reverse it, and we mean to do it peaceably.

And, second, when he said in his first inaugural address:

> At the same time the candid citizens must confess that if the policy of the Government upon vital questions affecting the whole people is to be irrevocably fixed by the decision of the Supreme Court, the instant they are made in ordinary litigation between parties in personal actions the people will have ceased to be their own rulers, having to that extent practically resigned their Government into the hands of that eminent tribunal.

I accept the decision as the law to be obeyed, so long as it is the law, and I join the ranks of those who believe it their duty to release the country from the paralyzing effect of that opinion. We accept it as the law of that case, but we will not be bound by any implication contained therein, that this Government of the United States is powerless to aid its people in distress. We must avert the consequences of the Court's action in destroying the first national program that ever put a dollar in the farmer's pocket, and has lifted the great agricultural industry of the Nation from the slough of bankruptcy and ruin and set it well on its way to prosperity; we must avert the consequences by enacting legislation within the law declared in that opinion if possible, but if that cannot be done, then change the fundamental law of the land in accordance with its own provision. But avert the consequences we must. It will not do for a nation that has nurtured industry—yes; subsidized it with a lavish hand—to say to the agricultural interests of this Nation, in the darkest hour of their need: "We cannot help you."

As we approach the analysis of this opinion, there are two aspects in which to consider it. First, we may consider what it did not decide, and then, what it really did decide.

I have always understood that when the Supreme Court was considering the constitutionality of statutes, even a State statute, that the A B C's of such construction were that if an act is subject to two constructions, one of which renders the act unconstitutional and the other constitutional, the latter must be adopted.

Mr. Justice Sutherland, in the Arkansas Gas Co. v. The Railroad Commission (in 261 U. S. 379–383) said:

> The rule is fundamental that if a statute admits of two constructions, the effect of one being to render the statute unconstitutional and the other to establish its validity, the courts will adopt the latter.

So that rule is fundamental! That is hornbook law! What did the Court do? It had a choice of deciding that the law was a scheme to use the taxing power to compel regulation in a field the Federal Government had no power to regulate, which would make the law unconstitutional, or it could have taken the position that the law was the exercise of the power granted in the Constitution to lay an excise tax and spend it in the interest of the general welfare, and that in the spending of it, to save the agricultural industry of the Nation, Congress might reasonably be held to have acted in the general welfare and, therefore, the act was constitutional.

Did the Court adopt the constitutional rule? Not at all! Agriculture is the largest single industry in the Nation. I assume, of course, that the Supreme Court knew that. Fully 45 percent of our people are directly dependent for their living upon the tillage of the soil or rendering some service to the tillers of the soil, such as country merchants, garages, shops, and so forth. Even that must have been known to the Court.

For 10 years prior to 1933 the farmers of this country steadily progressed toward ruin and in 1933 had just about arrived. Yes; arrived at the point of desperation, unable to pay their taxes or meet the interest payments upon their mortgages, with their crops rotting in the fields, unable to get a price for them that would pay for the seed and fertilizer. They were desperate as they witnessed the accumulations of a lifetime of toil and sacrifice taken from them by the tax-gatherer and under the sheriff's hammer. Armed with shotguns, they barricaded the highways and stopped the trucks and poured the milk in the gutters, they burst open the doors of the freight cars and dumped the produce on the right-of-way. Yes; they put a rope around the neck of a judge and threatened to hang him because he declared the law in a foreclosure suit. That was the picture in the beginning of 1933, with the largest single industry of the Nation prostrate, bewildered, and frustrated. We faced an emergency in this country never paralleled in its history. Congress met in conference with the leading representatives of agriculture. This legislation was passed, and lo and behold, it worked. That may be the rub. Prosperity returned to the farmers. Maybe that should not have happened. With the millions in benefit payments paid to the farmer to induce him to reduce his production, and the increase in farm produce from 10-cent corn to 75-cent corn and 30-cent wheat to 90-cent wheat and 3-cent hogs to 12-cent hogs, and so on all along the line, the farmers' prosperity began to reach everyone.

You would think that the Supreme Court, with the knowledge of these facts, which even they must have known, would have approached the consideration of this act with these facts in mind, and with such an approach may very properly have held that the act was a valid exercise of the taxing power and the expenditure of that tax to save the agricultural industry of the Nation was an expenditure in the interest of the general welfare and, therefore, the act was constitutional. Three of the Court did take that course, but not the majority. They not only did not decide the question of general welfare but expressly avoided it.

I quote from the opinion of Mr. Justice Roberts:

> We are not now required to ascertain the scope of the phrase "general welfare of the United States" or to determine whether an appropriation in aid of agriculture falls within it.

And again he says:

> The tax can only be sustained by ignoring the avowed purpose and operation of the act.

The Court thereby admits what I think no one will dispute—that Congress has the power to levy such a tax, although the Court does not decide it. On the other hand, it does not decide it cannot be done. So we have the Supreme Court of the United States refusing to decide a question squarely before it, namely, whether this was a proper levy of an excise tax and a proper expenditure in the interest of the general welfare. Why did not the Court decide this question? Because it could not say to the people of this country that where the Constitution of the United States provides for the collection of taxes to provide for the general welfare that the expenditure of that money to save agriculture was not in the interest of the general welfare.

It just did not make sense. So the Court refused to see what everybody else saw and expressly declined to decide what the Court itself designated "the controlling question in the case."

Having left out Hamlet in the case and refused to decide the question of the general welfare, which was expressly presented, it proceeded to decide the case on a ground that to the majority's satisfaction invalidated the legislation. And what was the basis of that decision? Stripped of the things the Court did not decide and the spook arguments advanced about things that have never happened, the case simply decides that the act was invalid because it was a scheme to use the taxing power to enforce regulations in a field left to the States and not granted to Congress. Is not that what they decided and nothing more? Let us see.

May I remind you again that they never decided the scope of the general-welfare clause or whether an appropriation in aid of agriculture falls within it. Neither did they decide the right to levy the tax or deny the right.

At the very beginning of his opinion Mr. Justice Roberts points out the issue he must meet in these words:

> The Government, in substance and effect, asks us to separate the Agricultural Adjustment Act into two statutes, the one levying an excise on processors of certain commodities, the other appropriating the public moneys independently of the first. Passing the novel suggestion that two statutes enacted as parts of a single scheme should be tested as if they were distinct and unrelated, we think the legislation now before us is not susceptible of such separation and treatment.

In other words, the Court declines to separate the act into the constituent elements of taxing and appropriating, for the reason that the Court could not deny the power to tax, and it did not have the effrontery to decide that the expenditure of that tax money to save agriculture was not in the interest of general welfare. So the Court takes the position that the tax is part of a scheme to regulate; and the regulation being without the Federal jurisdiction, the act fails.

That is the basis of this opinion. That is what it holds, as I read it, and, in my judgment, that is as far as it goes. I quote variously from the opinion:

> The tax can only be sustained by ignoring the avowed purpose and operation of the act.

Again:

> The tax plays an indispensable part in the plan of regulation.

Again:

> The tax is fixed with the purpose of bringing about crop reduction and price raising.

Again:

> The exaction cannot be wrested out of its setting, denominated an excise for raising revenue, and legalized by ignoring its purpose as a mere instrumentality for bringing about a decided end.

Again:

> We conclude that the act is one regulating agricultural production; that the tax is a mere incident of such regulation.

The pivot of this decision, upon which the case turns, as pointed out by Justice Stone, is that the act is a scheme to use the taxing power to enforce regulation in a field reserved to the States. To sustain this, the majority cites as authority the Second Child Labor case (259 U. S. 20). I submit that this authority does not sustain the Court and is so clearly beside the mark that a freshman in law school ought to be able to see it. One almost wonders why a judge on the Supreme Court could not see it. In fact, three of them did, and pointed it out very clearly in their dissenting opinion. Here is the distinction: The tax in the Child Labor case was a penalizing coercive tax, laid upon the taxpayer to compel the taxpayer to discontinue the use of child labor in his factory, and laid only if he did not so discontinue the use of child labor.

The Court had held in the First Child Labor case that the power to regulate under the commerce clause, the employment of child labor in the factories in the States, did not reside in Congress, and the second case was an attempt to use the taxing power to enforce regulations in a field in which Congress had been denied the right to regulate under any grant of power contained in the Constitution. But in that case the tax penalized and coerced the taxpayer; it was put into effect only when he violated the regulation. It was not intended to raise revenue, but to penalize, and that in a field where there was no other Federal power to support the taxing power. The taxing power was exerted on the taxpayer, but in the recent case the processing tax was not a penalizing tax. It did not operate upon the taxpayer to compel him to conform to any regulations. The regulations, if any, came only with the spending or appropriating of the money. In the Child Labor case the tax operated on the taxpayer to coerce him in a field in which Congress had no power to regulate, while here the tax, and hence the exercise of the taxing power operated on no taxpayer to compel him, by force of the tax, to conform to any regulation.

Mr. Justice Stone, in his dissent, clearly points out the inapplicability of the authority relied upon by the majority, in the following words:

> While all Federal taxes inevitably have some influence on the internal economy of the States, it is not contended that the levy of a processing tax upon manufacturers using agricultural products as raw material has any perceptible regulatory effect upon either their production or manufacture. The tax is unlike the penalties which were held invalid in the Child Labor Tax Case—because they were themselves the instruments of regulation by virtue of their coercive effect on matters left to the control of the States. Here regulation, if any there be, is accomplished not by the tax but by the method by which its proceeds are expended, and would equally be accomplished by any like use of public funds, regardless of their source.

As I view this case, unfortunate as it is, our situation is not hopeless. We may yet lay the tax, the right to do which is not denied. The money from the tax goes into the Treasury. Then, another power of Congress comes into play, the power to appropriate this money from the Treasury. The only limitation mentioned in the Constitution upon the use of money in the Treasury of the United States by the Congress is that it cannot be expended except in accordance with an appropriation duly made, and that no appropriation shall be made for a period of more than 2 years for the support of armies. Appropriation of money by Congress is not mentioned in the Constitution, except in those two instances. There is no limit upon the objects for which Congress may appropriate money, except that the appropriation is restricted to the purpose for which it is made, such as to pay the national debt, provide for the national defense and the general welfare; that is, it must be for a governmental purpose. With the money in the Treasury, Congress then appropriates it in aid of agriculture. If Congress does this, who has a standing in court to question such appropriation? Under the authority of Massachusetts against Mellon, no taxpayer or State can question the expenditure of the money. Assume, for the sake of argument, that someone may invoke the jurisdiction of the court to question the appropriation made by Congress to aid a prostrate industry, such as agriculture, can it be said that such expenditure is not in the interest of the general welfare? Can such an expenditure be said to bear no reasonable relation to the general welfare? I think not; and the Supreme Court will never say to the contrary; and, after all, the only power the Court would have would be to decide whether the act was arbitrary or whether it bore no reasonable relation to the general welfare.

The tilling of the soil as an industry may be committed by the present form of the Government to the care of the States, but the welfare of the industry as a whole and its prosperity are of national concern. If the industry as a whole is not prosperous, it affects vitally the welfare of the entire Nation.

What have State lines to do with this phase of it? What does the artificial State line between the great States of Illinois and Indiana have to do with the price of corn and hogs? What do the artificial State lines from Georgia to Texas have to do with the price of cotton in the Cotton Belt? We, therefore, have an aspect of agriculture which is subject to State control, and another which is the concern of the National Government, since the prosperity or bankruptcy of that industry affects the general welfare.

In aid of the national problem and to further the welfare of the Nation, Congress may spend and appropriate money from the National Treasury. Certainly the power to spend money is as broad as the power to raise it, or why authorize the raising of it? Therefore if Congress may tax for the general welfare, it may spend for the general welfare. This has not been denied by the Supreme Court. It has only condemned what it believed to be an unauthorized exercise of the taxing power in a scheme where the taxing power could not be separated from regulations over which Congress has no control.

So if Congress should make the appropriation, the only thing that the Supreme Court could look to would be to determine whether or not the expenditure was in the general welfare. The general welfare is recognized in the Constitution as a governmental purpose, and, if the expenditure of the money bore any reasonable relation to the general welfare of the United States, the Supreme Court of the United States could not declare it to be unconstitutional.

Mr. President, I conclude, in agreement with the distinguished junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], that we may tax and then spend for the general welfare, and that saving agriculture would be spending for the general welfare, and therefore within the power granted to the Federal Government under the Constitution.

Although the Court has gone out of its way to wreck a system that works, it has not gone so far, in my humble opinion, as to make our condition hopeless.

I hope I am not wrong in my judgment of the scope of this important decision. If I am, and the Court has effectively paralyzed the arm of Congress to act to relieve the people who constitute the Government, then the people must act to reclaim their own Government.

The blight of the cold, dead hand of the Court must not be permitted to contaminate the blood stream of the Nation and destroy the right of the people to live and prosper.

PEACE AND NEUTRALITY

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, yesterday was the seventh anniversary of the ratification of the Kellogg-Briand Peace Pact for the renunciation of war. That pact had the approval of all peace-loving people of the whole world. Recently I have been overwhelmed with petitions and appeals from the people of Kansas and other Western States urging prompt action on the neutrality bill which, it is hoped, will minimize the means by which the United States may again be dragged into a war in which our people are not concerned—a causeless war, so far as the people of the United States are concerned. Such proposed legislation is now under consideration in the Commitee on Foreign Relations, and the country hopes that an effective measure, written in the interest of peace and of the people, will be enacted.

I believe it is a fair statement that what is uppermost today in the minds of the American people is not the Supreme Court and its power to decide legislative and administrative policies; it is not the form of the Constitution; it is not the necessity of a balanced Budget. The people are thinking of all these things; they are important; they affect the welfare and the future well-being of all our people. The people realize that fact.

But above and beyond all these questions is the heartfelt desire that this Nation shall never again be embroiled in another foreign war and a growing determination that the Nation shall not be dragged into another world war to make profits for financiers and munitions makers and other war profiteers.

I want the Congress to pass a permanent neutrality measure that will leave no question where the United States Government stands. I believe the people of this country want the Congress to assume this responsibility and to take action promptly.

The American people look upon war for what it is—a colossal crime and a stupendous folly, the curse of nations, and the misery of their people. War is a crime with penalties that never end. It seems no atonement can be made for the crime of war. We know—we know too well—that the consequences of war are unending. Years of poverty, suffering, disease, and debasement cannot pay for war. This bitter realization has come to the people of the world, as it has come to the people of this country.

Mr. President, regardless of blundering diplomacy, regardless of scheming dictators and equally scheming war profiteers, regardless of what may happen over the world in the next 10 years to discredit this prophecy, I say to you that war is definitely on the way out. Sooner or later the world's rulers, nominal and real, will be forced to recognize this. Sanity and common sense eventually and inevitably will dominate the world and world policies, instead of war and the insanity and folly of war.

Preceding the storm of indignation in England over the proposal to dismember Ethiopia, which resulted in the plan being abandoned and officially denounced, the people of Great Britain, by the largest popular poll ever taken in the British Isles, declared themselves for peace measures and almost unanimously against war. A poll taken in this country by the Congregational churches shows the peace sentiment in the United States is just as strong. A world-wide petition calling on all governments to settle international disputes peacefully will soon be started on its way.

A poll of a cross section of the Middle West, taken by a group of newspapers and magazines published in the center of the United States and made public a few days ago, indicates and emphasizes that the people in seven of these Central States—Kansas, Missouri, Iowa, Nebraska, Oklahoma, South Dakota, and Colorado—are overwhelmingly against this country's participation.

The people of this distinctive American region of the United States are demanding, almost unanimously, that this country shall not participate in another foreign war.

That profit shall be taken out of war by drafting industry and wealth as well as men in case of war.

That before declaring war the question shall be submitted to a vote of the people.

That no loans for war purposes shall be made to foreign governments.

That the people of the United States shall sell no supplies to warring nations.

That munitions of war shall be manufactured in Government plants.

That military training in our colleges shall not be compulsory.

By an overwhelming majority the poll also favors world disarmament. One remarkable and highly creditable feature of this poll, in which nearly 100,000 participated, was the huge majority vote against selling supplies to warring nations. This section of the country would profit directly and largely from such sales. The vote against selling supplies to warring nations was 26 to 1, with more than 90,000 ballots on this question. This testifies strongly to the sincerity of the convictions expressed in this particular poll. Any general poll of the people of the United States would, I am confident, show similar results.

I have received voluntary petitions signed by thousands of citizens of my State against our participating in another foreign war. They come from many organizations. Long lists of signatures are attached to them. The preamble of one such petition states the case simply, forcefully, and adequately, as follows:

> We, the undersigned, view with alarm the political situation developing in Europe. The horrors of the last European war, in which we were entangled, are still fresh in our minds. In the name of humanity, keep us out of war.

Mr. President, the Congress of the United States as representative of the people of the United States can do no more timely and momentous act at this hour than to declare itself, in a way that can leave no question, where the people and the Government of the United States stand, in positive opposition to war and war-breeding policies and actions.

As a part of that declaration, a declaration written into an effective act, let it be stated plainly that we will under no circumstances, bind ourselves to send an army or navy to foreign shores; that we will make no alliances nor assume any obligations to protect Europe's territorial boundaries; that this Nation nor its people will not finance the quarrels of other nations nor ever again send its young men across the sea to fight in a cause in which we have no just concern; that our Government will enforce strict American neutrality in case of foreign wars.

Finally, on the firm basis of such an understanding, let it be made known that American good will and American common sense will go the limit to uphold America's traditional policy of peace on earth, good will toward nations and men.

Mr. President, I think the Senate will be interested in the result of the peace poll to which I have just referred. Following is the report:

Final report on war peace poll

	Yes	No
1. Should the United States keep out of all foreign wars?	90,746	964

MEASUREMENT OF VESSELS USING THE PANAMA CANAL

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2288) to provide for the measurement of vessels using the Panama Canal and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOORE in the chair). The bill is open to amendment.

Mr. GORE obtained the floor.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield for a moment?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I am advised that several Members of the Senate interested in the bill now before us as the unfinished business are not prepared to go forward with it today. One of the Senators is suffering from a severe cold, which would prevent his discussing the subject. Would the Senator from Oklahoma be willing that the bill may go over for the day if such action will not destroy any of the rights of priority it may have under the order of the Senate?

Mr. GORE. If I could have some assurance that Senators in opposition to the bill will be ready to proceed, I should be very glad to oblige them, with the understanding that the unfinished business be laid aside to be taken up immediately after the disposition of the special order.

Mr. McNARY. May I suggest to the Senator that I do not see the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] or the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE] in the Chamber at the moment. It might be well to suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Carey	Gore	Maloney
Ashurst	Chavez	Guffey	Minton
Austin	Clark	Hale	Moore
Bachman	Connally	Harrison	Murphy
Bailey	Coolidge	Hastings	Murray
Bankhead	Copeland	Hatch	Neely
Barbour	Costigan	Hayden	Norbeck
Barkley	Couzens	Holt	Norris
Benson	Davis	Johnson	O'Mahoney
Bilbo	Dickinson	Keyes	Overton
Borah	Dieterich	King	Pittman
Brown	Donahey	La Follette	Pope
Bulkley	Duffy	Lewis	Radcliffe
Bulow	Fletcher	Logan	Robinson
Burke	Frazier	Lonergan	Russell

Capper	Gibson	McKellar	Shipstead
Caraway	Glass	McNary	Smith
Steiwer	Townsend	Vandenberg	Walsh
Thomas, Okla.	Trammell	Van Nuys	White
Thomas, Utah	Truman	Wagner

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MALONEY in the chair). Eighty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

SECRET TREATIES DURING WORLD WAR

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask to have read by the clerk, in my time, an excerpt from the press, which I send to the desk. Before that is done, I wish to say that I have had the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] advised as to what I expect to discuss, and have requested his presence.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator that I have sent word to the Senator from North Dakota that the Senator from Texas is about to speak.

Mr. CONNALLY. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read as requested.

[From the Washington Herald of Thursday, Jan. 16, 1936]

WILSON DECEIVED UNITED STATES, SAYS NYE—PRESIDENT KNEW BUT DENIED SPOILS PACT, PAPERS SHOW

By Don Ewing

Charges that Woodrow Wilson and his Secretary of State, Robert Lansing, "lied" to the American public concerning secret plans of World War allies to split up conquered European territories were made yesterday by Chairman NYE in the Senate munitions inquiry.

The cutting of the territory "pie" itself did not involve the United States.

Simultaneously, the committee revealed statements by Wilson long after the war ended that this Nation would have entered it even if Germany had "committed no act of war or injustice" against this country.

NYE's "lie" charges came in yesterday's hearing as Senator BENNETT CLARK (D.), of Missouri, read into the record numerous hitherto secret State Department documents, and also excerpts from memoranda of both British and American war-time statesmen.

These documents revealed that Wilson and Lansing were aware in late April 1917—a few weeks after America entered the world conflict—of secret agreements between the Allies on splitting up European territory among themselves in event of victory.

Further documents showed Wilson and Lansing, both now dead, denying as late as the fall of 1919 in testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that they knew of the treaties until Wilson went to Paris in December 1918, after the war ended, to help negotiate the Treaty of Versailles.

Other documents in the committee's possession detail official denial by the Wilson administration of knowledge of the treaties late in 1917, when the Soviets overthrew the Russian Government.

As this developed, NYE turned to CLARK and said:

"Then it is clear that both President Wilson and Secretary Lansing lied when they stated from time to time they had no knowledge of these secret treaties."

CLARK had read into the record excerpts of writings by Lord Balfour, head of the British mission to this country in April 1917—after the United States went to war—detailing a conversation at a White House dinner with Wilson.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, for some time I have observed the course of the Munitions Committee with a great deal of interest, and frequently with amazement; but not until today, with the appearance in the press of the charges by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] attacking very courageously and bravely two men who are now dead, did the operations of this committee reach what I believe to be their, so far, lowest depth of performance.

I have invited the Senator from North Dakota to be here. I should like to have him tell the Senate whether or not he is correctly quoted in this press dispatch. The Senator from Texas endeavored this morning, through the committee, to secure a copy of the verbatim report of the proceedings on yesterday and was advised that it would be several days before it could be obtained.

Mr. President, I assume that the Senator from North Dakota—who purportedly is pursuing the munitions investigation in behalf of peace—on yesterday wantonly and flagrantly and without any justification whatever insulted the memory of a man who, perhaps, of all men in recent times, devoted his life, his efforts, and practically sacrificed his life in behalf of the cause of peace. I know that many Senators on the other side and many on this side of the Chamber differed with him in his ideas as to how peace was ultimately to be attained and vigorously fought his methods, but I do not believe that any responsible Member on either side of the Chamber will impeach the integrity of purpose or the splendid idealism of Woodrow Wilson; and at this late day, at least 17 years after the war closed, the Senator from North Dakota is spending the Government's money seeking to ascertain why we went into the World War!

If the Senator from North Dakota, as the result of his reading and his experience during that time, has not yet found out why we entered the World War, he is a very poor leader to lead us out of the danger of future wars; and he professes to be engaged in these pursuits for the purpose of preserving peace and averting war!

Mr. President, I was not an intimate of President Woodrow Wilson. I was only a new Member of the House of Representatives when the war began; but, without that intimacy, I, as one of his admirers—not always a supporter in every detail of his policies, but one of his admirers—desire to express my own resentment of the coarse, common insult which the Senator from North Dakota has heaped upon one of the great figures in American history.

I am not speaking as a Democrat. Let us for the moment forget partisanship. Whether you loved Woodrow Wilson or whether you hated him, whether you agreed with him or whether you opposed him, when the history of this Republic shall be written, his titanic figure will tower above some of the puny pigmies who now bark at his memory, as Pikes Peak towers above the fog and the bog of that Arkansas swamp, which only yesterday engulfed 17 human lives.

Mr. President, being one who is devoted to parliamentary ethics and parliamentary observance, and one of limited resources, I find it very difficult within the compass of parliamentary propriety to find language adequate to express my contempt for efforts of this kind to besmirch the memory of the man Woodrow Wilson, whose tongue is now silent, and has been silent for these many years, or to attack the memory of Robert Lansing, who has now been gone for many years.

If the Senator from North Dakota is so heroic—this white knight of peace—if he wants to make charges like this, why does he not single out some double-fisted man who is still alive? There are many in this body, and many elsewhere in Washington, who had a part in the transactions to which he has referred, and let him impugn their purposes and their motives.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I do not know anything about the reasons for my colleague the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] making the statements purported to have been given to the press, but I have reason to believe they were made on evidence developed through his committee.

As far as the Senator's suggestion is concerned that my colleague single out some two-fisted individual and go after him, I think it is fair to say that some of the witnesses who have been called before that committee are as two-fisted as anyone who might be found. Some of the biggest bankers of the Nation have been before the committee.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, because a man is a banker does not make him an outcast with me. The senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER], through a spirit of loyalty to his colleague, which is very admirable, rises and says, first, that he knows nothing about why these charges were made; then the next moment says he is sure they were made, however, on the basis of testimony adduced before the committee.

I do not care how the charges were made; they are infamous. Some checker-playing, beer-drinking, back room of some low house is the only place fit for the kind of language which the Senator from North Dakota, the chairman of the committee, this Senator who is going to lead us out toward peace, puts into the RECORD about a dead man, a great man, a good man, and a man who when alive had the courage to meet his enemies face to face and eye to eye. No one ever saw Woodrow Wilson sheathe his sword so long as combat was on.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. How long will it be before the committee will complete its labors and how much money has been expended by the committee in what it is doing?

Mr. CONNALLY. I can only say that my recollection is that $150,000 in all was appropriated. I understand it was $150,000. As to the limit of time, I do not think there was any limit on the time. I think they will run just as long as they are given money.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator know how long this money will last and when it will be necessary for the committee to come to the Senate for additional money?

Mr. CONNALLY. I am sorry I cannot answer the question. The Senator from Tennessee is on the Committee on Appropriations, and he should not ask a Senator who is not on the committee about the appropriation. I thank him, but it is embarrassing to the Senator from Texas not to be able to answer the Senator about a matter of appropriations.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know what this committee is doing with the money which has already been appropriated, but it does seem to me we are going far afield when we appropriate money to be expended for the purpose stated by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall say to the Senator that I hold in my hand a copy of the resolution creating this committee, or I suppose it is the one creating the committee. It is Senate Resolution 206.

Mr. NYE and Mr. VANDENBERG submitted the following resolution.

The date at the head of the resolution is February 28, 1934, calendar day of March 12. Let us see what expenditure is authorized. In hastily reading the resolution I am led to believe that the appropriation must have been in a separate resolution. Then by Senate Resolution 244 the committee were granted $35,000 additional.

Mr. McKELLAR. On what date?

Mr. CONNALLY. In June 1934.

Mr. McKELLAR. Thirty-five thousand dollars?

Mr. CONNALLY. Thirty-five thousand dollars additional.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator does not know how much of that has already been expended?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not know. What is the object of the Munitions Committee? What is its jurisdiction? Where did it get authority to do what it is undertaking to do? I ask the clerk to read portions of the resolution.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator that the whole resolution be read?

Mr. CONNALLY. I have no objection. But just a moment. The Senator from Missouri can answer the question of the Senator from Tennessee. The Senator from Tennessee desires to know how much money the committee has had appropriated.

Mr. McKELLAR. And how much of it has been spent.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I am unable to answer exactly as to the amount that has been spent. My recollection is that $125,000 has been appropriated all-told, a sum very small in comparison with the sums spent by other important investigating committees of this body. I should be glad to find out exactly and tell the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be glad if the Senator will do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the influence of the commercial motive is an inevitable factor in considerations involving the maintenance of the national defense; and

Whereas the influence of the commercial motive is one of the inevitable factors often believed to stimulate and sustain wars; and

Whereas the Seventy-first Congress, by Public Resolution No. 98, approved June 27, 1930, responding to the long-standing demands of American war veterans speaking through the American Legion for legislation "to take the profit out of war", created a War Policies Commission which reported recommendations on December 7, 1931, and on March 7, 1932, to decommercialize war and to equalize the burdens thereof; and

Whereas these recommendations never have been translated into the statutes: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a special committee of the Senate shall be appointed by the Vice President to consist of seven Senators, and that said committee be, and is hereby, authorized and directed—

(a) To investigate the activities of individuals, firms, associations, and of corporations and all other agencies in the United States engaged in the manufacture, sale, distribution, import, or export of arms, munitions, or other implements of war; the nature of the industrial and commercial organizations engaged in the manufacture of or traffic in arms, munitions, or other implements of war; the methods used in promoting or effecting the sale of arms, munitions, or other implements of war; the quantities of arms, munitions, or other implements of war imported into the United States and the countries of origin thereof, and the quantities exported from the United States and the countries of destination thereof; and

(b) To investigate and report upon the adequacy or inadequacy of existing legislation, and of the treaties to which the United States is a party, for the regulation and control of the manufacture of and traffic in arms, munitions, or other implements of war within the United States, and of the traffic therein between the United States and other countries; and

(c) To review the findings of the War Policies Commission and to recommend such specific legislation as may be deemed desirable to accomplish the purposes set forth in such findings and in the preamble to this resolution; and

(d) To inquire into the desirability of creating a Government monopoly in respect to the manufacture of armaments and munitions and other implements of war and to submit recommendations thereon.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee or any subcommittee thereof is authorized to hold hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Congress until the final report is submitted, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $15,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, in answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Tennessee, I shall say that I have consulted the financial clerk of the Senate, and he advises that $125,000 has already been appropriated for the use of the committee. I did not ascertain how much of it has been spent, but nearly all of it must have been spent, because I find Senate Resolution No. 8, by the Senator from North Dakota, under date of last January, asking for $50,000 additional—$50,000 additional!

Mr. President, Senators have heard read from the desk the resolution creating the Munitions Committee, I challenge Senators to point out where in that resolution any authority was granted to the Munitions Committee to go back and to rediscover why the United States entered the war.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. At this time I do not desire to enter into a discussion of the remarks of the Senator from Texas, which were studiously made in the absence of the Senators upon whom he has been reflecting.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Missouri states something which is not true, because I advised the Senate before I began to speak. I did not intend to mention the Senator from Missouri. I advised the Senate that I did intend to mention the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], and I advised him of it, and that Senator knows I invited him to be present.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Let me say that during my service in the Senate, when I have found it necessary to discuss an absent Senator in this body I have never yet done so without first notifying him of my intention to do so. It is my intention to continue to pursue such a practice as long as I continue to remain a Member of this body. I learned casually a few moments ago, while I was in attendance on the Munitions Committee, that the Senator from Texas was on the floor making very serious reflections upon myself as well as the Senator from North Dakota. I came over to the Senate Chamber. I do not desire to answer the Senator's remarks until I can get the stenographic notes and see what he has said. However, as to the challenge just issued by the Senator from Texas, it seems to me that the Senator from Texas should be able to understand——

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I yielded to the Senator from Missouri but not for a speech.

Mr. CLARK. Does the Senator desire me to accept his challenge or not?

Mr. CONNALLY. At the proper time.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator has made the challenge.

Mr. CONNALLY. I have not completed my challenge.

Mr. CLARK. I shall be glad to point out where the authority referred to lies in the resolution.

Mr. CONNALLY. Very well, if the Senator will be brief.

Mr. CLARK. I will be brief enough to read one paragraph out of the resolution which fully answers the Senator's challenge.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. CLARK (reading):

(b) To investigate and report upon the adequacy or inadequacy of existing legislation, and of the treaties to which the United States is a party, for the regulation and control of the manufacture of and traffic in arms, munitions, or other implements of war within the United States, and of the traffic therein between the United States and other countries.

Mr. President, I submit that such a duty as was imposed on the committee would be impossible of performance without a review of the experiences of the United States previous to the last war which finally led us into the war.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is welcome.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator, because now I am glad to know—yes; I repeat and say I am glad to know that that is the platform upon which the committee bases its assertion of its plenary and almost world-wide powers.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

Mr. CONNALLY. Just a moment. The Senate knows that when I rose to speak I notified the Senate that I had advised the Senator from North Dakota—not personally, but through officers of the Senate—that I was about to speak and invited the Senator from North Dakota to be here, because I intended to discuss some remarks he had made. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] rose in his seat and advised the Senator from Texas that he also had invited the Senator from North Dakota to be here. If the Senator does not desire to come, that is his concern.

Now, as to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. I had not mentioned the Senator from Missouri, and I did not intend to mention the Senator from Missouri. But evidently the Senator from Missouri, when he heard the Senator from North Dakota mentioned, felt that he had to be mentioned also. So he takes offense at what I said.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator has not mentioned my name, I apologize. I was informed while I was attending the meeting of the Munitions Committee that the Senator from Texas had mentioned my name and seriously reflected upon me, and for that reason I came over to the Senate Chamber. I stated to the Senator a moment ago that I have not yet had a chance to examine the stenographic notes of his remarks.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator is not going to change his remarks. I will say that. Let me say to the Senator from Missouri that I shall call Senators as witnesses here who will testify that I did not mention the Senator from Missouri; and if he is not satisfied with the testimony of Senators, I shall call some clerks around here and the doorkeepers and the press gallery. I made no mention of him.

What I said I shall repeat for the benefit of the Senator from Missouri. I quoted the press report which said that the Senator from North Dakota had referred to President Wilson and Secretary of State Lansing as having lied. The Senator from Missouri was present at the committee meeting. He knows whether that occurred. Did that occur?

Mr. CLARK. That did not.

Mr. CONNALLY. Why does not the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], who the newspaper said made the statement in question, not come here and say to us whether he made that statement or not?

The Senator from Missouri says that he would never on the Senate floor make a statement about an absent Senator.

Why did not his committee practice that sort of thing in the committee when they dragged the grave clothes off of Woodrow Wilson, and dragged his poor body across the committee room and plastered it with the denunciation of having lied? The Senator is so courteous that he will not even talk about an absent Senator, and will not discuss him unless he talks to his face. Yet this committee which is headed by the Senator from North Dakota goes back like a ghoul, like an historical ghoul, and desecrates the sacred resting place of the honored dead.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Does the Senator regard it as pulling the grave clothes off any dead man to read the record immutably written and on file in the State Department of his own official pronouncements?

Mr. CONNALLY. Then the Senator approves what he says the Senator from North Dakota did not say? Does the Senator approve that? Does the Senator say that President Wilson lied?

Mr. CLARK. I will say "no" in answer to the Senator. I did not say President Wilson lied. As a matter of fact, the Senator from North Dakota did not use exactly that language. He did say that the committee would take official cognizance of an official document in the State Department, supported by many subsidiary documents put in evidence, to the effect that the substance of the secret treaties had been communicated to the American State Department, and, on the authority of Mr. Balfour and Mr. Lloyd George, to President Wilson shortly after the entrance of the United States into the World War. I do not say that Wilson lied or falsified, or that Secretary Lansing did when he appeared before the Foreign Relations Committee. I do say there is an obvious inconsistency between the records shown in the State Department files and that testimony. Possibly there was some distinction in the President's mind as to the absolute knowledge that had been conveyed to him which justified him in making that statement. All that I have done, so far as I am concerned, is to put into the RECORD the documents as they appear in the files of the State Department and from other sources.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am glad to have the interruption of the Senator from Missouri. However, Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri is quite willing to take the testimony of Mr. Balfour and Mr. Lloyd George, if there be such testimony, and I am not prepared to deny it, against the testimony of Mr. Wilson. Quite willing. Balfour told the truth. Lloyd George, a foreigner, who wants to induce us to help them, to get into the war——

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. We were already in the war. This was a statement made by him after the United States went into the war, supported both by the testimony of Mr. Balfour and Mr. Lloyd George and Colonel House, and also by documents in the State Department itself.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, this American committee, this patriotic committee, this committee which loves its country so greatly that it is going to pass a rule to prevent any war in the future, is perfectly willing to take the testimony of Lloyd George and Mr. Balfour and call President Wilson a liar. O Mr. President, they speak of these secret documents in the State Department, and they cite this authority for their action. What is the authority that the committee cites for its going back and trying to discover why we went into the World War? Let us see this Magna Carta of the Munitions Committee. This is what the Senator from Missouri says is their authority to do what they are doing:

To investigate and report upon the adequacy or inadequacy of existing legislation—

Existing legislation—

and of the treaties to which the United States is a party—

Now—right now. Not 18 years ago, but today—for the regulation and control of the manufacture of and traffic in arms, munitions, or other implements of war—within the United States, and of the traffic therein between the United States and other countries.

Where is there the authority to go back and impeach the record of America itself as to why we entered the war? Where therein lies even an imaginary authority to question the vote of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] when he voted that the United States should enter the war, and to smear that record all over with the fact that we did not know why we were fighting, and now we are going to find out? Where is there a line here to impeach the record of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], who was here when the declaration of war was made? Where is there a line to impeach the vote of any Senator on the other side of the Chamber as to why he voted that we should enter the World War?

Mr. President, the action of the Munitions Committee is an impeachment before the world of America's own record. It is an impeachment of the action of the Senate and of the House of Representatives. Yet the committee say that because the Senate authorized them to report upon the adequacy of existing legislation with regard to munitions and the manufacture of arms, that they have a right to go back 18 years and hunt out the secret documents in the archives of the State Department!

Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri speaks of the documents which are within the State Department. I can see the ferrets of this committee now—these high-priced expert assistants to the committee, including Mr. Raushenbush or Raushenbottom or some name of that kind—going into the secret files of the State Department, sifting them with microscopes, trying to get something to impeach the record of this country in the World War—something to throw slime over Woodrow Wilson and Secretary Lansing and others who are dead. Oh, yes; great documents! Of course, anybody knows that in the secret files of any government contradiction is going to be found, one man saying this and the other saying that about some matter, just as the Senator from Missouri rushed in here and said that I had mentioned his name and that I had attacked him. That is not true; and yet if the Senator from Missouri had been writing his diary today, unless I had corrected him, he would have set down in his diary that the Senator from Texas, without any warning, had attacked him on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. CLARK. I do not keep a diary.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Missouri says he does not keep a diary. Well, I admire him for not doing it.

Mr. CLARK. Does the Senator from Texas keep a diary?

Mr. CONNALLY. No; not a written one; I keep one in my brain. [Laughter.] I recommend that to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas has a great deal of room in his brain for the purpose of keeping a diary. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNALLY. Absolutely, and other Senators who lack room would do well if they had more room. Of course, I mean my remarks facetiously, because the remarks of the Senator from Missouri were an effort at facetiousness, and I have to reply in kind.

I wonder where the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] is. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must admonish the occupants of the galleries that it is necessary for them to preserve order. They are the guests of the Senate, and the Chair must insist that order prevail.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I am informed that my colleague [Mr. NYE] is acting as chairman of the Munitions Committee in the hearing and questioning the banker from New York City, Mr. Morgan.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, well, if he is after a banker, God speed him! [Laughter.]

Now, about the bankers. The Senator from North Dakota a while ago said that some two-fisted bankers had been brought before the committee, but none of them were called liars, were they? The committee did not get very far with the most of those two-fisted bankers who were called before the committee, if the newspapers are to be believed. Oh, but they have a banker before them and have him cornered over there. What they are going to do to him I do not know, but he belongs to the other party; and God knows, get him if you can, boys. But, Mr. President, a banker is an American citizen just like anybody else.

I hold no brief for bankers. They hold all my notes. That is all the relation I have ever had with bankers. I owned stock in four banks once upon a time; but all except one failed, and that is a very little one in the small town where I was born and where there are only 500 people. That is the size of my banking interest.

But, Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota could have relinquished the chair in the committee to the Senator from Missouri, if he had wanted to come here, but he has not done so. He will probably come tomorrow; but he ought to come here now. I want him to stand up in the Senate and state whether he said what the newspaper quotes him as saying, and I want the reporter who reported the statement in the morning Herald to state whether the Senator said it.

If there is that much doubt and that much controversy between those who were present in the committee yesterday, why is it remarkable that there should be some disagreement, after 18 years, about what happened in the course of an oral conversation during the World War. I submit that to the Senate. Yet, because Mr. Wilson did not agree in his memorandum and in other reports of private conversations with what Mr. Balfour said, or what Mr. Somebody Else said, Mr. Wilson is denounced as a liar.

So far as I am concerned, I have voted just about all the money that I am going to vote from the Treasury of the people of America, who really want peace and who are devoted to peace, to the exploitation of the Committee on Munitions. They have already spent $125,000 and they want $50,000 more. Mr. President, in real truth, the Government would save money if we were to appropriate a lump sum, turn it over to some advertising agency, tell them to devote it to the chairman of the committee, and put the rest of the money in their pockets. [Laughter.]

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have ascertained that the exact amount appropriated for the committee is $125,000, as the Senator from Texas has just said, and all but $400 has already been expended; in other words, $124,600 have already been expended, and the committee has $400 left. So, if the Senate agrees with the Senator about the matter, the activities of the committee can easily be stopped by not voting them any more money.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. The figures are as stated by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], $124,600; but I must say to the Senator that my information is that that is not the entire sum; that the city of New York applied for the establishment of a project to give employment to clerical workers; that such a W. P. A. project was approved, and the workers assigned to the work of the committee. I do not know what expenditures have been made on that account, but during the closing days of the last session a Member of the Senate called it to my attention and I inquired about it and found that was so.

Mr. CONNALLY. How much did the committee get on that account?

Mr. BYRNES. How much money was allocated to the project, I do not know. The project was requested by the city of New York or by someone in its behalf, according to the information obtained by me.

I do not mean to say that the committee was exceeding its powers, for under the language of the original resolution, it had the authority to procure assistance from departments of the Government, but how much assistance the committee received in that manner I do not know.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say just a word, and then I shall yield. I thank the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], because we all know how efficient and active he is as chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate; but does the Senator mean that the Munitions Committee is on the relief roll? [Laughter.] As I understand, the committee got this money on the ground of relief for the workers whom they have employed doing the work of the committee.

Mr. BYRNES. I do not know what prompted the committee to do it; I did not know of it being done until a Member of the Senate asked me about it. I had no information on the subject and so I inquired and ascertained the fact.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, as the Senator from Texas has the floor and seems to cut me off every time I seek to interrupt him, I will wait until he concludes and will then speak in my own time.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall say to the Senator from Missouri that I had yielded to him several times. He said I "cut him off." I had some sort of illusion that I had control of the floor.

Mr. CLARK. That is precisely what I said. The Senator from Texas has the floor, and I would prefer him to occupy his time, and then I will take the floor in my own right.

Mr. CONNALLY. We shall be very happy to have the Senator from Missouri take the floor; we are always glad to have the Senator from Missouri take the floor; we always enjoy his brilliant arguments, sound reasoning, and his wild, enthusiastic presentation of any subject in which he is interested.

I hope the Senator from Missouri when he takes the floor will elaborate somewhat on section (b) of this resolution. Mr. President, section (b) refers to "existing legislation" and existing treaties. For what purpose? "For the regulation and control of the manufacture of and traffic in arms, munitions, or other implements of war within the United States." Where in that section is there any authority to go out and dig up secret treaties of the Allies or of any other nations 18 years ago? I care nothing about those secret treaties; they are water over the dam; they are now embalmed in the diplomatic history of an era that is dead—I hope never to be revived. But where is the authority in the resolution for the committee to go snooping around through the secret files of the State Department and drag out documents of foreign powers and other things of that kind that might embarrass a nation and might cause other governments to charge us with bad faith?

Mr. President, that authority is not written; it was never written by the hand of the Senate; it was not drafted by the draftsmen who drew this resolution, and that power, if there be such power, is only the assumption of the Committee on Munitions and its chairman. They are doing it because nobody stops them. They haul witnesses before them and witnesses come because they do not want to be pilloried at the bar of public opinion as trying to prevent the country having any knowledge which they possess.

So, Mr. President, in conclusion I want to renew here and now the solemn assertion that this resolution contains no authority of the Senate for the committee to go back among the dead and buried figures of the past, the dead and buried papers of the past, the dead and buried relationships of the past, pull them out now before a curious world for the amusement of the public and for the enhancement of the political fortunes of the chairman of the committee.

I must conclude that the Senator from North Dakota used the language credited to him by the press. He knew I was going to speak; he was advised by two or three different people that I was going to talk about this newspaper report, and he is not here. He will come rushing in, probably tomorrow or some other time, with a press release in one hand and a copy of some proceedings over there in the committee in the other hand, and try to make a reply. I want to express the indignation that I feel, and that I am sure is felt by practically every Senator who was here during the World War, at this unseemly, this almost scandalous effort to besmear and besmirch the record of America in the World War. We know why we went to war.

If the Senator from Missouri does not understand why we went to war, if the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] does not understand why we went to war, let them read the resolution for which we voted; let them read the debates in this Chamber and the other Chamber. They will find written there in those indelible records, in those records which neither time nor place nor circumstance can erase, the reasons why America went to war.

Now, after 18 years, those who see visions and who listen to the voices of ghosts, who prowl around the graveyards, come forth and try to tell us, "You think you knew why you went into the war. You did not go into the war because you wanted to. You did not go into the war because Germany sank American ships and murdered American men and women. You did not go into the war because Germany sent her submarines to this side of the ocean in violation of the international law of the world and sent women and children down to watery graves, with the American flag, in some cases, floating above them."

"Oh, no!" the Munitions Committee says, out of the depths of its wisdom, out of its occult powers, out of its marvelous connection with the stars of the heavens which we ordinary mortals never understand. This committee tells us now in solemn pronouncement, "You did not go into the war for these causes. You went into the war because some big bad wolf, a munitions maker, and Mr. Lloyd George bulldozed you into the war, made you go into the war, fooled you into the war, conspired against you and dragged you in while you did not know it." Some international woman of the street, lurking at the corner of an alley, enticed Uncle Sam down the alley and got him into war! [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I know the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] wants to take the floor. I thank the Senate for its attention. I wish to close by challenging the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NYE] to come here and either confirm the language which he is said to have used, or rise on the floor and eat his words.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, it will be necessary for me to detain the Senate very briefly to dispose of the remarks of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. It is perfectly natural that the Senator from Texas should desire to deliver an ad captandum harangue without reading the record of the Munitions Committee and the scope of their investigations and the progress which has been made in the development of facts in connection with the matters which they are investigating, rather than wait until he has done so, because doubtless if he were familiar with the records before the Munitions Committee he would not have had the hardihood to make the remarks which he addressed to the Senate today.

Mr. President, so far as the authority of the Munitions Committee is concerned to investigate into the conduct of the United States during the last war, with a view to proposing legislation which will make such drifting into war impossible in the future, it runs throughout the whole length and breadth of the resolution which the Senate adopted 2 years ago. The very first whereas in the preamble to the resolution sets it forth and it runs throughout the resolution. Let me read the resolution:

Whereas the influence of the commercial motive is an inevitable factor in considerations involving the maintenance of the national defense; and

Whereas the influence of the commercial motive is one of the inevitable factors often believed to stimulate and sustain wars; and

Whereas the Seventy-first Congress, by Public Resolution No. 98, approved June 27, 1930, responding to the long-standing demands of American war veterans speaking through the American Legion for legislation "to take the profit out of war", created a War Policies Commission, which reported recommendations on December 7, 1931, and on March 7, 1932, to decommercialize war and to equalize the burdens thereof; and

Whereas these recommendations never have been translated into the statutes: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a special committee of the Senate shall be appointed by the Vice President to consist of seven Senators, and that said committee be, and is hereby authorized and directed—

(a) To investigate the activities of individuals, firms, associations, and of corporations and all other agencies in the United States engaged in the manufacture, sale, distribution, import, or export of arms, munitions, or other implements of war; the nature of the industrial and commercial organizations engaged in the manufacture of or traffic in arms, munitions, or other implements of war; the methods used in promoting or effecting the sale of arms, munitions, or other implements of war; the quantities of arms, munitions, or other implements of war imported into the United States and the countries of origin thereof and the quantities exported from the United States and the countries of destination thereof; and

(b) To investigate and report upon the adequacy or inadequacy of existing legislation, and of the treaties to which the United States is a party, for the regulation and control of the manufacture of and traffic in arms, munitions, or other implements of war within the United States and of the traffic therein between the United States and other countries; and

(c) To review the findings of the War Policies Commission and to recommend such specific legislation as may be deemed desirable to accomplish the purposes set forth in such findings and in the preamble to this resolution;

That preamble I have just read.

(d) To inquire into the desirability of creating a Government monopoly in respect to the manufacture of armaments and munitions and other implements of war, and to submit recommendations thereon.

Then follow certain other clauses relating to appropriations.

Mr. President, the particular investigation in which we are presently engaged in the Munitions Committee is not only in direct compliance with the direction and authority of the Senate, but, to my mind, it constitutes the most important compliance with the direction of the Senate of all the activities of the Munitions Committee. For some 18 months the Munitions Committee has conducted an exhaustive investigation. I undertake to say in this place that never has so much important information, afforded as a basis of legislation, been obtained for the Senate for such a small cost as has been obtained by the Munitions Committee with the appropriations heretofore made by this body.

Mr. President, it is an amazing thing for the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] to undertake to intimate or to state that the Munitions Committee is exceeding its authority when it investigates the chain of circumstances involving our commercial alinements and the commercial involvements of American citizens ultimately resulting in the involvement of the credit of the United States Government itself, which led us into the war in 1917. I undertake to say if the Senator from Texas had devoted more time to familiarizing himself with what the committee has been doing and less to agitation against the imposition of an oil embargo he might have been better informed than he is today.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. What does the Senator mean by saying something about an oil embargo?

Mr. CLARK. I understand the Senator's activities in the Foreign Relations Committee have been very much devoted to expressing great fear of the imposition of embargoes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Did he say anything about an oil embargo? Does the Senator mean to imply that I was actuated in my efforts in the committee by any interest in an embargo on oil?

Mr. CLARK. I am in no way imputing an unworthy motive to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator has not made any sort of an insinuation like that, he had better not do so.

Mr. CLARK. I will say to the Senator from Texas that I will make any insinuation or any statement that is fit and proper to make when supported by the facts.

Mr. CONNALLY. I think that is true. Does the Senator make it now?

Mr. CLARK. I state to the Senator from Texas that his course, as I understand it——

Mr. CONNALLY. Where does the Senator get his understanding? Does he know anything about it at all? Did he get his understanding from the same man who told him I was talking about him a while ago?

Mr. CLARK. I did not say that.

Mr. CONNALLY. I wish to say to the Senator from Missouri that the Senator from Texas has never mentioned oil in the Foreign Relations Committee in all the discussion of these matters. If it is the habit of the Senator from Missouri to be actuated by improper motives, it does not necessarily follow that any other Senator is.

Mr. CLARK. I stated to the Senator from Texas just a moment ago that I was imputing to him no improper motives, but I repeat that if the Senator from Texas, before he took the floor to make a speech about it, had devoted himself as assiduously to finding out what had been going on in the Munitions Committee, he probably would not have made the speech which he has made here today.

What the Munitions Committee is presently doing, in order to afford a basis of facts for the consideration of the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States and the executive departments of the Government in the formulation of new neutrality legislation and the formulation of future foreign policies of the Government, is to submit, so far as we have been able to find it, insofar as we have been able to develop it, the record of everything that happened from the beginning of the World War in 1914 until the entrance of the United States into the war in 1917. It is very easy for the Senator from Texas to quote a resolution, with which we are all familiar, affording the basis of the declaration of war—the resolution in which the United States declared it was about to go to war. That is a very different matter from painstakingly digging out the commercial involvements which began immediately after the declaration of war in Europe in 1914, which step by step took the United States along a course which could lead only to war, by their commitments on one side as against another, if the war lasted long enough to drag us in. To say that we went to war because of the sinking of some ships, with the loss of some American lives, is very different from developing painstakingly, step by step, the fact that the United States at one time had an opportunity to prevent the continuance of unrestricted submarine warfare, and, for fear of offending Great Britain and the other Allies, refused to push its advantage and stop permanently such unrestricted submarine warfare.

So far as secret treaties are concerned, I have not said, and I have not intimated, that President Wilson or Secretary Lansing falsified the record. I did place in the record, as I felt it my duty to do, and as I would do again whenever the question might come up, the evidence upon the subject, showing evident inconsistency in the statements made by President Wilson and Secretary Lansing at a later date to the Committee on Foreign Relations. As to the explanation of what was in the minds of President Wilson and Secretary Lansing as to the inconsistency of their statements that they had not been apprised of the secret treaties between the Allies, I have not undertaken to make an estimate.

I repeat, Mr. President, that it has been the duty of the Munitions Committee, as we have understood it, to arrive at all the facts pertinent to the issues committed to us by the Senate, and to place those facts in the record without fear and without favor to anybody. I may say in passing that we have placed in the record facts to which former President Hoover very seriously objected. We have placed in the record facts to which the friends of former President Coolidge very seriously objected. We have not hesitated to place in the record at any time any facts concerning any of the issues submitted to us which seemed to us to be pertinent to the investigation we were instructed by the Senate to pursue.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], as is always the case with a man who has a weak cause, sought to insinuate that somebody had told him somewhere that in the Committee on Foreign Relations the Senator from Texas was very much concerned about an embargo in time of war with foreign countries, because of his interest in oil.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. Let me say to the Senator from Texas that I had no notion of intimating that the Senator from Texas had specified oil in the Committee on Foreign Relations. I, of course, am not a member of that committee. I was told that the Senator had been rather vigorously opposing the proposition to authorize the imposition of embargoes, particularly at the present time. Inasmuch as the question of oil embargoes had been more to the fore than the imposition of any other embargo, it was fair to conclude that that was the one in the Senator's mind. Let me say to the Senator from Texas that I have no disposition or desire whatever to impute to him any unworthy motive.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the Senator do me the kindness of stating who told him that I did that?

Mr. CLARK. I prefer not to do that. It was a member of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations; and I do not think the Senator from Texas will deny that he has been opposing this matter of embargo.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall tell the Senator what I have done. I have to tell him now. It relates to the proceedings of an executive session, but I have to tell him; and I hope the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] will remain in the Chamber, because I may need his testimony.

The Senator from Missouri is suspicious that every Senator has some secret motive, some improper reason for action. Let me say to the Senator that if I had been concerned about an embargo on oil, as the representative of the greatest oil-producing State in the Nation, it probably would have been a part of my duty here to see that oil received at least fair treatment; but I think the Senator from California will testify, if his testimony would be satisfactory to the Senator from Missouri, that I have never mentioned oil in the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let me say that if any man is guilty of mentioning oil in the Foreign Relations Committee, I am that man. I am the one who asked the Secretary of State whether or not there had been an embargo upon oil to Italy. I asked the question with the distinct purpose which readily I avow. I do not want this country to be levying sanctions upon any nation on the face of the earth at the behest of Great Britain or Great Britain's League of Nations. I do not want—and I say it frankly—to lead the way in sanctions in this difficulty abroad, so that again America will be out on a limb, and America will be leading in a European controversy. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator. The Senator has stated the facts, and I thank him.

Mr. President, I now desire to state, for the benefit of the Senator from Missouri, and for the benefit of every other Senator who is interested, just what the Senator from Texas has done in the secret meetings of the Committee on Foreign Relations. Evidently, if the Senator from Missouri got any information from that committee, he got it in violation of the rules of the Senate, because its proceedings were secret, and he says they were secret. Evidently the Senator, through some of his friends or the employees of his Munitions Committee, has a way of getting information that is secret and is not supposed to be divulged to the outside world.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator knows very well that I have no means of getting information from the Foreign Relations Committee through any employees of the Munitions Committee. The statement was made to me by a colleague of the Senator and of myself.

Mr. CONNALLY. A member of the Committee on Foreign Relations! Ah! I would not break faith with a man who told me in public what had transpired in a secret committee meeting if I were the Senator from Missouri. I would respect that confidence. The Senator from Missouri secures from a brother Senator information as to a secret, executive transaction of a committee and then he gets up on the floor and divulges it! I am astonished.

Here is what the Senator from Texas did in the Foreign Relations Committee: We have pending before us a bill known as the Pittman bill. I shall ask to have a copy of the bill sent to me. I think it is section 9 of the bill which provides that in time of war the President of the United States may embargo the exportation to a belligerent country of materials which may be used in war over and above the normal amount of those materials which has been going to that country in time of peace.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, section 4 is the one referred to.

Mr. CONNALLY. Section 4 is the one which provides for the embargo. Section 9, however, provides that if an American citizen is carrying on with a nation at war, or with a neutral nation, or with anybody else, commerce in commodities in the normal amount that is carried on in time of peace, which he has a perfect right to carry on, and which the Government of the United States says he has a right to carry on, the United States Government will not protect him, but that he shall do it at his own risk.

I opposed that. The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] opposed it. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] opposed it. There was no mention of any particular kind of commodity. God knows I am one Senator who does not want war; but when an American citizen is carrying on a legal trade with a foreign power under the explicit permission of his own Government I will not vote for a joint resolution or an amendment to a statute empowering the Government to say to him that he has to go into these places of danger robbed of his character as an American citizen, without any protection; that the United States will not assert its power to protect him. I will not vote for a measure of that kind even though it may be sponsored by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] and that courageous knight of peace, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE].

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. The provisions of the bill, as I understand, are also sponsored by the President of the United States.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am not one of those who accept everything that the President of the United States approves. That argument comes with good grace from the Senator from Missouri. Is that his course here? No. I like to agree with the President of the United States; I like to be in harmony with his views; but the Senator from Texas is not the kind of Senator who feels that it is his duty to divest himself of his own responsibility and his own conscience and his own duty to his people to vote as he thinks he ought to vote here in the Senate of the United States.

The Senator from Missouri is greatly comforted by the thought that the President of the United States and he agree on this subject. He has not had that comfort very often since the present administration has been in power, judging by some of his votes in this body.

Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri says, "Why, this authority is as clear as the noonday sun." Let us see.

Why do not the Munitions Committee go back and investigate the Spanish-American War? They have as much right to investigate the Spanish-American War as they have to investigate the World War. Why did we enter the Spanish-American War? Did not the bankers drag us into it? Did not the great sugar interests in New York, owning sugar plantations in Cuba, bring us in?

Why do not these investigatory individuals, these marvelous experts, go back and settle the causes of the War between the States? You know, we have been debating for about 75 years the causes of the War between the States, and we never yet have agreed on them. Here is the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE], good Democrat that he is. I doubt if he and I could ever agree as to the causes and the justice and right of the outcome of the War between the States. That is a matter which the Senate ought to investigate. We ought to know what really produced and brought about the War between the States.

It will be remembered that there was once a war with Mexico. Why can we not have this committee look into that matter? It is a very serious thing. Of course, the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], who sits before me, would object, no doubt, because if it had not been for the Mexican War he would be living down in Mexico, eating frijoles and hot tamales. [Laughter.] As a result of the Mexican War we acquired New Mexico, Arizona, California, Nevada, Utah, Oregon, and part of Idaho and Wyoming. But really we ought to go back and see about that, and get the real truth as to what brought about the war between the United States and Mexico.

Did Senators ever stop to think about what produced the Revolutionary War? [Laughter.] Have they ever really deliberated properly upon the great issues that were involved? If they will remember, they will recall that old Benjamin Franklin spent a great deal of his time in Paris; negotiating with whom? With munition makers, with this man whose name we see connected with the Du Ponts—de Nemours. It was the ancestor of the Du Ponts from whom the American Colonies bought some of their munitions in France during the War of the Revolution. In God's name why does not the committee go back and find out the truth about that, and bring it back and give it to us, so that we can legislate on munitions? In these trying, troubled days of the Republic, we ought to know more of the birth pains of this great old Republic of ours, in order that we may know why the Revolutionary War was fought, who brought it about, and how it resulted.

Of course, Mr. President, that is all persiflage; but it shows how ridiculous is the claim of this committee that carrying out subsection (b), because it authorizes it to investigate existing laws with relation to munitions in America, it should go out and smell around to find what happened 18 years ago; to go around every chancelry and every old musty file of the State Department and walk down every whispering gallery in Europe and in America and dig up all of the gossip and all of the diplomatic chicanery of which it can find record in an effort to besmirch America's own records in the World War.

If the clerks have gotten the volume containing the proceedings of the Congress showing the vote at the time of the World War, I shall ask them to bring it to me. The Senator from Missouri said I had been very indolent and had not given proper attention to the Munitions Committee, that if I had just thrown aside everything else and had devoted myself to the wonderful and marvelous achievements of the Munitions Committee I would have been a much better Senator. I know I could make a much better Senator doing differently from what I have been doing, but with these industrious Senators on the committee, we have imposed this great responsibility on them.

The rest of us humble men—we men who do not get our names in the papers often; we men who have to devote ourselves to the details of looking after our constituents back at home and try to represent their interests now and then, instead of our own—have vested this responsibility with the Committee on Munitions; and, in all good conscience, I submit to the Senator from Missouri that he should not expect me to devote all of my time to the Committee on Munitions, because I do not think even they do that. I do not think the Senator from North Dakota devotes all of his time to it. I see that he flies over the country in an airplane and delivers a speech somewhere in order to prevent war; then he rises like the great soaring eagle and alights over yonder and makes another speech. Of course, he cannot be laboring in a committee while he is doing that—unless he does it by remote control. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for April 5, 1917, the proceedings of the House of Representatives, where is set forth the language of the resolution declaring war. I remember it, because that was the first vote I had to cast when I came to the House—a vote on the declaration of war. I was placed on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and I had to vote on it before Congress itself voted.

Mr. President, I never faced a vote that gave me so much concern, or made me search my conscience and my heart, as that vote did. We did not approach it frivolously; we approached it with all of the solemnity of men realizing that by that vote we would either plunge this Nation into war, and, perhaps, send out upon the scarlet field of battle his fellow citizens, or that we would put this country in the position before the world of being unwilling to protect its own citizens, being unwilling to vindicate their rights on the high seas, being unwilling to stand up and vouch for American commerce and American lives.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Does the Senator recall whether or not anything was written in the Versailles Treaty as to the intentions of the United States concerning the rights of commerce and the freedom of the seas? I think the Senator will search that document in vain for one single word about the intentions of the United States.

Mr. CONNALLY. What has that to do with this?

Mr. CLARK. It has a great deal to do with it.

Mr. CONNALLY. What has it to do with it?

Mr. CLARK. It has a very great deal to do with it.

Mr. CONNALLY. For the information of the Senator, I shall say that the United States and practically all the other countries, before the war and since the war, have contended for the principle of the freedom of the seas. I shall say to the Senator from Missouri, however, that in time of war whatever nation has a navy big enough and strong enough and courageous enough to control the seas, dictates what contraband shall be, and, of course, to that extent interrupts the freedom of the seas. But is that any reason why, because some strong and militant power denies her citizens their unquestioned right under international law, simply because a big, bad bully comes to town and starts to shoot, we should go home, lock the door, and crawl under the bed? I deny it.

Mr. President, I apologize to the Senate for the consumption of its time. I invite the Senator from Missouri to reread the declaration of war with Germany; to reread the thrilling and stirring messages which Woodrow Wilson sent to the Senate and to the House of Representatives, cataloging the outrages and the wrongs which had been inflicted upon his and my country; to read the debates of men who were, under their oaths, to represent their constituencies and to perform their public duties. That is a solemn and a splendid chapter in the history of parliamentary government in the United States. Let us leave it alone. Let us not sully it. Let us not smear it all over with slime, bedaub it with personal or partisan hate or poisonous epithets, after 18 long years.

Woodrow Wilson's body sleeps out yonder in the great cathedral, but his spirit stands today among the great figures of history. I remember a story about Stonewall Jackson: It was said that after he had been wounded at Chancellorsville, lingered a few days, and then died, a great state funeral was held for him, and his body lay in state. His officers came by and took one last long look at their dead chieftain.

Finally one young lieutenant, in a ragged gray jacket, approached the bier, came to salute, and said, "Great General, I salute you. I was with you at the First Battle of Manassas. I followed your plume in the Shenandoah Valley. I was with you at Cedar Mountain and at Antietam. I was with you in the Peninsular campaign and those seven desperate days before Richmond." He said, "Great General, if thou art now with Caesar and with Hannibal and with Napoleon, tell them that your soldiers still know how to make war."

Mr. President, the spirit of Woodrow Wilson is now with the great figures of the past, but some of us who loved him, some of us who honored him, are unwilling to stand mute in the presence of his traducers and those who would heap ignominy upon his memory.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas is entirely mistaken in saying that I ever accused him of being indolent or of neglecting his duty. I said only, and I say only, that while the Senator always speaks brilliantly and eloquently, frequently with great wit, he would speak much better on any occasion if he knew what he was talking about. [Laughter.] I say only that the Senator from Texas could speak with much greater effect as to the course taken by the Munitions Committee if he knew what the Munitions Committee had been doing.

Mr. CONNALLY. We should all be very glad to know what they have been doing with that $125,000.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will read the record, he can find out. The Senator can find out by going to the disbursing office of the Senate. He can find very voluminous results of the investigation by reading the record instead of talking about it. I say the Senator could speak much more eloquently, possibly with as much wit, and certainly with much more force, if he were familiar with the subject about which he has been talking.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Texas is familiar with the record.

Mr. CLARK. Let me say to the Senator from Texas that a considerable amount of time has been taken up in the Senate with reports of the Munitions Committee, and a considerable amount of time will be taken up in the future. The Senator from Texas prefers to speak without the record. He prefers to indulge in persiflage——

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I rose to discuss what happened in the Munitions Committee yesterday. I went to the committee and asked for the record. They said it would not be ready for 2 or 3 days. I had, therefore, to take the secondary evidence, the next best evidence, which was the newspaper account, and which is undenied.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator can secure the stenographer's notes. Let me say to the Senator that the galley proofs will come out in 2 or 3 days. If the Senator from Texas desires at any time to refer to and view the stenographer's notes, I shall be glad to see that he gets them.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall be glad to have just that much—just the few words—of what the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] said about Mr. Wilson.

Mr. CLARK. Any member of the committee will be glad to see that the Senator gets the notes.

The Senator from Texas, as I started to say, prefers to indulge in persiflage by talking about the Civil War, and the War of 1812, and the Mexican War, and the Revolutionary War rather than to come down to the cold facts of the record as they have been produced before the Munitions Committee.

Mr. President, I say it is no reflection on Woodrow Wilson, or Robert Lansing, or any Member of the House or Senate who voted for the declaration of war, to put into the record the cold documents and the cold facts as to the course of conduct and the surrounding circumstances which dragged the United States into the war in 1917.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I will yield in just a minute.

I will say further, Mr. President, that the neutrality laws of the United States having been until last August precisely what they were when the war broke out in 1917, there is no way on the face of the earth by which the Munitions Committee can so intelligently provide the basis for intelligent action by the Senate and the House of Representatives, looking to the future neutrality of the United States and the prevention of future wars, as by the study of all the surrounding circumstances which led us into the war in 1917. I say there is no way on earth by which the Munitions Committee could so efficiently carry out the mandate of this body as by going into the surrounding circumstances of those unhappy events and putting them, without fear or favor, into the record, so that he who runs may read, and so that any Member of this body or of the House of Representatives may draw his own conclusions therefrom.

If the Senator from Texas considers that that is dragging the grave clothes from any man, if the Senator from Texas considers that there are events which should be kept secret, that there are events which the Congress of the United States should not be permitted to know in formulating future neutrality legislation, or that the public of the United States should not be permitted to know in making up its mind about future neutrality legislation, then the Senator from Texas is entitled to his opinion; but I beg to differ with him fully and wholeheartedly.

I now yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator. I do not wish to trespass on the Senator's time, but there is one thing I desire to ask him. He says that it is perfectly proper—and I am not discussing that with him—to put these documents into the record. Was the Senator present yesterday when the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] was present, as the newspaper report says?

Mr. CLARK. I was.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Missouri was the one who put the documents into the record, as I recall?

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. The comment of the Senator from North Dakota was not a document, and it was not a record. Did the Senator from North Dakota say, as attributed to him in the newspaper, from which I quote?—

Then Wilson and Lansing lied.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from North Dakota did not say that.

Mr. CONNALLY. What did he say?

Mr. CLARK. So far as I can recall the expression used by the Senator from North Dakota—I shall not undertake to quote him verbatim—what he said, in effect, was that President Wilson and Secretary Lansing had falsified the record.

Mr. CONNALLY. Had falsified the record?

Mr. CLARK. Had falsified the record. That is my recollection.

Mr. CONNALLY. He said they had falsified the record?

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. In what respect, if the Senator had the documents there, had they falsified the record? Had they erased something, or inserted something, or how had they falsified the record?

Mr. CLARK. I shall have to ask the Senator from North Dakota to answer that question. I concluded that he made that remark on the basis of the fact that the record before the committee indicated that knowledge of the secret treaties between the Allies had been conveyed to the United States Government shortly after the entrance of the United States into the war in 1917, and that subsequently, at the end of the war, in his appearance before the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, the Secretary denied such knowledge.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the Senator from Missouri know a correspondent on the Washington Herald by the name of Don Ewing?

Mr. CLARK. Yes. I paddled him when he was a freshman at George Washington. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator paddled him when he was a freshman, but now he is not a freshman. Mr. Ewing says:

As this developed, NYE turned to CLARK and said: "Then it is clear that both President Wilson and Secretary Lansing lied when they stated from time to time they had no knowledge of these secret treaties."

Mr. Ewing says that occurred, and the Senator from Missouri says it did not occur.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Texas is as familiar with newspapermen as am I; and he is also familiar with the fact that in giving a running account of a hearing or a debate in the Senate, in undertaking to report exactly what happened, newspapermen frequently paraphrase the expressions, or put words into the mouths of men—either Senators or otherwise—which are not exactly what they used. I acquit Mr. Ewing of any intention of misquoting the Senator from North Dakota, but my own recollection is not in accordance with Mr. Ewing's report.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am satisfied to have voted for the resolution under which the committee has acted. I realized that valuable information could be obtained under it. However, I cannot understand how the documents introduced yesterday by the Senator from Missouri which started this debate could in any sense be material to the investigation.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I repeat what I said to the Senator from Texas a little while ago—that the Munitions Committee was instructed to report upon the adequacy or inadequacy of existing legislation, and there is no finer laboratory test of the adequacy or inadequacy of existing legislation than the record of events which transpired during the World War, and prior to our entrance into it, which resulted in the United States drifting into a state of war which has left us holding the sack with billions of dollars of allied loans on our hands.

Mr. PITTMAN. As I understand from the press reports—if I am incorrect in my understanding, I should like to be corrected—certain statements were recorded by Mr. Balfour in his diary with relation to some conversations he had with President Wilson following a dinner at the White House after we went into the war.

Mr. CLARK. That is entirely correct.

Mr. PITTMAN. In those statements, Balfour is alleged to have stated that the President was fully familiar with the arrangements between the Allies as to what would probably take place after victory, if it happened. Then Lloyd George in his book confirms the diary by stating that he had a conversation with Balfour in which Balfour said that was the conversation he had with Wilson.

Mr. CLARK. That is perfectly correct.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. Lansing testified before the committee that the administration did not know anything about those treaties.

Mr. CLARK. I will say further, for the edification of the Senator from Nevada, that I also placed in the record documents from Ambassador Walter H. Page in London, Ambassador Thomas Nelson Page at Rome, and Ambassador Francis at St. Petersburg, in greater or lesser degree putting the United States on notice as to those secret treaties, and also certain extracts from the diary of Colonel House indicating knowledge of the treaties on the part of the then administration.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is not material. I am simply getting a picture of the weight of this evidence. We were already in the war when this information came to the President, if it did come to the President. We were in the war; so the information had nothing to do with getting us into the war.

Mr. CLARK. That is perfectly true.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not mean to say that Balfour did not have certain things in his diary, and that Lloyd George did not confirm them. I do not say that Page's letters are not true. However, I do not believe the evidence discloses that the President knew what was in those treaties.

Mr. CLARK. I will say to the Senator from Nevada that as chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee and having access to the State Department documents, he can very readily satisfy himself on that point.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am talking about the evidence which the Senator introduced. It does not show that the President knew what was in those treaties. It may be evidence that he knew there were treaties between the Allies. Be that as it may, that is the evidence the Senator introduced. It is in regard to something which came to the President's attention after we were in he war. Therefore, it could have nothing on earth to do with taking us into the war.

Mr. CLARK. Let me say, if the Senator will permit me, that that matter was put into the record, as I stated in putting it in, for the purpose of showing that whatever may have been the aim of the United States in entering the war, once in the war we were committed to the status quo which would be maintained by our allies; and that after we were in the war, no matter what may have been our purpose in joining our new allies, we were forced, willy-nilly, to go along with our allies in those matters concerning which treaties had been made.

Mr. PITTMAN. If the Munitions Committee was authorized to investigate what was the effect of going into a war which already existed, I can see where it would be material, because it would prove that when we joined the warring forces we would indissolubly be tied with them.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada may say that the Senate intended the Munitions Committee to go right up to the declaration of war, but that it should be unable to follow to their logical conclusion the steps which led us into the war, as showing how we were led to make vast advances to the Allies which have never been recovered. If he can do that, he is entitled to that view. I cannot conceive that the Senate intended any such fruitless purpose; that with the whole train of consequences the study should be stopped as of the date of our declaration of war.

Mr. PITTMAN. What legislation would the Senator suggest to prevent a President, after our Government had joined in a war with several allies as we did in 1917, from being told about treaties into which they had already entered?

Mr. CLARK. I have no desire to prevent the President being told about their having treaties. The Senator from Nevada evidently does not understand the trend of the whole proceeding. It seems to me of highest importance, in studying the basis for legislation to keep us out of war, to consider also what happened to us after we got into the war, how the purposes for which we entered the war may have been frustrated, how the United States was compelled to change completely its position and bear practically the whole cost of the war, and how ultimately, instead of accomplishing the purposes which President Wilson had so eloquently set out on many occasions, particularly in his 14 points, secret treaties of which he had no knowledge until we had entered the war came up to thwart and frustrate those purposes.

Mr. PITTMAN. Of course, if the Senator is trying to prove that war is a very disastrous thing, I do not think he needs any evidence——

Mr. CLARK. We are trying to show exactly what happened.

Mr. PITTMAN. Let me finish the sentence, if the Senator please. If the Senator is trying to prove that war is a very disastrous thing, and that particularly war is disastrous when our Government combines with the governments already in the war, we must admit it. If the Senator is trying to prove that, when we are forced into a war as the allies of somebody else because of circumstances, it is always an unfortunate circumstance and we are always liable to suffer by reason of the acts of our allies; everybody knows that. But if he conceives that the Senate, under that resolution, wanted his committee to investigate every detail of the horrors of the war, every detail of the result of the war, every detail of the treaties of peace that were made, for the purpose of recommending legislation to this body with regard to munitions, then I say the work of the committee would be interminable. It would have to enter into an historic work which might take 20 years or more, with a very much larger force than the committee now has. There is no legislation which he can suggest here that would prevent that very thing occurring which he said did occur.

Mr. CLARK. Permit me to suggest, so far as the work of the Munitions Committee is concerned, that if it never does anything else or never has done anything else, at least the investigation of that committee has resulted in the Senator from Nevada introducing, as an administration measure, a very far-reaching neutrality bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUFFY in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield further to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think the Senator from Missouri is attempting to compliment me, and I desire to thank him; but I think he is complimenting himself more highly than he is the Senator from Nevada in saying that the work of the Senator from Missouri is responsible for the thoughts of the Senator from Nevada. I think I discussed neutrality for years before I ever heard of the Munitions Committee.

Mr. CLARK. Undoubtedly the Senator from Nevada has discussed neutrality on many occasions, but it was not until after certain resolutions were introduced as a result of the investigation of the Committee on Munitions—and, as a matter of fact, after the filibuster was started by members of the Munitions Committee at the close of the last session—that any action was taken. I am very happy to have the Senator from Nevada introduce the measure and take charge of it, and particularly happy to have it introduced as an administration measure; but I submit that if it had not been for the filibuster started by members of the Munitions Committee in the last days of the last session, probably that legislation never would have come into this body.

Mr. PITTMAN. I did not know the Senator from Missouri had that idea. I knew the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] had it because the night we adjourned, when he spoke over the radio, he said the Munitions Committee had forced the Foreign Relations Committee to act. I wish to say that before the filibuster took place the Foreign Relations Committee had already directed me to report that measure. I am perfectly confident that members of the Munitions Committee knew it had been ordered to be reported and started the filibuster for the purpose of getting credit for having done something that they did not in fact do.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to absolve myself of any such purpose. The Senator from North Dakota and I appeared before the Foreign Relations Committee on several occasions. It was understood Congress was going to adjourn in the next 2 or 3 days, which was the occasion for the filibuster. I have no desire whatever to rob the Foreign Relations Committee or the distinguished Senator from Nevada of any credit for neutrality legislation. I hope he will ask to have it taken up at a very early date and push it to a final conclusion.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am sorry the Senator from Missouri said that, because if we report that bill during the coming week he will charge us with having been forced to that action by his statement.

Mr. CLARK. If it will interfere with the Senator from Nevada taking prompt action in reporting an administration measure of that sort, I will withdraw the statement, because I would not have the Senator from Nevada have any reason not to report such an administration measure and push it to a successful conclusion.

Mr. PITTMAN. I have never attacked the Munitions Committee. I realize that their work in investigating war profits and investigating the munitions question has been quite pertinent and quite valuable. I have not believed that it was within their jurisdiction to go into a great many matters which they have investigated. As I have said, I cannot quite see how the evidence which the Senator has just put in the RECORD is at all material or how it will aid him in the formulation of any legislation to be proposed to this body.

So far as the Foreign Relations Committee is concerned, I wish to speak for the members of the committee and not for myself. A bill was introduced by the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE]. It was considered by the President of the United States when the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from North Dakota and myself were present. It was fully discussed there. There were some questions which were not definitely agreed upon, but in substance it was agreed upon. At that time I introduced in behalf of the administration, as I have at this session, a bill which contained some of the important provisions of the other bill. The committee proceeded immediately to the consideration of both bills. I think the Senator knows that we were in session nearly every day for 2 weeks—at least every other day. The Senator from Missouri complimented us upon our energy in the matter.

Mr. CLARK. I repeat that compliment.

Mr. PITTMAN. We took the Senator's bill and the administration bill and wrote another bill embracing the ideas of both bills as nearly as we could.

Mr. CLARK. That is entirely correct.

Mr. PITTMAN. There was no delay in the committee. Even those who opposed it did not delay its consideration. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] opposed it, but he did not delay its consideration. He attended every meeting, and we met every day until we had other committee meetings to attend, and then we met every other day, and inside of 2 weeks we reported the bill. We have other bills for consideration in the same way now. We have already had four meetings. We are to have another meeting tomorrow morning.

It is the intention, already expressed, of every member of that committee, whether he agrees with the bill or not, to report it at the earliest possible moment. I do not want the Senator to think that the committee is delaying the matter in any way. I am not speaking for myself because the Senator knows I favor this kind of legislation. I am speaking for those on the committee who do not favor it. They have never yet attempted in any way whatever to obstruct a report on the bill.

Mr. CLARK. I intended no such suggestion as that. Everything the Senator from Nevada says in that regard is entirely correct. My suggestion as to the filibuster went merely to the point that it had been announced that adjournment would be had in 2 or 3 days, without any suggestions, so far as the program of the Senate was concerned, of consideration of neutrality legislation.

I had no thought then, nor have I now, of reflecting on the Foreign Relations Committee, and certainly not on its distinguished chairman, with reference to the consideration which was given to that legislation. As the chairman suggests, I personally appeared at four or five hearings before the Foreign Relations Committee while the matter was under consideration.

Mr. PITTMAN. I wish to say, however, because possibly it is not generally known, that on the morning of the filibuster—which started at noon and lasted 2 or 3 hours—before the filibuster, the committee had voted to report the bill, and I was authorized to make certain corrections in it which the committee desired made. Those corrections were being typewritten, and when some of the members of the Munitions Committee were filibustering the report on the bill was being finally drafted, and the bill was reported to the Senate while the filibuster was going on.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Nevada undoubtedly is aware of the fact that the filibuster started because of the statement to the newspaper men at large, out here in the President's room, by a very high ranking officer of the majority of the Senate, that there would be no neutrality legislation at that session of Congress.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. CLARK. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. I seek information, not only as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee but as a Member of the Senate.

I observe in the discussions between the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Missouri, each eminent in his place, that the resolution under which the munitions committee are acting, among other authorizations, gives them authority to investigate existing treaties. May I ask the able Senator from Missouri whether the munitions committee regards or treats the treaties which connected us with the war and its operations as still existing treaties, despite the assumption that those treaties were dissolved in the peace treaty at Versailles and the general peace arrangements between our country and the Allies and the enemies?

Mr. CLARK. Certainly not, Mr. President. The only references to treaties which bound the United States to its Allies have been in connection with the study of the war itself, and the steps leading up to it. So far as I am advised, nobody contends for a moment that the treaties to which the Senator refers are still in force and effect.

I may say that a typical illustration of the study of treaties which has come up in connection with the munitions investigation had to do with the treaty which we found with one South American country, for instance, which prevented the President of the United States from imposing an embargo on the exportation of arms to that country when he so desired to do, simply because of a provision to that effect in a treaty some 70 years old. As a result of that investigation, the Munitions Committee now has pending in this body a resolution authorizing the President to denounce that treaty.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. This discussion was precipitated by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] because of an article in a newspaper this morning attributing to the chairman of the Munitions Committee the statement that Woodrow Wilson had lied. The recollection of the Senator from Missouri is that the chairman of the committee did not say that. I should like to inquire if the chairman of the committee at the session today called attention to any misquotation on the part of the press and asked that it be corrected?

Mr. CLARK. Not so far as I am advised.

Mr. BARKLEY. Let me ask another question, purely for information, because the statement has been dropped in here in connection with the amount of money expended by the committee that after the $125,000 had been exhausted, or was approaching exhaustion, some arrangement was made by which a relief project of the State of New York was made available for the investigation of the committee. Does the Senator know about that?

Mr. CLARK. I will say to the Senator from Kentucky that I am not very familiar with that; but I am advised that during the past winter a Work Relief project for clerical workers was established in the city of New York, and that certain persons from the Work Relief project were turned over to the investigator of the Munitions Committee simply for the purpose of copying records, and that sort of thing.

Mr. BARKLEY. Were they persons who were in New York or in Washington?

Mr. CLARK. They were persons who were in New York, and were already engaged on the Work Relief project.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator know what their employment cost?

Mr. CLARK. I have no information whatever about that; but I was advised that certain clerical assistance had been rendered by the Work Relief Administration to the munitions investigation.

Mr. CONNALLY subsequently said: Mr. President, it developed in the discussion this afternoon that the Munitions Committee has only $400 left in its treasury. I wish to serve notice here and now that the Senator from Texas and quite a number of other Senators are going to take whatever action is possible to see that no deficits are created by that committee. I wish to give public notice now that the Munitions Committee had better not spend any more money than they have been authorized to spend, because, if we can prevent it, they are not going to get any more.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I take it the Senator from Texas has a right to take any action on legislation he pleases as an individual Senator, but not to speak for the Senate of the United States.

Mr. CONNALLY. I did not undertake to speak for the Senate. I am speaking for myself and several other Senators with whom I have consulted; and I serve notice now that if the Munitions Committee comes here with a great big wad of deficits under the plea that "these poor workers" have to be paid, if we can prevent it they are not going to be paid. The committee have $400. Let them spend that $400.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, that remark on the part of the Senator from Texas is entirely uncalled for. The Munitions Committee has never turned up here with a great big deficit. That is entirely a gratuitous remark on the part of the Senator from Texas.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2288) to provide for the measurement of vessels using the Panama Canal, and for other purposes.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] if he thinks, in the light of the debate which has just taken place, the Senate is ready to vote on the pending bill at this time?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma that the Senator from Oregon is not on the floor at the moment.

Mr. McNARY entered the Chamber.

Mr. GORE. In view of the return of the Senator from Oregon, I desire to renew my request for unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside and its consideration resumed and pursued to final disposition when the bonus bill shall have been disposed of. I will say to the Senator from Oregon that I am sure the debate will not last very long. There are three Senators on the other side who desire to be heard briefly and one or two on this side. I wish to dispose of the bill.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, that carries out the purpose I suggested earlier in the day. It throws the discussion over until another day. I shall make no objection to a unanimous-consent agreement that we may temporarily lay aside the unfinished business until we shall have concluded the discussion of the bonus bill and had a vote upon it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I suggest that the language of the unanimous-consent agreement be such that it will not carry a mandatory requirement that we shall take up the Panama Canal bill on the same day on which the consideration of the bonus bill shall be completed.

Mr. McNARY. Oh, no; that would not follow.

Mr. BARKLEY. It might be late in the day.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, it would be a convenience to the sponsors of Senate bill 3398, and it is our understanding that it would also be a convenience to the Senators from Illinois who are opposed to that measure, if the special order which appears on the face of the printed calendar of business for today may be made the second order of the Senate's unfinished business. It is developing that one unanimous-consent agreement after another is pushing the special order of the Senate further and further down the parliamentary line on the face of the printed calendar.

So far as the sponsors of the bill are concerned, there is, of course, no objection to laying aside the special order if more pressing public business requires that course; but it does appear unfair to have an unintended displacement of the special order. The Senate is never consciously unfair in such matters, nor are the able Senate leaders on either side. Therefore, it is suggested that if we may have an understanding now that the special order may follow the unfinished business relating to the measure of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], as a second and similar unanimous-consent agreement for unfinished business, it will prove a convenience, I think, to all concerned.

Mr. GORE. I have no objection to that.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, as the Senator from Colorado has stated, the Senators from Illinois are opposed to this measure; but as the Senator from Colorado desires that some formal postponement of it be made under some order of the Senate, and intimates that he assumes such a course would not be objected to by the Senators from Illinois, I desire to say, as to myself, that I am willing to have an indefinite postponement of the matter or to have the whole measure laid on the table. Since neither course is proposed by the Senator from Colorado, however, I desire to have him understand that I shall gladly cooperate in whatever will meet the convenience of himself and his colleague and conform to the order already entered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests that some Senator state the terms of the proposed unanimous-consent agreement, so that it may be submitted to the Senate.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I desire to make a statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. In the absence of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], let me say that the Senator from Colorado mentioned the status that might be assumed by his bill in the event the agreement already suggested about the bill of the Senator from Oklahoma should be entered into. Subject to any contingency that may arise some time next week with respect to emergent or more important legislation, I think it is entirely desirable that following the bill of the Senator from Oklahoma unanimous consent be given to take up the bill of the Senator from Colorado; and such an arrangement is entirely satisfactory to me. I do not believe the Senator from Colorado made the request. I will make the request in addition. Probably it should not be complicated with this other matter. We can agree on the pending matter and then submit the other request.

Mr. GORE. The suggested arrangement will be entirely satisfactory to me. My purpose is to arrive at some sort of understanding with regard to the unfinished business.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, when the Senator from Oklahoma presented his bill on Monday I objected to a final vote on that day, but asked that consideration of the measure might be carried over until Thursday, which is today. The lateness of the hour now will prevent a full discussion of the bill, and, speaking, I think, for the Republican Members of the Senate, I am willing that we start in tomorrow with the bonus bill, and at the conclusion of the consideration of the bonus bill that the unfinished business may follow, in turn to be followed by the special order, the bill sponsored by the Senator from Colorado. I am willing that that sort of an agreement be made.

Mr. BARKLEY. I submit the following request for unanimous consent, that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, to be resumed as the next legislative business to be considered by the Senate following the disposition of the bonus bill, and following the disposition of the unfinished business to which I have adverted, that the measure referred to by the Senator from Colorado may be taken up for consideration.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the request is satisfactory to me, and I hope it will be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUFFY in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported adversely the nomination of Charles O. Yelverton to be postmaster at Bay Springs, Miss., in place of F. C. Shoemaker.

He also, from the same committee, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

He also, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported favorably the following nominations:

Victor F. Ridder, of New York, to be administrator in the Works Progress Administration for the city of New York, the office to which he was appointed during the last recess of the Senate;

Denis J. O'Mahoney, of New Jersey, to be State engineer inspector for the Public Works Administration in New Jersey;

Andrew H. Peterson, to be director of the Public Works Administration for Massachusetts, the office to which he was appointed during the last recess of the Senate;

Robert M. Van Petten, of North Dakota, to be State engineer inspector for the Public Works Administration in North Dakota and South Dakota, the office to which he was appointed during the last recess of the Senate;

Leslie D. Gates, of Iowa, to be State engineer inspector for the Public Works Administration in Iowa;

Julian Montgomery to be director of the Public Works Administration for Texas, the office to which he was appointed during the last recess of the Senate;

Cal A. Ward, of Kansas, to be a regional director of the Resettlement Administration, the office to which he was appointed during the last recess of the Senate; and

E. A. Pynchon, of Florida, to be State administrator in the Works Progress Administration for Florida, to which office he was appointed during the last recess of the Senate.

Mr. COPELAND, from the Committee on Commerce, reported favorably the nominations of sundry officers in the Coast Guard.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported favorably the nomination of Brig. Gen. Louis McC. Little to be a major general in the Marine Corps from the 27th day of July 1935; and also the nominations of sundry other officers in the Marine Corps.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

If there be no further reports of committees, the calendar is in order.

THE CALENDAR

The legislative clerk proceeded to read Executive E, the international convention of the Copyright Union as revised and signed at Rome on June 2, 1928.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under a previous agreement, the treaty will go over.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc.

IN THE ARMY

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Army.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask unanimous consent that the Army nominations be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

BOARD OF TAX APPEALS

The legislative clerk read the nomination of John A. Tyson, of Mississippi, to be a member of the Board of Tax Appeals.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

NATIONAL EMERGENCY COUNCIL

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Lyle T. Alverson, of New York, to be Acting Executive Director of the National Emergency Council.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, may I ask by what committee this particular nomination was reported?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that it was reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COPELAND. I ask that the nomination go over temporarily. I am not advised about it.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, JANUARY 16, 1936

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Most gracious and eternal God, strengthening our weaknesses, stooping to our lowliness, and lifting us up, praises be unto Thy holy name. Impart unto us that spiritual power which is immortal, and open to us the source of Thy unsearchable riches. Let us receive at Thy hands the priceless blessing of an enlarged manhood, cutting through hard human molds, and thus be made clean at our hearts. O Thou who art the great Shepherd, lead us on o'er moor and fen, desert and torrent, into the pastures of unwithering reality. Help us this day to keep the eleventh commandment of our Lord. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

UNIVERSITY IN EXILE

Mrs. O'DAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to insert therein an article appearing in the New York Times, which incorporates a letter from the President of the United States to the president of the University in Exile.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mrs. O'DAY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Times:

ROOSEVELT HAILS UNIVERSITY IN EXILE AS SYMBOL OF AMERICAN FREEDOM—PRINCIPLES OF INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY ON WHICH IT IS FOUNDED ARE DEEPLY ROOTED IN OUR TRADITION, HE SAYS IN MESSAGE ON ITS SECOND ANNIVERSARY

President Roosevelt expressed hope last night for a brilliant future for the University in Exile, formally known as the Graduate Faculty of Political and Social Science. He characterized it as symbolic of American intellectual, religious, and racial freedom.

The President's statement was contained in a letter to Dr. Alvin Johnson, chairman of the University in Exile and director of the New School for Social Research, 66 West Twelfth Street, with which the university is affiliated. The letter was read at a dinner at the Hotel Waldorf-Astoria, at which about 300 persons interested in the institution celebrated its founding 2 years ago, after the first expulsion of Jewish and liberal scholars from Nazi Germany, and the successful completion of its trial period.

CALLED ONLY FREE GERMAN FACULTY

Prominent educators who spoke at the dinner endorsed the establishment of the university as a permanent American institution and the inauguration of a 5-year program of growth and creative work upon which it is now entering. They called it "the only free German faculty in the world." Support was asked for the financing of the 5-year program on a basis of $75,000 a year—a total of $375,000, of which $150,000 has been contributed or pledged.

Dr. Felix Frankfurter, of the Harvard Law School, was toastmaster. The speakers included Dr. Johnson, Dr. George E. Vincent, formerly head of the Rockefeller Foundation; Dr. Isaiah Bowman, president of Johns Hopkins University; Hamilton Fish Armstrong, editor of the quarterly Foreign Affairs; Ira A. Hirschmann, chairman of the board of trustees of the University in Exile, and Prof. Karl Brandt, a member of its faculty, who was formerly director of the agricultural college in Berlin.

THE PRESIDENT'S LETTER

President Roosevelt's message follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, January 14, 1936.

MY DEAR DR. JOHNSON: Public duties unfortunately prevent my attendance at the dinner to which you have kindly asked me. But I should like to congratulate you and the graduate faculty of political and social science upon the successful completion of your first 2-year period and to tender my best wishes for a brilliant future.

The principle which is symbolized by your graduate faculty, namely, freedom of scientific inquiry untrammeled by religious or racial restrictions, is deeply rooted in the American tradition. Ever since the beginning of our Republic we have welcomed many men and women of ability and character from other countries, who had found their usefulness cut off by conditions which are alien to the American system. Some of our most famous patriots, scholars, and scientists came to this country in 1848. The whole nation has been enriched, morally and materially, through the abilities which they placed at our service.

I am particularly gratified to learn that in your graduate faculty there are representatives of the three great religions, Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish. It is one of the fundamental principles of true Americanism that all religions are entitled to equal respect. Freedom for every man to worship God according to the mandates of his conscience implies the political, social, and intellectual freedom which is the very foundation of our national life.

Your graduate faculty represents American adherence to the principle of intellectual freedom. I wish it every success in carrying, as it does, the torch of truth-seeking for the good of mankind.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

CONVENTION OF THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF POSTMASTERS

Mr. BEAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to incorporate therein an address which the Honorable James A. Farley, Postmaster General, made before the convention of the National Association of Postmasters at Chicago, Ill., on Tuesday, September 24, 1935.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know whether Mr. Farley is going to continue to act as Postmaster General and as chairman of the Democratic National Committee at the same time, or whether he is going to give up one of these jobs?

Mr. BEAM. I may say to the gentleman that on September 24 he was Postmaster General.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I may say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that certainly the Postmaster General has the right to address postal organizations.

Mr. RICH. I do not object to his addressing postal organizations, but I do not want all of his speeches inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. BLANTON. They are very informative to the gentleman, if he will just read them.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is one matter in which I do not entirely agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I would be willing to have the gentleman's remarks extended to also include the speech at Westchester which Mr. Farley made at the delayed Jackson Day dinner.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] will read the RECORD of yesterday he will find that speech in there. I may say it would be well to also put in the RECORD the speech that was made by an Assistant Postmaster General in 1932 when he ordered all of the postmasters to get out and work for the Republican ticket.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEAM. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by the Postmaster General, Hon. James A. Farley, before the convention of the National Association of Postmasters, Chicago, Ill., September 24, 1935:

It is, indeed, a pleasure to have this opportunity of again meeting with you in your national convention. I congratulate you on your splendid organization, which is most helpful to the postmasters and to the Postal Service.

We postmasters must be great believers in organization. It was by organization under efficient leadership that this great Government of ours was established. The effectiveness of the Government since its inception has reflected the character and ability of its many leaders. It is my proud privilege to bring to you the personal greetings of our great leader, President Franklin D. Roosevelt, whom history will record as one of the most humane and most understanding of all of our Presidents.

Many of you here received your appointments at his hands. It is my feeling that you should, and I am quite sure that you do, cherish the oportunity to serve under such capable leadership. The President has a keen personal interest in the affairs of the Post Office Department. He fully appreciates the great service that is being rendered by this, the largest and most far-reaching in its influence, of all of the Government departments.

Because the Postal Service touches the lives of all of our citizens vitally and affects the business of the Nation, it must be maintained at a high degree of efficiency, must function with clocklike regularity, and yet, must be intensely human in its management. There is no other business, public or private, that to such a great extent renders personal service. Everything that is done in the Postal Service, all of the work that is performed, is personal service to individuals.

In private business the result of efficient performance is listed among the assets as good will. It is a matter of great satisfaction to me that your efforts have earned for the Department the good will of our people.

When I was given charge of the Post Office Department I firmly resolved that its affairs would be handled in a businesslike manner; that the public would be promptly and efficiently served; that the employees would receive fair treatment; and that insofar as it was possible of accomplishment, the Department would live within its income. Thanks to the loyal cooperation and assistance of my official staff in Washington, and the faithfulness of the postmasters and postal employees, I am pleased to report that much has been accomplished in the improvement of service and in the betterment of conditions of the personnel.

At the outset we were confronted with a diminishing mail volume, decreasing postal revenues, and an excess of personnel such as had never before existed in the history of the Department. Surveys were made which resulted in the discovery of the amazing condition that there were approximately 15,000 more people on the rolls of the Department than were needed. Something had to be done about it. Obviously but two courses were open for me to follow. One was the easy way of arbitrarily dropping from the service those last appointed, thereby depriving them of a means of livelihood for themselves and their families. Such action, if taken, would have been entirely within the law and in accordance with practices that had been followed in the Post Office and in other Departments in the past. The other course, which I adopted, was to spread employment during the emergency by means of enforced furloughs and by retiring those who had grown old in the service whose efficiency was impaired and who had earned the right to an annuity. I have had no occasion to regret the decision made to follow the more humane course and I am confident that all postmasters and all postal employees were glad to do their part.

About 18 months ago there began a decided upturn in the business of the Department, and therefore furloughs were discontinued, salaries were restored, and additional benefits were provided for the workers in the Postal Service. When it seemed proper to do so, and in keeping with policies of efficient management, I recommended to the Congress and secured approval for the restoration of administrative and automatic promotions. A generous and businesslike policy has been followed in granting such promotions. This has caused an additional expenditure of several millions of dollars; it is worth it. Following this same general principle and in keeping with the objectives of the President in spreading employment, on July 3, 1935, I gave my approval to the 40-hour-week bill, which, as you know, was approved on August 14, to be effective October 1. This measure was approved just as soon as I was satisfied that the increase in postal revenues was sufficient to care for all reasonable service requirements, and a surplus was indicated justifying increased expenditures in the interest of service and the welfare of the employees. In the administration of this new law it is my wish that the postmasters and supervisory officials in the field service exercise the same careful supervision that has been shown during the past several years. I want no waste of public money; and, above all, I want no impairment of existing Postal Service. I do feel, however, that if those of you who are charged with the responsibility of managing the post offices will give this matter careful thought you will find it possible, to a large extent, to grant the employees what was obviously intended by the law—a 5-day week. I know that it is not going to be possible to place all employees on a 5-day-week schedule. Efficient service must be continued, and, of course, we are not going to close the post offices on Saturday or any other week day; but I do want to urge you to do everything you can properly do to give the employees the full benefit of the shorter workweek.

It is also my wish that in all cases where such action is not contrary to the public interest that replacements for the compensatory time required for Saturday service be by the employment of additional regulars. The problem of the substitute who has been waiting for years for an opportunity to have a regular job is one that has given me much concern. I am convinced that our substitute problem will be solved by a proper application of the 40-hour-week law. I urge your earnest cooperation to that end.

During the last year and a half we have completely reorganized our mail transportation schedules. At this time we have the most efficient air-mail service in the world. More miles are flown daily on regular schedules, more cities are reached by the present air-mail system than at any time since air mail was established. The schedules are faster; improved equipment has been provided by the contractors, which operate at speeds that would have been considered unbelievable and fantastic a few years ago. I am proud, indeed, to have had the opportunity to take part in that development. You will be interested to know, I am sure, that this vastly improved service is being operated at a great deal less cost than an inferior service was operated for several years ago.

During the last session of Congress authority was secured for the expansion of our foreign air-mail service which will enable the Department to maintain transoceanic service. Tests have been made proving that trans-Pacific air transport service is feasible. Therefore the Department has advertised for bids for the establishment of an air line connecting California with China, with stops at Honolulu and the Philippines. This service will be established just as soon as the necessary bids can be secured and the rigid requirements of the advertisement can be met. The next step in foreign air-mail transportation, I hope, will be the establishment of such a line to connect New York with important European centers. We are living in a great age. Nothing seems to be impossible of accomplishment, and you may be assured that the Post Office Department is not going to lag, but will take full advantage of the most expeditious means of transporting the mail.

In this same connection we have also secured the approval of the Congress for the extension and improvement of the rather limited air service now operating in Alaska. So wherever a citizen of the United States may live, we will extend air-mail service to him just as soon as it is found feasible to operate air transport lines with safety and with reasonable assurance that the patronage will justify the establishment.

The support that the Post Office Department is giving to the air lines is not only for the purpose of expediting the movement of the mails, which in itself is important, but it is also for the purpose of fostering and developing air transport systems in this country and to foreign countries.

Aside from the transportation of the mail, the Post Office Department maintains the largest bank in this country—the Postal Savings—having 2,598,433 depositors doing business with 8,106 post offices and branches. The total amount on deposit is in excess of $1,204,598,498.

We are the sales agents for the Treasury of United States savings bonds, and during the past 5 months more than one hundred and sixty million in bonds have been sold.

The Post Office cooperates with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue by the sale of documentary stamps. During the past year the collections from that source have amounted to $2,765,226.09.

The social security law, which was approved by the President on August 14, provides that the Post Office Department shall assist in the collection of the moneys to be used for old-age pensions, etc.

Then there is the public-building program. On June 19, 1934, the Congress authorized $65,000,000 for the acquisition of sites and the erection of Federal buildings, the entire program being placed under the jurisdiction of the Treasury and Post Office Departments acting jointly. Three hundred and sixty-one projects have been authorized under this program. In those cases where the acquisition of sites was necessary, advertisements were immediately issued and thorough investigations and reports covering all properties offered, were promptly made. These reports were carefully reviewed and selections made without delay. Within a few months after the Congress had approved this expenditure, many of the authorized projects were under construction, and plans for a large percentage of the remaining places were well under way. Within a year after the legislation was approved, plans had been completed for more than 80 percent of the projects selected, and of this number, more than 80 percent were under contract or on the market for bids.

In all the remaining cases, with but a very few minor exceptions, sites have been selected and plans are nearing completion.

Most of the projects in this group will be placed on the market for construction bids in a very short time.

Under date of August 12, 1935, a $60,000,000 public-building program was authorized by act of Congress, under which 351 building projects will be consummated. In 285 of these cases, the acquisition of new sites was involved. The remaining projects contemplate construction on property already owned, supplemented in some instances by the purchase of additional land. By August 16 advertisements had been issued in all of the 285 cases in which new sites were necessary, and the Post Office and Treasury Departments are now engaged in the selection of properties offered in response to the advertisements.

The first site selection under this new program was made within 21 days after the passage of the legislation, which means that during that period advertisement had been issued, examination had been made of the sites offered or available by the Government agent, report had been submitted, reviewed, and acted upon. This is believed to be a record in the handling of work of this character.

Selection of sites in additional cases is proceeding expeditiously. This work, as well as that involved in the preparation of plans and specifications, will proceed with the greatest possible speed with a view to having a large percentage of the projects under the new program under construction during the coming fall and winter.

The postal income has increased since the advent of the Roosevelt administration from $588,000,000 for the fiscal year ending in June 1932, to upward of $630,000,000 for the past fiscal year. In this connection it should be borne in mind that the reduction in the rate for local postage from 3 cents to 2 cents has resulted in a loss of income to the Department of approximately $21,000,000 a year. Notwithstanding this curtailment of income, the revenue of the Department for the past fiscal year, which ended June 30, 1935, shows an increase of more than $44,000,000 over the receipts of the previous year.

Postal receipts have always been a reliable barometer of business conditions throughout the Nation. Since June 30 of this year our receipts everywhere have continued to hold their upward trend. The revenues for July and August of this year show an increase over July and August of last year of more than 8 percent. In the 12 largest cities of the country the revenue of the Department from September 1 to September 15 of this year shows an increase over the same period of last year of more than 10 percent. In my own city of New York for the first 2 weeks in September there was an increase of more than 15 percent over the corresponding 2 weeks of September of last year, while here in Chicago for the first 2 weeks of September there was an increase of more than 8 percent over the same period of last year.

This steady increase in postal receipts, of course, is gratifying to all of us in the administration. It is evidence not only of returning prosperity but also that the Department is being run on a business basis. The satisfaction we feel over the surplus indicated by the excess of the postal receipts over the expenditures for purely postal purposes is not the important thing.

I describe the surplus in this way because whenever anybody says that the Post Office Department is more than paying its way, the critics of the administration immediately declare there is an actual deficit instead of a surplus. By this they mean that if I should include among the regular post-office expenses the expenditures which the Government is making in air mail and merchant marine subsidies and the cost of free mail privileges of Congress and the various Government departments we would be in the red. Actually, of course, the air-mail subsidy is for the purpose of developing aviation. It might be properly chargeable to the War and Navy Departments or the Department of Commerce. The steamship subsidies are declaredly for the upbuilding of the merchant marine in order to afford this country adequate ships to transport its commerce and to give the Navy an adequate supply of transport and reserve vessels in the event of war. As to the free mail, I as Postmaster General have no more control of it than I have of the winds and tides. The Department is required by law to carry without charge whatever official mail the several departments of the Government choose to send. When I speak of a surplus I mean a surplus calculated under the same system of bookkeeping that was followed by my immediate predecessor.

What I was talking about was the real importance of the increase in postal receipts. It means an increase in a definite ratio of the Nation's business. You have all seen the graphs and charts that the statisticians use to illustrate the course up and down of commerce and industry. Well, let me tell you that the curve of postal receipts almost exactly parallels the up-curve of prosperity during the past 3 years. For example, the net income from farm products during the calendar year 1932 was $4,377,000,000. During the year 1934 the farmers' net income was $6,267,000,000. I dare say the statisticians could figure out for you just what percentage in the Post Office business was the result of the farm prosperity. Industry shows the same trend. For example, I recently read that the General Motors Corporation sold more cars during August 1935 than in any previous August since that of 1929, which was the height of the boom period. During the first 8 months of this year the Ford production was up about 53 percent. I could cite statistics of the sort until you wearied of hearing them. But I am not going very far. I do want to mention that the sales of machinery, which is, of course, the basis of all manufacture, were 263 percent greater during the first 6 months of this year than they were last year. And, for a general summary, I read that nearly 400 major companies in all branches of industry were more than 13 percent over what they were a year ago.

I know a good many of our critics will suggest that the increase in receipts by business, the billion dollar accretion in bank deposits, etc., were in a measure accounted for by the emergency Government expenditures in the form of relief. I think it would be rather difficult, however, to ascribe to that source the increase in sales of cigarettes and cigars, or the circumstance that Americans this year spent $400,000,000 more on vacations than last year, and established the greatest summer travel record since 1929, when everybody was either going somewhere or had just come back.

I have no doubt that you all have been reading a great deal about the alleged breaking down of the New Deal and the alleged unconstitutional characteristics of the legislation passed by the Congress just adjourned. You will read a great deal more of the same sort of stuff between now and election day a year hence. This sort of matter is just plain politics. You know and I know, and I think the whole country knows, that when the present administration came in our country was almost a derelict ship. Factories were idle from the Pacific to the Atlantic, farms were being lost under foreclosure proceedings in huge numbers in every State, banks were tumbling at the rate of 15 a day, credit had almost ceased to exist, and nobody saw anything but further calamity ahead.

President Roosevelt took command of the derelict craft and pulled us off the reef. The figures I quoted a little while ago tell you how far we have progressed on the road to recovery. Things are looking so fine that the old crew, in business and in politics, that led us into the shipwreck are now straining every nerve to get back in power. That is the real meaning of all the assaults on the New Deal. That is the reason that the man and corporations who begged Roosevelt to save them by any process 3 years ago are now assailing him and the methods he pursued to get them and to get all of us out of the hole. They did not worry then about the constitutionality of what he was attempting. They had nothing to say about the so-called invasion of State rights, and they were not hiring high-priced lawyers to pick flaws in the laws that meant the salvation of their enterprises.

I believe history will record this as one of the greatest, most constructive, and most successful administrations in our history. All of us have reason to be proud that we are members of this administration.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understood the plan of the majority, it was that we would immediately go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Unión for discussion of the pending bill. I do not want to interfere with the majority program, but it seems to me if we start general debate again there will be others who will want to speak, as well as the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. WOODRUM. I may say to the gentleman from New York that our colleague the gentleman from Texas spoke to me about getting 10 or 15 minutes. I informed him of the arrangement and he reduced his request for time. He stated he had a subject that was of some importance to discuss.

Mr. SNELL. If it is satisfactory to the majority over there, it is agreeable to me. If someone on this side wants some time, I hope the gentleman will not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, today I introduced a House resolution and a bill. The House resolution is very unique in that it provides for the appointment of a select committee of seven members to make an investigation for constructive purposes. No reputations will be destroyed and no one's name will be ruined. There will be no flaming headlines, such as "Congress probes" this or that. No one will hide out, because everybody will be glad to cooperate.

In England for a great many years after the war Parliament had partisan debates with reference to home-building and house-building programs. After some 10 or 15 years they have established a nonpartisan program of house building of all kinds and slum clearance, and England is going ahead much faster than the United States. It is a distinct reflection on the United States that we are not building more homes in our country; and, moreover, if we intelligently apply ourselves, we can correct the situation.

This House resolution provides for the appointment of a select committee of seven members and it is authorized and directed to conduct a constructive investigation and to make a study and analysis of the problems of urban, suburban, and agricultural houses, slum clearance, and to further study the matter of conservation.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES CAN MAKE CONSTRUCTIVE INVESTIGATION

I want to call attention to the fact, not for the edification of the Republicans present but for common-sense reflection, that we are voting millions and hundreds of millions, and even billions of dollars, and turning these dollars over to the administrative branches of the Government, sometimes without much study or reflection. They spend the money to suit themselves; and we are always complaining that Congress has given away its rights and has abdicated its legislative functions. Here is a chance for a select committee of the House of Representatives, with four members who are Democrats and three members who are Republicans, to make an impartial, nonpartisan investigation and to accomplish something intelligent and constructive for the people of the United States.

ENGLAND AHEAD OF UNITED STATES OF AMERICA IN BUILDING

Today, in England, they are building 350,000 houses a year, 85 percent out of private capital and 15 percent out of capital of the Kingdom. In this country we are building something like 40,000 houses a year. We should build a million houses or home units a year for the next 10 years. But on the basis of our population we are building about 4 percent of what they are building today in England, which is about the size of Illinois. Therefore, it is important that the Congress should give its attention to this as a matter of grave national concern.

In the United States Government today there are something like 37 different agencies working on the problem of housing. I do not say that all of them ought to be put in one unit, but at least there should be some unification and some coordination of purpose.

I have also introduced a bill which provides for the establishment of a National Resources Board. Of course, I know that some people are going to say that this means another bureau and more salaries, but this National Resources Board will be one of the greatest things in our Government for Congress, because information can be given the Congress at all times on what this body wants to know, without having to write to 25 different departments. This National Resources Board will lead to the coordination of many bureaus and in addition to development of housing by private and public endeavor will mean the saving of money first by elimination of useless bureaus and overlapping agencies, and by promoting conservation of public resources.

WILL AMERICA WASH AWAY?

We have 1,000,000,000 acres of land in this country that is suffering from man-made erosion, and whether you are a Republican or a Democrat, you want to conserve the resources of your country and you want the people to have houses to live in. If our country washes away, or if we have no homes to live in, it will not make much difference what party you belong to.

So I ask the Congress to consider the appointment of this select committee which will not cost over $10,000 or $15,000, and with this money we can get valuable information concerning housing and conservation; more important, we can do the work ourselves, understand these important problems ourselves, and then legislate intelligently on the subject.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to put in certain documents with respect to a National Resources Board, together with a copy of the resolution and the bill to which I have referred.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, in submitting copies of the House resolution and bill, I will omit the formal portions, including only those sections which are important. The numbers of the bills are shown, in order that copies may be obtained from the House Document Room.

FIRST. HOUSE RESOLUTION 395, FOR SELECT COMMITTEE (SECOND PARAGRAPH OR SECTION), REFERRED TO RULES COMMITTEE

The committee is authorized and directed to conduct a constructive, comprehensive investigation, study, and analysis of the problems of urban, and suburban, and agricultural housing, slum clearance, and conservation of natural resources of the United States, and the existing Federal policies and laws on such subjects, and the agencies of the Federal Government administering such laws, with the view to the development of a sound coordinated program of Federal activity through the fullest utilization of private and public enterprise in these fields, and the preparation of legislative recommendations to carry out such program.

SECOND. A BILL (H. R. 10303), FOR CREATING NATIONAL RESOURCES BOARD (FIRST SECTION), REFERRED TO THE PUBLIC LANDS COMMITTEE

That the National Resources Board (hereinafter established) is authorized (a) to investigate, examine, study, analyze, assemble, and coordinate, and periodically to review and revise basic information and materials appropriate to plans or planning policies for the conservation and development of the land, water, natural, human, and other resources of the Nation, and on the basis thereof to initiate and propose in an advisory capacity such plans and planning policies; (b) to consult with, cooperate, and participate in the work of any existing or future agencies of the Federal Government and of any State or local government, as well as with any public or private planning or research agencies and institutions; (c) to prepare and submit studies, reports, and recommendations upon matters within its jurisdiction under this act whenever the President may request a study, report, or recommendation from the Board upon any such matter; and (d) to set up a special advisory council and to constitute such other agencies as the Board may deem necessary or appropriate to assist in the carrying out of its works.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON COORDINATION OF HOUSING ACTIVITIES OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention to the fact that the National Resources Board, now known as the National Resources Committee, was originally created by Executive order. I consider the work they have done as of utmost national importance, so I offer a report of the Committee on Coordination of Housing Activities of the Federal Government.

INTRODUCTION TO REPORT—EXPLANATORY NOTE

The studies and recommendations which this present report covers had their origin in the 1934 report of the National Resources Board to the President. The 1934 report called attention to the number of Federal agencies interested in housing and to the need of coordinating their activities; also to the number of private organizations in the housing field with whom the housing movement had originated and on whose continuous support its ultimate success depended.

Following the publication of the 1934 report, the American Civic Association, through its president, Mr. Frederic A. Delano, took the initiative in calling a conference of representatives of housing interests, public and private. As a result of this and a subsequent conference of Federal officials alone, a committee of seven representatives of Federal agencies was recently appointed to study and report on the possibilities of coordination within the the Federal Government. The report and recommendations which follow are the unanimous report and recommendation of that recently appointed committee. It is submitted through the chairman, who initiated the conferences, for the information of the general group of housing officials of the Federal Government and for action by the responsible heads of the departments and of those independent establishments which, either directly or indirectly, are concerned with housing.

REPORT OF SEVEN REPRESENTATIVES OF FEDERAL AGENCIES ON HOUSING
REPORT OF 37 REPRESENTATIVES OF FEDERAL AGENCIES ON HOUSING

Hon. FREDERIC A. DELANO,
Vice Chairman National Resources Board;
President American Civic Association;
Chairman General Conference of Federal Housing Officials.

SIR: Your committee appointed to study the activities of all Federal agencies concerned with housing and to devise ways and means of coordinating their activities, submits the following report and recommendations:

At the present time there is in the Government service no one agency attempting to study housing for the benefit of all Federal agencies, and no definite responsibility exists for formulating a unified long-range program of housing for the United States.

The agencies now at work represent great resources of experience, accumulated information, and trained personnel. Some of their resources are entirely unknown and unused by other Federal agencies. All of them recognize the need of coordination.

Your committee has studied the activities, methods, objectives, legal authority, accomplishments, and interrelations of the agencies created to deal with housing in its manifold phases of technical research, economic and social research, planning, construction, credit, finance, taxation, insurance, and maintenance without attempting to evaluate any program, to redefine purposes, or to suggest any alteration in functions or procedure. None of the recommendations contained herein will restrict in any way the legal authority or functioning of any Government agency.

A total of 37 agencies of the Federal Government in Washington have been found to have definite responsibilities in housing. A complete list of all of these Federal agencies classified by activity is given in exhibit A attached.

Twelve are giving their exclusive attention to the construction, reconditioning, modernization, and financing of family dwellings or to the refinancing and encouragement of home ownership. In addition, four are giving a major portion of their attention to some phase of housing. Twelve are making important contributions, although devoting only a part of their time, personnel, and resources to housing activities. Nine have only an incidental interest in housing.

Of those units or divisions having an important interest in housing, 14 are dealing with design, planning, and engineering; 9 with appraisal, evaluation, and purchase; 4 with the initiation of projects; 9 with credit and finance; 13 with materials, labor, and construction; 9 with legislation, zoning, and regulation; 6 with ownership, supervision, and management; 24 with the accumulation and dissemination of information; and 26 with economic and social research or with the analysis of statistical information about building construction, home ownership, and housing finance.

Here is what your committee, as a result of individual interviews and numerous group conferences, has learned:

1. There is a general lack of information among executive officers of Federal agencies interested in housing as to what other agencies in the same field are planning or doing.

2. There is a vast amount of unused general and technical information and experience which has been accumulated at public expense whose translation into more fruitful accomplishment is dependent upon new avenues of release and cooperative action.

3. There is an eager desire among executives of housing agencies to understand the work of kindred agencies and to exchange useful information.

4. There is a noteworthy absence of selfish considerations, ulterior designs, and of organizational or professional jealousies. On the contrary, there exists an open-handed readiness to give and take freely as a means of accomplishing greater results in the interests of public service.

No present procedure exists which is designed to unify the activities of Federal agencies concerned with housing or to correlate and capitalize the results of their labor in research, planning, and administration. Your committee is persuaded that by taking the proper steps much expense can be saved, efficiency can be increased, overlapping and wasteful duplication largely eliminated, serious gaps filled, and unused resources put to work, all without disturbing or restricting the work of any existing department or independent establishment.

The Federal Government in its housing programs is engaged in a creative effort of the first magnitude. If its agencies, with their expanding vision of housing possibilities, prove unequal to their tasks, it will be due in a large part to a serious lack of coordination and cooperation. The need of coordination is recognized, the opportunity is apparent, the spirit of desire is aroused—what is needed now is a clear program, a simple flexible organization, and an intelligent leadership that will ensure a free exchange of the information obtained at public expense and a proper unification of plan and objective. The creation of such a procedure will develop a new conception of public service, open new vistas of opportunity, and present a united front of attack on our common problems.

To attain these objectives your committee unanimously recommends:

1. That a central housing board be appointed by the President to coordinate the activities of all Federal agencies interested in housing; that a continuous study be made of the operating problems, policies, and objectives of each, both in their individual spheres and in their effects upon other housing agencies of the Government, and upon existing housing and general economic conditions; and that such housing board be provided with funds and a secretariat sufficient to carry out a program of coordination and cooperation along the following general lines:

A. Creation by outline and definition of a clear distinction of purpose and division of responsibility among the Government's housing agencies that will preserve independent initiative and resources, but will avoid, on the one hand, overcentralization and, on the other hand, prevent overlapping, duplication, misunderstandings, and confusion.

B. Establishment of representative coordinating committees to continue the free exchange of information concerning departmental activities, experiences, and results, with provision for regular conferences of executives engaged in kindred work as a means of encouraging coordination and active cooperation.

C. Maintenance of a central clearing house for collecting and disseminating information about what is being planned and done by public and private housing agencies in the United States and abroad.

2. That the organization and activities of such agencies as the National Resources Board, Central Statistical Board, United States Information Service, Public Health Service, National Bureau of Standards, and Bureau of Home Economics be enlarged to provide more helpful assistance to agencies of the Federal Government concerned with housing.

3. That every effort be made to enlist and facilitate the cooperation of public, semipublic, and private groups interested in the improvement of housing standards and conditions and to work with them in spreading information about housing needs and the various programs designed to improve housing.

4. That the specific proposals enumerated in exhibit B be given consideration by the Central Housing Board as soon as it is created and ready to function.

Attached to and by reference made a part of this report are the minutes of each meeting of your committee and the minutes and detailed reports of its subcommittees. These contain more complete information on what facilities are available, how they may be put in more profitable use, and in general how the various agencies may be more closely knit so as better to serve the public.

Respectfully presented.

Miles Colean, representing Federal Housing Administration; Thomas Hibben, representing Federal Emergency Relief Administration; Arthur W. Dubois, representing Division of Subsistence Homesteads, Department of the Interior; Horace W. Peaslee, representing Housing Division, Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works; E. B. Schwulst, representing Reconstruction Finance Corporation Mortgage Co.; George N. Thompson, representing National Bureau of Standards, Department of Commerce; Ormond E. Loomis, chairman of the committee, representing Federal Home Loan Bank Board; Ormond E. Loomis, for the committee.

MAY 24, 1935.

The following are agencies mentioned:

Group I. Largest Federal agencies interested in housing: Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works, Housing Division; National Emergency Council; National Resources Board; Works Progress Administration; Resettlement Administration; Reconstruction Finance Corporation; Federal Home Loan Bank Board (1) Federal Home Loan Bank System, (2) Federal Savings and Loan Division, (3) Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, (4) Home Owners' Loan Corporation; Farm Credit Administration; Federal Housing Administration.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for leave of absence for my colleague the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT], who has been called back to his district.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to bills of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 1277. An act to amend section 24 of the Judicial Code by conferring on district courts additional jurisdiction of bills of interpleader.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL, 1937

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9863) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes; and pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BOLTON], the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH], and the gentleman from Virginia, which shall be confined to the bill, general debate shall be closed and the bill read under the 5-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. BOLAND in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BOLTON].

Mr. BOLTON. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for a few minutes to discuss with the Members of the House the bill we have before us. I want to say at the outset that it has not been possible for me to attend all the hearings of the subcommittee preparing this bill. That has been caused because of conflict between two subcommittees of the Appropriations Committee of which I am a member.

We were notified during the holidays that we should draft the appropriation bills as promptly and rapidly as possible. Because of that, being a member of the subcommittee on the independent offices bill and the subcommittee on the War Department bill, I had to divide my time between the two committees.

But I want to say that the work in the independent offices meetings which I have been able to attend has been most interesting. The chairman, with his usual courtesy, has put up with my absence, and in this connection I want to express my admiration for the chairman's knowledge of the various subjects which comprise the independent offices bill, and that my appreciation of it has been greatly magnified. Our chairman has had a very splendid understanding of the many intricate subjects which we have had before us, and with his usual ability has carried on the hearings in a splendid manner. [Applause.]

The independent offices appropriation bill is one of the great supply bills of the Government and covers many of the activities of the Government, primarily those not designated in the regular departments.

Yet I want to call attention to the fact that 20 of the various agencies of the Government, independent offices and commissions and bureaus, which were suggested in the Budget message of the President for transfer to Budget control, are not in the bill. Perhaps their fiscal requirements may be submitted to Congress later, but such activities as the T. V. A. are not carried in this bill under discussion.

Before discussing the bill I want to again compliment the chairman and the secretary for the able manner in which the report accompanying the bill is presented.

From that report you will see that the bill as presented is $125,000,000 greater than the appropriation bill last year, but it is only fair to say in that connection that the actual increase in appropriation is approximately $75,000,000 greater by reason of reappropriations and appropriations made last year for special items.

On the other hand, it is interesting to note that of the increase a large percentage covers appropriations for agencies created by this Congress last session, a total of $48,500,000-odd, covered by specific appropriations—$175,000 for a Central Statistical Board, $735,000 for the National Labor Relations Board, and $47,645,000 for the Railroad Retirement Board, upon all of which I wish to comment briefly a little later.

There are, in addition to these three new activities, appropriations for activities which were created by the preceding Congress. In other words, increased activities of the Federal Communications Commission, increased activities called for under the Federal Power Commission, increased activities of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the National Archives, and the Securities and Exchange Commission, totaling in all, $8,900,000; so that, taking those figures into consideration, together with the figures for those activities of 1936 to cover the original appropriations for these new activities, we find that the actions of Congress in new legislation during the past 2 years have added to our ordinary expenditures of Government about $61,000,000, to which must be added another million dollars for activities for these departments which are to be carried in the deficiency appropriation bill soon to come before us.

In addition to that, there are certain items which I think it well to call to the attention of the Congress, which are not covered in the appropriation bill. I am frank to admit that I was very much surprised to find that in the employees' compensation fund there were items for employees of Civil Works Administration, the old C. W. A., disability compensation items, as well as compensation for those in the C. C. C. camps. When those activities were first started a fund of $25,000,000 was set aside from the emergency fund to compensate men working under relief or in the C. C. C. camps who suffered disabilities while carrying on their work.

It was found that fund was much too large, and $10,000,000 was returned to the general fund, but during the year 1936 there was appropriated from that fund and expended for C. W. A. workers, the sum of $2,081,000 and this year we have authorized additional expenditures of $805,000 for the activity, making in all an expenditure of nearly $3,000,000 for the C. W. A. workers during 1936 and 1937. In the C. C. C. camps in 1936 a fund of $1,056,000 was authorized from this special fund. This year we are authorizing additional expenditures of $915,000. Of course, there is a great difference between the workers of the C. W. A. and W. P. A. and those in the C. C. C. camps. In the C. C. C. camps the enrollees are given a strict medical examination when they enter and another one when they are discharged, with the result that today we find on the C. C. C. records 500 enrollers on the disabled list and subject to compensation, and during the period that the C. C. C. camps have been in operation, 300 fatalities, a record which I think is commendable when we consider the large number of enrollees that have attended those camps.

As to the three new activities for which we are appropriating money this year, let us consider, first, the Central Statistical Board, a Board which has been set up as a more or less general staff of our various statistical agencies in the Government. I wonder how many of you realize that today we have approximately 180 various agencies in our Government gathering, collecting, and publishing statistics. It is because of the confusion that has resulted in this activity that this Central Statistical Board was suggested and authorized by the Chief Executive and has been put into effect, and I think from the testimony that was given our committee, from the activities which these gentlemen are carrying on, that it is one of the best activities of our Government today. I might say that 3 years ago, I believed when we began our economy activities, when the fund was cut down for the collection of statistics, this activity was recommended and, in fact, grants were made by private agencies, to collect and correlate data that should be and was being published.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOLTON. Yes.

Mr. REED of New York. There was a great deal of duplication, was there not?

Mr. BOLTON. The duplication has been tremendous. Further than that, statistics have been given out from time to time by one bureau which conflicted with those given by other bureaus and were misleading—not from the figures given out but from the import they might have.

Mr. REED of New York. Have they eliminated these various commissions that have been collecting data and having it done by this central bureau?

Mr. BOLTON. No. The Central Statistical Board acts in an advisory capacity, but not with actual authority. It is more or less a planning board to suggest the type of statistics to be given out, to collect statistics that are given out, and instead of having new statistics furnished, to be a source of information for other boards or commissions that may desire the same type of statistics.

Mr. REED of New York. I want to get this clear. Does this central Board plan the type of statistics they are to prepare?

Mr. BOLTON. Insofar as possible.

Mr. REED of New York. And eliminate the duplication?

Mr. BOLTON. That is their purpose and intention. I may say in that connection that our attention was called to various Works Relief projects that were suggested along statistical lines, and this general statistical board has been surveying and considering those, recommending some in part and disapproving others.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOLTON. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. I am glad to hear the gentleman from Ohio give his encomium on this Board, and to see that it has his approval and that he speaks of its good work. Was it not our good friend from New York, Mr. TABER, who, in his always able and forceful style, made such an indictment against this Board at the time it was created? I think it was his speech that inveighed against it so forcibly.

Mr. BOLTON. I am not certain of that.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOLTON. I yield.

Mr. TABER. And I have not changed my mind in the least. I am not satisfied that this Board is doing what could be done. It is just another board.

Mr. BLANTON. I would suggest to the two great leaders of the great minority party that they get together on these fundamental matters. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOLTON. I do not think the views of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] and my own views conflict in the slightest. I see in this Statistical Board an organization which will do away with many of the 180 statistical agencies I spoke of, and act as a general statistical organization of the Government.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOLTON. I yield.

Mr. RICH. We fought hard to have that Board established. There is only one trouble with it, and that is that we did not give the Board the power to eliminate a great many of these 180. If we would do that, we would have it all right.

Mr. BLANTON. The power of elimination is for a higher-up authority.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOLTON. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. On page 4 of the report I notice the increase in the Civil Service is $266,000. I supposed that the work of the Civil Service Commission had been somewhat curtailed, because nearly every act we passed contained a provision that appointment might be made under that act without regard to the civil-service laws. Why this increase?

Mr. BOLTON. That is not quite correct. I will touch on that in just a moment, if I may.

To proceed with the next agency which has been created by us, the National Labor Relations Board, I do not think there is any need of going into the details of that activity, because I believe we are all familiar with it. It is a continuation of the old Wagner Labor Board. It is a Board to attempt to settle difficulties that may arise between employer and employee, particularly with reference to collective bargaining. The Board anticipates setting up regional offices throughout the country to the extent of 21 or 22. While the Board is new in its activities, I believe it is impressed with the desirability of keeping its expenditures as low as possible. To be frank, as a court to which labor that is dissatisfied may apply, I think it will serve a useful purpose.

The third great activity, and the largest of our new activities, insofar as appropriations are concerned, is the railroad retirement fund, which, of course, calls for $46,500,000 of the $47,000,000 appropriation to build up a fund for the retirement of railroad employees. Last year, at the same time we passed this bill, we passed a companion bill to cover revenue which will be required for this fund. Of course, that revenue goes into the general revenue fund but, at the same time, its purpose was very apparent.

So much for the three new activities.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Ohio 5 additional minutes.

Mr. BOLTON. I want to comment very briefly on the matter the chairman has brought out in the report on the bill, but which I think should be very carefully considered by Congress. I suggest its consideration by the Ways and Means Committee.

I have reference to the activities of the Civil Service Commission and the activities of the Federal Communications Commission. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO] has spoken of the increase in appropriations for the Civil Service Commission. This is caused, in part, because of the increase in the various agencies or bureaus of our Government, many of which are calling for additional civil-service employees. It is true that the employees in the Government who are not under civil service have increased by leaps and bounds during the past 3 years. I think there are approximately 300,000 who are outside of the civil service today. It is true that the Civil Service Commission has many additional demands made upon it for certification of people satisfactory to work in these new agencies. I may say that revenues to offset these examinations which the Civil Service Commission is called upon to make have been suggested by our committee as a proper function of the Civil Service Commission. In Canada and Great Britain fees are charged for taking civil-service examinations. You may say it is wrong to debar any man or woman from taking these examinations, but still I believe a small fee would keep many from taking examinations without doing any difficulty or any damage to the Civil Service list or working any undue hardship. Today we have about 400,000 applicants for examinations that desire to be put on the Civil Service register. If I am not mistaken, the estimate was that by the end of the year the applicants would be over 600,000. It is easy to see the great amount of work that is required. Further than that, I recall an instance which indicates the added expense to which the Civil Service is being put. The Post Office Department called for an examination for railroad clerks, which necessitated a new examination being held at a very great cost to the Civil Service at the time, approximately $175,000. The question was raised in our committee as to whether it would not be proper to make some interdepartmental charge against the department calling for those examinations. The question was further raised as to the propriety of more or less standardizing the registry and the type of examinations that are being given today by the Civil Service Commission and thereby reduce expenses.

The other question had to do with the Federal Communications Commission. You will notice in the report, particularly in the hearings, the activities which that Commission is carrying on, particularly the expense of its great monitoring system, where it has not only monitoring equipment that is probably the best in the world but through it keeps the channels clear for its licensees. The question has been very properly raised, I believe, as to whether those licensees, those who hold licenses under this service rendered by the Government, should not pay for that privilege. Certainly the radio is in the interest of the public. Certainly it might be termed a great public utility. If that is correct, certainly that utility should pay the same licenses or fees which other public utilities in the country are accustomed to pay, and be subject to similar regulations and taxes. I believe from this a large revenue might be derived, and in these times of lack of revenue, I think, it is a subject which the Ways and Means Committee might well look into.

Mr. MAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOLTON. I yield.

Mr. MAIN. In using the term "monitor", does the gentleman intend to imply in any sense a censorship?

Mr. BOLTON. No. The Government has a large monitoring system in the Middle West which can listen in on every wavelength used throughout the country and thus see that time is properly used; in other words, that there is no interference with the wavelength granted to its licensees.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BOLTON. A few days ago I saw, and I dare say others saw, a resolution introduced by a great gentleman at the other end of the Capitol, calling for an investigation of our various independent agencies with a view to coordinating their activities and, if necessary, doing away with many of these agencies. It is very true that in the activities of these individual bureaus and commissions there is a considerable amount of overlapping. Let me give you an example with reference to electrical energy. Power companies are examined as to one phase of their activities by the Federal Power Commission. The power companies are examined by the Federal Trade Commisison as to another phase. The power companies are asked to furnish data by the Securities and Exchange Commission. In all this, of course, there is considerable overlapping. There is considerable extra expense to the Government and certainly to the industry. I believe it is highly desirable to go into this subject thoroughly to see if many of these activities cannot be combined to prevent this duplication. I hope the resolution may receive the attention it deserves, and I trust something may come of it.

In conclusion, and on this subject, may I refer you to a very interesting letter in the testimony from the Central Statistical Board with reference to the many questions asked of industry by the various departments of Government, both National, State, and local? I think a reading of this letter will give you an idea of what industry today must put up with from governmental agencies in order that the Government may gain information, some of which may be necessary, but much of which is nothing more or less than duplication. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 40 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, at the outset I should like to ask permission to revise and extend my remarks and to include such charts and statements as I may use in the presentation of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I want to reciprocate the pleasantries of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BOLTON], my colleague on the committee, and say to the gentleman and also to my colleague the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH], the two minority members on the subcommittee, that I believe the Congress and the country owe them a debt of gratitude for their splendid and careful consideration of this important measure and their duties on this committee.

This is one place we meet, gentlemen, in this committee, where there is no politics. Undoubtedly we have found varieties of subjects on which we have had differences of opinion. We have, oftentimes, a difference of opinion about these appropriation bills, but there is no partisanship in it; and I am not going to make a political speech today. I should like some time before long, perhaps, to make a few remarks on the state of the Union at which time I hope to make my political adversaries as uncomfortable as possible, if it is possible to make them any more uncomfortable than they are now; but I shall not do so today. [Applause.]

I want today seriously to engage your attention in the consideration of one of the largest appropriation bills that comes before Congress. I want to ask the young gentlemen to help me shift the scenery here to present this long chart and hold it up for a few moments. This chart, Mr. Chairman, shows the major items in this bill graphically, and I want to comment on it as I proceed, feeling that when I set the figures before you, you will be better enabled, perhaps, to follow my presentation.

In the first place I want to clear the atmosphere somewhat. I want to give you a little accurate information about some figures. My good friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], the ranking minority member on the Appropriations Committee, I am sure with good intentions, made an inaccurate presentation of the budgetary estimates and appropriations, and especially in connection with this bill which, of course, comes nearer to our hearts. In his presentation yesterday he had the amount carried in the independent offices appropriation bill for 1937 as $375,000,000 more than it was in 1936.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. WOODRUM. With pleasure; yes.

Mr. TABER. I did not say that, if the gentleman will pardon me. I said that the Budget estimates that were sent here showed that. If the gentleman will examine the Budget estimates he will find that my statement was exactly correct.

Mr. WOODRUM. I have examined the gentleman's remarks, and I have also examined the Budget; and I have found that his statement is not correct, with deference to my friend.

Mr. TABER. If the gentleman will pardon me, I will have the Budget estimates here in a few moments for the gentleman's information.

Mr. WOODRUM. I have just spent some time on them, I may say to the gentleman from New York, and I am entirely content to make my presentation and let it stand against my friend's presentation which he put in the RECORD day before yesterday.

To be accurate, I will quote what the gentleman said. In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 14, page 400, the gentleman made the following statement:

> The independent offices appropriation bill, which is now under consideration by the House, shows total estimates of $1,221,598,000 for regular activities, as against $846,033,000 appropriations in 1936, an increase of $375,565,000.

The impression which that statement conveys to the House and to the country is that this bill now before the House is based upon estimates which show an increase over the 1936 appropriations of more than $375,000,000, which is decidedly not the fact.

The gentleman has included in this total of estimates the items considered in this bill with estimates totaling $927,345,766. He has also included in this total items for several independent offices or establishments, which are not in this bill at all and were not considered in connection with it. Among these is the Emergency Conservation Work item of $246,000,000, which is not in this bill but which was submitted in the independent offices chapter of the Budget for 1937. It will be considered in connection with the deficiency bill. He has also included permanent appropriations (exclusive of trust funds), which are not included in any annual appropriation bill. He has also included the Farm Credit Administration with budget estimates of $4,000,000, which is customarily carried in the agricultural appropriation bill and is so submitted in this year's Budget. He has included the Tennessee Valley Authority, for which $43,000,000 is submitted under the general Public Works chapter of the Budget and which, as the gentleman well knows, has never been carried in the independent offices bill. All of these figures of estimates reach the total of Budget estimates which the gentleman stated of $1,221,000,000, but to leave the impression that such is the total of the independent offices bill is not correct. The total of the estimates for items considered in that bill is $927,000,000 and not $1,221,000,000. So much for that.

The gentleman makes a comparison of all these Budget estimates I have mentioned with the 1936 appropriations and says there is an increase of $375,000,000. He has taken as his total of 1936 appropriations a stated amount of $846,033,000. He has taken that total from a supplementary statement in the 1937 Budget on page A–30. He ignored the whole total of 1936 appropriations stated on that page, namely, $4,846,033,109, by confining his statement to "regular activities."

There is a very sound reason why he should have analyzed the whole total. It consists of $846,033,109 for general purposes and $4,000,000,000 for emergency relief. It is true that this latter item is not a regular activity. But out of it for the present fiscal year there is an estimated expenditure for Emergency Conservation Work of $495,164,000, which the gentleman has evidently not considered. When Emergency Conservation Work is changed, as it has been, from an emergency activity financed from emergency funds in 1936, to a regular activity with a Budget estimate of its own of $246,000,000 for 1937, he should have given credit in the 1936 appropriations for its expenditures from the $4,000,000,000 in order to make a fair and just comparison. Taking these 1936 estimated expenditures into account with the 1936 appropriations, there is a reduction under Emergency Conservation Work of approximately $249,000,000 instead of an increase of $246,000,000, as the gentleman persisted in stating.

In order that the estimates and appropriations for the independent offices chapter of the Budget, and the independent offices for which estimates are submitted but included in other chapters of the Budget, may be set forth clearly to show the distinction between them and this bill, I shall insert a table showing the totals divided among those activities. From this table it will appear clearly that instead of an increase of $375,000,000 which the gentleman says is occurring, there is an actual decrease. The total Budget estimates for 1937 for all independent offices, including those in this bill and elsewhere, accepting the gentleman's figure, amount to $1,221,598,341. The total for 1936 appropriations, including estimated expenditures for emergency conservation work of $495,164,000, is $1,341,197,109. These figures show a decrease of estimates of $119,598,768 for 1937 under 1936 appropriations, instead of an increase of $375,000,000, as he claims. His statement of an increase of $375,000,000 when actually and fairly there is a decrease of $120,000,000 is only a matter of approximately $500,000,000 wrong.

Comparison of 1936 appropriations and 1937 Budget estimates for independent offices

	1936 appropriations	1937 Budget estimates	Increase (+) or decrease (−)
Activities in the independent offices chapter of the Budget:
Those carried in the independent offices bill now pending (including $4,000,000 for Veterans' hospitals under "General public works")	$805,234,158	$927,345,766	+$122,111,608
Emergency Conservation Work (to be carried in deficiency bill)	[1] 495,164,000	246,000,000	−249,164,000
Total, independent offices chapter of the Budget, less trust funds	1,300,398,158	1,173,345,766	−127,052,392
Activities for independent offices carried in other chapters of the Budget:
Farm Credit Administration (agricultural appropriation bill)	4,000,000	4,000,000
Tennessee Valley Authority and District of Columbia Alley Dwelling Authority (to be carried in deficiency bill)	36,000,000	43,300,000	+7,300,000
Total, independent offices in other chapters of the Budget, less trust funds	40,000,000	47,300,000	+7,300,000
Permanent appropriations, exclusive of trust funds, under above activities	798,951	952,575	+153,624

[1] Estimated expenditures in 1936 from $4,000,000,000 appropriated for 1936 for emergency relief.

There is the record, and you gentlemen may verify and pass upon it.

Let us look at the appropriation bill, because, after all, that is what we are concerned with. This chart which I have before me shows at the bottom that the gross total for 1937 is $929,362,766 as against $805,234,158 for 1936. I propose to show and demonstrate to you that for comparable items, and we are considering now whether the costs of these bureaus for the same things that they have been doing is growing or expanding like a mushroom, as has so frequently been charged, there is a reduction of $21,000,000.

Mr. DITTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DITTER. Will the gentleman clarify what he means by the word "comparable"?

Mr. WOODRUM. For the same activities.

Mr. DITTER. Does the gentleman mean that the activities materially increased and that a larger work is being done which justifies these increases?

Mr. WOODRUM. There are increases in any number of the departments. Those increases are brought about because this Congress, every session, passes new laws and places them upon the statute books increasing the duties and activities of the Government departments, then they come back here next year and complain about the growth of bureaucracy.

Mr. DITTER. Then we can agree that so far as the increased cost of operations is concerned it is caused by the increased personnel of the present administration and the increased cost is due to the present administration?

Mr. WOODRUM. No; we cannot agree to anything of the kind, I may say to the gentleman. We can agree that the increase in these bureaus is due to increased duties, which this Congress has placed upon these various bureaus. Many of those additional duties were voted upon by the gentleman and his colleagues on that side of the aisle, as well as the Members on this side of the aisle.

Mr. DITTER. But that program of increase was under the administration presently in power?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes; of course, it is under the present Democratic administration, just as other programs in the past were under other administrations.

Mr. DITTER. And these increased costs and appropriations are directly chargeable to the present administration?

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman can put that construction on it if he desires.

Mr. DITTER. It is a fair construction?

Mr. WOODRUM. I do not want to engage in a political debate with the gentleman just now. At some other time I will take great delight in crossing swords with the gentleman, or anyone else on that side of the aisle on that question. [Applause.] Of course, there has been increase in the cost of government. May I say this and pass from the matter. There has been an increase in the cost of government. If anyone was ever insane enough to think that this country could be lifted out of the abyss into which it had been driven without somebody paying something for it, then that person would indeed be a fit subject for the insane asylum and should not have been elected to Congress. [Applause.]

I want to get back to the appropriation bill and talk about it. We have here $805,234,158 carried in the independent offices bill for 1936. This does not represent, however, all of the appropriations for those items for 1936, because there are deficiencies amounting to $32,192,100 which will presently be brought before you for consideration. The major item in those deficiencies is an item of $28,000,000 which is carried for 1936 for the payment of reinstated Spanish-American War pensions. We have added to the $805,000,000 in the bill this year these pending deficiencies amounting to $32,192,100, which raises the total for 1936 to $837,426,258.

Now, there were some items in the bill last year which ought to come out of the calculation, because they are nonrecurring items of appropriation:

Federal Home Loan Bank Board	$264,043
George Washington Bicentennial Commission	103,600
Thomas Jefferson Memorial	15,000

United States-Texas Centennial	$3,000,000
Protection of interests of the United States in matters affecting oil lands in former naval reserves	36,000

This makes a total of $3,418,643 of nonrecurring items which we should deduct from this gross total in order to find the actual appropriations for these activities for 1936.

Mr. MAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. MAIN. Why is the Federal Home Loan Bank Board omitted?

Mr. WOODRUM. The Federal Home Loan Bank Board finances itself through assessments of member banks which are available to the Board by reason of a permanent appropriation.

This leaves us a net total for 1936 appropriations of $834,007,615. Now let us come to 1937. We have in this bill $929,367,766 of gross appropriations. The actual amount of the bill is not that much, because we have reduced the actual appropriation by reappropriating unexpended balances; but this is a bookkeeping transaction and this committee does not undertake to come before Congress or the country and claim that this $49,618,861 which is reappropriated is a saving. We think it is the correct way to appropriate, but we do not claim that there is any actual saving.

Now, in the $929,000,000 that we have this year, we have new activities that Congress has established. Let us look at them for a moment:

Central Statistical Board, $104,000.
National Labor Relations Board, $435,000—

This is the Board established under the Wagner bill.

Railroad Retirement Board, $47,045,000.

We have these new activities added to our bill which were not there before, and it is not fair to say that our bill has increased or that the cost of Government for comparable activities has increased unless you make allowance for these activities.

Mr. TABER. But the item for independent offices has increased.

Mr. WOODRUM. Oh, yes.

Mr. TABER. And if the gentleman would turn to pages 30a and 31a of the Budget, he would see that the Budget estimates for 1937 are $1,221,000,000, while the appropriations stated in the Budget are $846,000,000, a difference of $375,000,000, exactly as I have stated it.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman did not take all of the essential factors into consideration in making his comparisons.

Mr. TABER. My figures are certainly correct.

Mr. WOODRUM. I shall put my remarks and my position in the RECORD and the gentleman can look at it and see if it is right or wrong.

Now, to proceed. In addition to these new activities in the bill, we have new duties given to some of the established organizations by laws which we have passed.

For instance, we put air mail under the Interstate Commerce Commission, motor-transport regulations, and we gave new duties to the Federal Power Commission and the Securities and Exchange Commission when we passed the utility holding company bill. We increased Spanish War pensions, which necessitates another $6,000,000. This bill also has $60,000,000 more than last year to go into the retirement fund for the payment of adjusted-service certificates.

This makes a total of $116,516,098 of new activities in this bill because of the enactment of new laws which were not provided for in the 1936 bill. Subtracting the latter figure from the gross total recommended in the bill leaves $812,846,668, and this amount deducted from the $834,007,615, leaves a net decrease for comparable activities of $21,160,947; and I will put this statement in the RECORD, and you gentlemen can examine it more carefully at your leisure.

Add pending deficiencies:
A. Supplementing old activities—
Civil Service Commission	548,700
Federal Trade Commission	172,800
Federal Power Commission	660,000
Securities and Exchange Commission	765,000
B. New activities occasioned by new legislation—
Central Statistical Board	70,600
National Labor Relations Board	300,000
Railroad Retirement Board	600,000
Motor-transport regulation	1,075,000
C. Pensions (increase on account of Spanish-American War legislation)	28,000,000
Total deficiencies, 1936	32,192,100
Total appropriations, 1936	837,426,258
Deduct nonrecurring items:
Federal Home Loan Bank Board	264,043
George Washington Bicentennial Commission	103,600
Thomas Jefferson Memorial	15,000
United States-Texas Centennial	3,000,000
Protection of interests of the United States in matters affecting oil lands in former naval reserves	36,000
Total, nonrecurring items	3,418,643
Net total, 1936 appropriations	834,007,615
Recommended for 1937 (including all reappropriations)	929,362,766
Deduct the following:
Increases in new establishments over the amount of pending deficiences for same:
Central Statistical Board	104,820
National Labor Relations Board	435,000
Railroad Retirement Board	47,045,000
Increases in old establishments occasioned by new legislation:
Interstate Commerce Commission:
Air mail	160,000
Motor-transport regulation	625,000
Federal Power Commission	752,400
Securities and Exchange Commission	1,215,506
Pensions (further increase in 1937 on account of Spanish-American War legislation)	6,178,372
Increase of adjusted-service certificate fund	60,000,000
Total deductions	116,516,098
Net, 1937	812,846,668
Decrease, 1937, under 1936	21,160,947

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. RICH. I am very much interested in the gentleman's statement and in his portrayal of Government expenditures. The gentleman made the statement that estimates are one thing and what Congress appropriates is another. I wish to state that what Congress appropriates is one thing and where you are going to get the money is another. I am sincere about this, and I should like to ask the gentleman this question: In his judgment, for which I have great respect, if Members of Congress, at the time they were providing for these activities, had to provide for raising the money, would not this cause us to stop a lot of unnecessary appropriations?

Mr. WOODRUM. Undoubtedly.

Mr. RICH. And would it not make the Members of Congress think more about authorizing appropriations?

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman is undoubtedly correct about that.

Mr. BOLTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. BOLTON. In other words, does not $60,000,000 of increase in our appropriation bill for new activities indicate that when we pass this legislation in the first instance we do not realize the cost that is going to result from such activities?

Mr. WOODRUM. Exactly so; and I may say to my friend, and to you gentlemen here, many of you just in the last few days—some did and some did not—decided to pass a bill and saddle $2,000,000,000 on the Government and did not think very much about it or put in the bill anything about where the money was going to come from. You cannot lay that at my door, but at the door of a great many on both sides of the aisle.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. Although it is true that many independent offices have been given more work by reason of new legislation, is it not a fact that several independent bureaus will be relieved of that additional work through the invalidation of laws by the Supreme Court, like the A. A. A., which will be relieved of a considerable amount of work, estimated at $95,000—extra work put on?

Mr. WOODRUM. The Tariff Commission claims that they will have additional work which had been diverted to the A. A. A.; that having been invalidated, it will go back to them; and they have put on new additional duties.

Mr. MOTT. I notice that they have called for $95,000 by reason of the work that was done by the A. A. A. As a general rule, new work imposed on these bureaus by reason of new legislation will be taken away from the bureau when and if the legislation is invalidated.

Mr. WOODRUM. If something else is not put in place of it.

Mr. MOTT. If the public utility holding bill should be held unconstitutional, the amount now appropriated for the Securities Exchange Commission would not be necessary.

Mr. WOODRUM. If something else was not put in place of it, but as it is now we have to appropriate for it.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Certainly.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman speaks about the amount carried in the deficiency bill in addition to regular appropriations. If the gentleman knows, I wish he would state the amount that will be carried in those deficiency bills.

Mr. WOODRUM. No one can estimate that. There will be a number of deficiencies for bureaus due to new activities.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman has not commented upon the reduction of Foreign Service pay, which you have reduced.

Mr. WOODRUM. We have provided the full amount of the estimate by reappropriating some unexpended balances of former years. The State Department says that it needs the money that we appropriated. There was a balance of something like $2,000,000 left out of the 1935 and 1936 appropriation, which is reappropriated.

Mr. GIFFORD. Then our dollar has not quite reached the respectable position that we hoped it would.

Mr. WOODRUM. Oh, we all respect the dollar, no matter what position it is in.

Mr. GIFFORD. It seems quite necessary to make good our dollar still. The gentleman says that means $3,800,000 for Foreign Service alone. It does not seem that our dollar has approached a respectable position.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman is getting on the state of the Union and I do not want to discuss that at this time.

Mr. GIFFORD. Somebody has to do it.

Mr. WOODRUM. I shall do it some time, but I want to talk about this appropriation bill now.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I understood the gentleman to say that when certain functions were invalidated the departments would find other activities that demanded the use of the money so paid. Would it not be possible for Congress to prevent the departments from expanding their activities because there happened to be money released which they could spend otherwise?

Mr. WOODRUM. Certainly, Congress can do anything it pleases, but it does not usually do that.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Does not the gentleman think it would be a good thing for this Congress to do?

Mr. WOODRUM. Certainly, it would.

Mr. BOLTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. BOLTON. In connection with the gentleman's remarks on the deficiency, do I understand that under the general law the independent offices have the right to incur indebtedness in amounts not appropriated?

Mr. WOODRUM. No.

Mr. BOLTON. In the Army and the Navy they have that right for certain purposes.

Mr. WOODRUM. They do not have that right, but in many of these agencies the Congress appropriated sums, some of which were carried in the deficiency appropriation bill which failed of passage, and, after a consultation with the Budget, the executive branch of the Government, and the General Accounting Office, these agencies were given permission to proceed, with the understanding that Congress would provide the necessary funds.

Mr. BOLTON. Even before the amount was appropriated?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. GIFFORD. I have carefully read the entire hearings I think on the Securities and Exchange Commission. One thing I wanted to find out is this: There have been $5,000,000,000 or thereabouts of new registrations. I wondered why somebody did not ask the question, or if they did, how much of the $5,000,000,000 registration before that Commission was for new activities, rather than for refinancing. I ask that question because I have said so many times before that the Securities and Exchange Commission might be a great deterrent to new business, and yesterday on the floor of the House I said that because of the personnel of this Commission I thought that we had gotten along pretty well, but I should like to have that question answered. How much of that $5,000,000,000 was for new business and construction?

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman's question, of course, is an interesting question and would be pertinent if the Committee on Appropriations had been inquiring about whether or not it is proper to have a Securities and Exchange Commission vested with those powers, but we were not making that inquiry and we could not go into the wide diversified field of inquiry and speculation as to the effect of that. Congress has passed a law and this Commission has duties to perform. Our inquiry was how much money it was necessary to appropriate to have that duty performed?

Mr. GIFFORD. Is it not a very pertinent question, when a new commission is organized, which so many said might be and probably would be a deterrent, to ask that commission whether it had been a deterrent to business?

Mr. WOODRUM. I am sure a telephone call from the gentleman to the Commission would bring that information from the Commission if he wanted it. The Committee on Appropriations certainly has to limit its inquiry into such things. We were not particularly concerned. We did ask a great many questions about the work of the Commission, if the gentleman had taken the trouble to read them.

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, I read it all, but I thought that was a pertinent question in view of the worry of the entire Nation on the set-up of that Commission.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman can make his inquiry to that Commission, and I am sure he would get the answer.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. DONDERO. Under the foreign-pay adjustment, I notice the amount recommended is $1,800,000. Was that recommended in the Budget of the President?

Mr. WOODRUM. The amount recommended in the Budget was $3,848,611. We appropriated this amount and appropriated the difference by reappropriations.

Mr. Chairman, the chart which I have in front of me now shows the major activities in the independent offices appropriation bill. Some of the items are increased and a number of them show practically the same appropriation. In addition to these major activities there were some dozen or half dozen lesser activities which I have in another chart but which could not be added to this one before us, and I shall insert that in the RECORD.

It includes the Battle Monuments Commission, the Board of Tax Appeals, the Federal Power Commission, The National Archives, the Capitol Park and Planning Commission, the Mediation Board, the Smithsonian Institution, and the Tariff Commission, and so forth. I desire now to comment on one or two of these activities. First, the civil service. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BOLTON] called attention to the large increase in the appropriations for the Civil Service Commission for 1936. Of course, if gentlemen will read the report, they will find it is because of the great many examinations they have had to hold. If the administration had undertaken to fill all of these temporary appointments in these emergency organizations from the civil service, then there would have been a great many more figures on this chart than you see now. It would have been impossible, and I do not think desirable. I do think this is true. I believe it is practically the unanimous opinion of our subcommittee that a fertile field for the activities of the legislative committee on the matter of the civil service is the Civil Service Commission.

I believe in the merit system. I wish that every position in the Government could be filled through the civil service, and that it would be a violation of law for a Member of Congress to recommend anybody for a position. I would be willing to have that. [Applause.] Politically, I do not think it helps anybody to get jobs for people. When people are in distress we like to help them when we can. We like to help them get jobs, and we like to help our friends, but as far as the merit system is concerned, I believe in it. I think we have a splendid Commission, individually and collectively. They are able, industrious, and sincere. But I think they are bound up and tied up by archaic, illogical rules and regulations under which they operate.

Let us just look for a moment at the situation. Because of the 40-hour law that was passed, there were 2,000 positions to be filled in the Railway Mail Service. They called a Nation-wide examination, and there were 200,000 applications which they received and had to look over carefully. Thousands of them were thrown out because the people did not have a shadow of qualification for that particular service.

Mr. DONDERO. How many jobs were there to be filled?

Mr. WOODRUM. Two thousand jobs. There were 200,000 applications in 8 days. They cut the time for filing down to 8 days, and there were 200,000 applications filed before the Board. That, of itself, of course, shows that there ought to be some way in which the citizens of the country generally might be given an opportunity for these positions, and yet not such a terrific expense placed upon the Government.

The same is true of the stenographic and typing examination which they had a few years ago, and when some 50,000 or more took the examination, and before the registry could be established, much of it was out of date. There ought to be some way to standardize these examinations. That is, have at least one standard examination and then perhaps reexamine on other special qualifications.

Another thing that has been called to my attention—and I expect every Member has had his attention directed to it—is the much-discussed mental tests which the Civil Service Commission is using under their rules and regulations for qualification of applicants. If I understand what "civil service" means, it means that the idea is to try to select people especially qualified for particular duties. I will give you a leaf out of my personal experience, probably matched by many of your own. In my home town we opened a Veterans' Administration facility. In the opening of that home it was necessary to have three or four switchboard operators—"P. B. X. operators", as they are called. They had no registry at the Civil Service Commission for that position, and an examination was called. It was what they call a localized examination; that is, for the particular area which might be adjacent to that facility. Several hundred people took the examination. Of course, pending the establishment of that register they had to have someone to operate the switchboard, so they appointed a young lady who had had 5 years' experience with the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co. She went out when they put in the dial system. She was a high-school graduate, a very lovely and attractive girl personally. She was an unusually intelligent girl. They appointed her temporarily. She went in there and helped to establish and set up the switchboard. They appointed to help her the wife of a disabled veteran who has a service-connected disability; a woman who was a graduate of a business college and had had some 7 or 8 years' experience in operating switchboards in offices and manufacturing and industrial plants.

They held this civil-service examination, and neither of those ladies could make a passing grade. One failed on the mental test; the other on experience. Why not? Why could they not make it? Have any of you ever seen this mental test that they have? It consists of a lot of funny catch questions that have absolutely nothing on the face of the earth to do with the qualifications of a person for the particular job. Here was a young lady with 5 years' experience with the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co., a portion of that time in charge of the night long-distance board in a city of 75,000 people, a high-school graduate, who had one of the finest letters of endorsement from a manager that I ever saw, and they say she is not qualified to run a switchboard which she has operated, which she helped establish and set up, and which she had been operating for 6 months. There were a few catch questions that she could not answer.

Let me say, in justice to the friends down at the Civil Service Commission, they undertook very feebly and unimpressively to defend that mental test. They only gave 40 percent credit for experience and 60 percent for this mental qualification.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. TABER. I should think the gentleman would have sufficient influence with the Civil Service Commission to have them revise their mental examinations.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman so far has not had that much influence, I may say, although I do want to say they are tied up with a system of rules and regulations, and the legislative committee should take charge of this. I hope they will do it. I hope what has been said will precipitate that.

In addition to that, there should be a fee charged. There is no reason why there should not be a reasonable fee charged for a civil-service examination. That will have the effect of greatly limiting the number of applicants. It will stop people from indiscriminately going into a post office and getting an application blank and sending it in here for some position for which they have no earthly chance to qualify.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. MAY. As I understand this very important bill, the total appropriation for the 2 years is $1,729,161,281. That is a vast sum of money. I want to ask the gentleman from Virginia if the committee, in making up its estimates for the various departments, is not confined almost exclusively to testimony coming directly from the particular department concerned, and whether or not he has observed any disposition on the part of the heads of those departments to try to cut down rather than enlarge?

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman's question, of course, is very interesting. Maybe some of you will recall that when I presented this bill a year ago or 2 years ago I made the observation that the Appropriations Committee of Congress is in the attitude of a jury trying a case with no lawyers except the lawyers for the plaintiff and no witness except witnesses for the plaintiff, and that if it is to make any defense to the case it has got to dig it out itself. This may not be literally true, because my observation has been that most of the Government departments are operated by men of integrity, patriotism, and usually men of high standing; but it is just human, it is just naturally human, that a bureau or a department wants to protect itself and its personnel to secure as much additional power, personnel, and appropriations as it can. I said then, and I say now, that if the Appropriations Committee of this House had its own staff of highly trained experts who could go into these departments in the interim between sessions of Congress and carefully audit and carefully examine, item by item and activity by activity, these various requests for large appropriations, that we could greatly and vastly reduce the amounts of appropriations as well as cut out, oftentimes, overlapping and duplication.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WOODRUM. Just briefly.

Mr. MAY. I have been thinking of introducing a bill to provide a joint committee of Congress, three Members to be chosen from this body and two from the other body, three from this body because the House is the appropriating body, to do just this. If the gentleman thinks it is advisable, I wish he and his committee would consider such legislation.

Mr. WOODRUM. I do not think that would be advisable, because a Member of Congress has not the time or the disposition to do it, and he ought not to be charged with the duty of doing it. But I may say to the gentleman from Kentucky that in the Appropriations Committee of the House we have one of the most efficient set-ups in the way of clerical assistance I have ever seen in the Government service, headed by Marcellus Shield, this young man who sits here assisting me, and these other young gentlemen who handle these bills. They work day and night on them. They have a great deal to do; they do not have the time, and we could not put on them the duty of going out into the field as our representatives to sit by our side and give us some evidence for the defense when a department comes in.

Mr. MAY. Something like that ought to be done.

Mr. WOODRUM. It would not be an expensive set-up, and it would more than pay for its maintenance.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 additional minutes.

Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. DARDEN. I agree with the gentleman in what he says about the Civil Service Commission. I had an experience quite similar to his within the last 3 months.

I want, however, to direct his attention to another phase of the bill. Prior to the Economy Act there were hospital facilities for the veterans to the extent of 502 beds in the Portsmouth naval hospital at Portsmouth, Va. The pending bill carries $1,939,062 to cover transfers to other governmental departments. Since the Economy Act we have not been able to get any space in the naval hospital at Portsmouth, and we have been able to secure only 103 beds at the public-health hospital in Norfolk. Would it be possible to utilize any of these funds for the purpose of making again available 502 beds at the naval hospital in Portsmouth, or a reasonable number of beds if 502 cannot be provided for?

Mr. WOODRUM. My colleague called this matter to my attention this morning. I requested information from the Veterans' Administration and learned the following: Prior to the Economy Act a great many beds were used in naval hospitals other than Veterans' Administration facilities. The policy since the Economy Act has been to put the veterans in Administration facility homes and hospitals wherever it could be done. This has greatly reduced the number of veterans who were using outside facilities, because we have been able to get additional facilities and to enlarge and expand existing facilities.

With reference to my colleague's particular problem I will call his attention to the fact that there has already been approved, and there is now being proceeded with as fast as possible, the expenditure of $750,000 for the erection of a new 500-bed general hospital, which the Veterans' Administration feels will be sufficient to take care of needs in that vicinity. In the meantime the Veterans' Administration told me they will be very glad to cooperate with the gentleman and the people in that district in taking care of needy cases.

Mr. DARDEN. It is the meantime with which I am particularly concerned.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN. Did I understand the gentleman to say he felt that a reasonable charge should be made to anyone desiring to take a civil-service examination?

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman correctly understood me; yes.

Mr. COCHRAN. I do not agree with the gentleman's view. I have a very important question. Does not the gentleman think it would be more important to place some kind of limitation upon this appropriation for the Civil Service Commission that would prevent them from using any of this money to hold examinations where they place an age limit so low that a man or woman of 35, 40, 45, or 50 years of age is denied the right, as he is in many instances, of taking the examination? I feel if the Government sets a low age limit it will be followed as a standard by corporations. It is a very serious thing to say that a man or woman of 35, 40, 45, or 50 years is no longer able to hold a position or should be denied the right to take a Government examination.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman raises a very interesting sociological question. I agree with the gentleman that a man reaching the age of 45, 50, or 55 is just beginning to blossom into the bloom of life.

Mr. COCHRAN. Look at the gentleman himself.

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes; and look at the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN. I am not quite as good as I used to be. A year ago I was pretty good, but I am not quite as good as I was then; but I am coming back fast.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman looks very good, and we are very happy to see him in such excellent condition. I may say he is a most useful Member of Congress. All of us look forward to many more years of association with the gentleman.

Mr. COCHRAN. I thank the gentleman. While I am on my feet let me say that I fully agree with what the gentleman says with reference to the Committee on Appropriations getting some information to offset the information which the department head gives. The gentleman handles the appropriation for the General Accounting Office for the Comptroller General. That is an agency of the Congress, not an agency of the executive branch of the Government, although the President does appoint the Comptroller General. Does not the gentleman from Virginia believe that we could arrange with the General Accounting Office to have a force of men do the very work he has suggested being done? Mr. McCarl has never denied one request that my committee has ever made of him with reference to getting information for the committee along the lines that the gentleman from Virginia has suggested.

Mr. WOODRUM. I think that would be helpful, but I believe the personnel ought to be answerable only to the Appropriations Committee of the House. Those people should be the confidential informants of the Appropriations Committee. That is what I have in mind. There should not be an agency mixed up in it. The personnel ought to be the agents of the Appropriations Committee of the House only.

Mr. COCHRAN. If the information is made confidential it will not get to the public, and the only way to get things working properly is to let the public know what is going on.

Mr. WOODRUM. But let the Appropriations Committee throw light on it. Let them get the information and then throw the light on it.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Is there any provision for 60 beds for the Chelsea Naval Hospital? The ex-service men in Massachusetts are very much in need of the surgical care which that hospital provides.

Mr. WOODRUM. I may say to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts that it is impossible for me to keep in mind all the individual cases; however, I have a chart I shall be glad to show the gentlewoman, which shows the existing beds, the vacancies, and so forth. She might be interested in looking at this chart, and perhaps this will give the information desired.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Would the gentleman agree to an amendment to take care of that situation if it is not already taken care of?

Mr. WOODRUM. I should be glad to discuss the matter with the gentlewoman.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I am a member of the Appropriations Committee and should like to make a statement. With reference to this responsibility of the Appropriations Committee, I emphasized last year the very matter to which the gentleman refers. It is my belief that it is an error that these high-class men connected with the Appropriations Committee are not permitted in vacation, when they do have time, to visit the various departments and bureaus and have the power of inspection and visitation. Further, they ought to have the power to sit in on the hearings of the Budget. I think those are two constructive suggestions.

Mr. WOODRUM. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. WHITE. With reference to the item of $5,363,476 for Foreign Service pay adjustment, does this result in increasing the pay of those in the Foreign Service?

Mr. WOODRUM. Not at all. Congress passed a law authorizing the reimbursement of our representatives in foreign countries where, because of an appreciation of the currency, their salaries have been reduced. They have to take the money that we send them and convert it into foreign exchange. In many instances, because of a disparity in exchange, their salaries were cut almost in half, and this brings them up to the equivalent of what we paid them before devaluation.

Mr. WHITE. Does it take into account the change in the monetary units of the different countries and the decrease in the value of the foreign monetary units?

Mr. WOODRUM. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE. This does not operate to increase their pay at all?

Mr. WOODRUM. This does not operate to increase anyone's pay.

Mr. CURLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CURLEY. I have listened very attentively to the gentleman's explanation of this matter. I was very much surprised to learn that the Appropriations Committee has not this personnel which the gentleman says is needed to provide the information necessary for an intelligent conclusion as to the amount required to defray the expenses of the various departments in our great Government. I may say to the gentleman that that system is now in effect in the great city of New York. The executive budget has such a personnel provided. The budget director has a staff of inspectors, or examiners, as they are called, and they are in touch with the various heads of the departments throughout the city from the time the tentative budget is received by the budget director to the time final report is made.

Mr. WOODRUM. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, I want to comment upon one or two new activities in this bill.

We carry here an appropriation for The National Archives in the sum of $617,000. This is not one of the new agencies that has grown up under this administration, though I am sure the present administration would be quite willing to share in the responsibility or the credit. I think it is more of a credit than a responsibility so far as the establishment of that great department is concerned. I have in my hand a very interesting set of photographs which I desire to pass among the Members, if it is not dramatizing too much what I am trying to say.

I should like the Members to see what the agents of the National Archives found when they went into some of the great departments of our Government to locate important papers and documents connected with those departments. In many instances these papers and documents vitally concerned not only the history of the country but the activities of the several departments. I will have these photographs passed around in order that you may see what the subcommittee saw and what we found to be the situation in so many instances. These various bureaus and departments of the Government had valuable records, which could not be replaced, stored in barns and cellars. They constituted not only a fire hazard but were subject to decay and disintegration, and these records were in such condition in many instances that it would certainly embarrass the Government in years to come if we had occasion to find those records.

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield myself 10 additional minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the Members will take occasion to visit The National Archives, a new organization, which inhabits a nice new building down here on Pennsylvania Avenue. Go down and look it over.

I think it is a credit to the country. It was started under another administration and has been carried on since. It is not a partisan activity but is an institution which will not only perform a useful service but for which every Member of the Congress may feel perfectly justified in having voted reasonable appropriations. They are engaged now in going through the departments and segregating the important papers which should be preserved, taking them to The National Archives, cataloging them, and putting them away for the benefit of future generations.

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. I ask this question as a matter of information. Is there any committee connected with the gentleman's work that contemplates asking for an additional $3,000,000 to be used in connection with the Archives Building?

Mr. WOODRUM. I have never heard of it.

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. I ask this by virtue of certain information which my committee, the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, has had recently.

Mr. WOODRUM. So far as I know, no such estimate or request has been made. The estimate for The National Archives, which the committee has allowed, is $617,000, which is very much less, I will say to the gentleman, than the estimate which was made when the Archives Building was originally contemplated, both as to cost and personnel.

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. Is there any proposition with regard to providing any additional equipment or adding any extension to the standing Archives Building?

Mr. WOODRUM. None that I have ever heard of, and I may say to the gentleman that there will have to be an authorization for any such appropriation.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Referring to civil-service work, I am informed by the President of the Civil Service Commission that when these people take an examination he refers those having the three highest grades to the head of the department interested. Now, let us assume that these three people belong to or support three different political parties. Is it not possible for the party in charge to select from that list of three any particular one he desires to put on the job and thus make it a matter of political appointment?

Mr. WOODRUM. The head of the department has always had, under this and other administrations, the right to choose between the three, and I may say to my friend I think he ought to have a larger right than that. A civil-service register is established without reference to political considerations, and I think the department head, if he is trying to select a person for a particular job, ought to have sufficient latitude to be able to get the person who the Civil Service Commission has said is qualified and the one he thinks is suitable for his particular work.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Under that procedure the one having the highest grade may lose out and the one having the lowest grade may be selected.

Mr. WOODRUM. That is true, but the difference between the highest and the lowest grade in such cases would be so small as not really to affect their qualifications.

Mr. RICH. There is another thing involved, if the gentleman will permit. Sometimes a man may not stand so high in his examination, but he may have personal qualifications that fit him for the position a great deal better than one who may have been able to answer the questions correctly.

Mr. WOODRUM. Exactly.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to my friend from Indiana.

Mr. LUDLOW. Has it come to the gentleman's notice that the Civil Service Commission also is perhaps running somewhat to seed in requiring scholastic degrees of applicants? I may say that it was brought to our attention in connection with the work of another subcommittee that scholastic degrees are required, for instance, of Secret Service agents, although the head of this activity very positively testifies that this should not be a leading factor in the equation at all and that it is not necessary to hold a scholastic degree in order to be an effective Secret Service agent. I am informed that more than ever before the Civil Service Commission is requiring scholastic degrees in connection with civil-service examinations and I am wondering if the gentleman knows about this. I am one of those who believe that there are many highly efficient persons who do not happen to have scholastic degrees.

Mr. WOODRUM. I would not like to subscribe to the gentleman's observation that they are running to seed, but I think there is a little "brain trust" down there somewhere or a group of Ph. D.'s or D. D. S.'s or some other kind of alphabetical designation that ought to be broken up and a little more common sense put into the examinations.

Mr. GOODWIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. GOODWIN. What has the Archives Building and its equipment cost us up to the present time?

Mr. WOODRUM. Between $12,000,000 and $13,000,000.

Mr. GOODWIN. I presume it is one of the functions of the Archives Department to prevent duplication of work, and may I ask the gentleman whether, in the appropriations for this year a reduction in the appropriations of such departments has been contemplated?

Mr. WOODRUM. I may say to my friend I do not understand that it is in any sense the function of the Archives Department to reduce duplication of work. I do not know what the gentleman means by that.

Mr. GOODWIN. The Federal Register.

Mr. WOODRUM. The Federal Register is a new function for which we provided in the last Congress and put under the Archivist.

The Federal Register is for the purpose of publishing rules and regulations of Government departments which have the force and effect of law. I remember that my friend from New York, Mr. BACON, and many Members of Congress were interested in that. You will recall that many agencies have authority to issue rules and regulations which have the force and effect of law, and they will be published in that register.

Mr. GOODWIN. The appropriation of $617,000 contemplates the publishing of the Federal Register?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. GOODWIN. May I ask if all the edicts, rules, and regulations issued by heads of departments are going to be published in the Register?

Mr. WOODRUM. The basic law provides for a committee consisting of a representative from the Justice Department, and others, with the Archivist, who may decide which rules and regulations of the heads of departments will be published in the Federal Register. It is not contemplated that all the rules and regulations, some of which are purely local, shall be published. That would be a task beyond the purpose of the publication.

Now, I should like to say something more—I do not wish to consume any more time, and I see that my time is about up. I do not like to take the time of the House, but I should like to have unanimous consent to conclude my remarks, which I will do very soon.

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Virginia may conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Now, as to the General Accounting Office. I do not believe the average Member of Congress or the average citizen appreciates the importance of the General Accounting Office.

The Comptroller General is a representative of the legislative branch of the Government. In my judgment, the present Comptroller General has performed his duties well. It is his duty to see that the Government bureaus and agencies spend their money only for the purpose that the legislative branch of the Government has given them the power to do. It is the safety valve of the Government.

All money given a bureau should go through the General Accounting Office. If you do that, you will have to double the appropriation, and it will be the best insurance that you could possibly have. They have a wonderful organization—lawyers, clerks, and everything connected with it. If you are interested, you ought to inform yourself about it. It has recovered for the Government large sums which bureaus and organizations had no authority to pay.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. RICH. Many items have been held up because the General Accounting Office thought that they were not authorized.

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes; it even tells members of the Cabinet what they cannot do and what they can do.

Another activity to which I call your attention is the Federal Power Commission. The Federal Power Commission is one of the self-supporting agencies of the Government, prior to the time we put new duties on them in the last Congress. The appropriation in 1935 was $321,000. They collected in fees more than that amount of money. There is an opportunity in the bureaus and departments of this Government to charge reasonable service fees to citizens and agencies and units and organizations that use the facilities of the Government, which would bring into the Treasury untold millions of dollars and which would not be seriously complained of. The Communications Commission is another place where that ought to be carried out.

I call attention now to the largest item in the bill, the Veterans' Administration. The total appropriation for the Veterans' Administration carried in the bill is $753,727,000. That is an increase of something like $60,000,000 over the appropriation for last year. That increase is covered by something like $40,000,000 for Spanish-American War veterans that we reinstated, and the rest of it is accounted for by the bringing in of something like 10,000 more beds in hospital and domiciliary facilities for the Veterans' Administration. When there is so much talk about inefficiency in the Government, I call to your attention the largest organization in our bill, and hold it up to you as an example of efficiency. Under this first item of salaries and expenses, $86,500,000 for 1937, let us see what it includes. It includes all personal services, all supplies and materials, including food and everything, supplies, salaries for doctors, and transportation, and so forth. The Government gives to every veteran that dies a new flag costing four or five dollars, and approximately 50,000 of them were given away last year. Something like 34,000 burials were paid for last year by the Government, amounting to $3,400,000. All of that is in that item. Then there are transportation, rent, repairs, alterations, equipment, furniture. Something like $2,000,000 in that item is for furnishings for new hospitals being brought in. Business is increasing with the Veterans' Administration. On the chart over to the left there will be found hospitals and domiciliary beds. In 1936 we had 66,600 available hospital and domiciliary beds in the Veterans' Administration. For 1937 it goes up 10,000. The estimate for 1938 is about 4,000 more than that, bringing it up to 77,000. I call attention particularly to the fact that between 1936 and 1937 there is an increase of 10,000 available beds for veterans in homes and hospitals. Not only that, but let us look at the increase in beneficiaries, shown by this chart under pensions. I wish I could take all afternoon and analyze this chart on veterans' benefits, which all of us ought to know when we talk to our veterans' organizations at home.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. RICH. In reference to hospitals, is it the purpose of the Federal Government or the Veterans' Administration to continue the building of hospitals for additional beds, or is the Veterans' Administration going to utilize more beds that are now in public hospitals, which can be had for the use of veterans, which would help the hospitals as well as the veterans?

Mr. WOODRUM. There are two reasons why the Government has never used beds in private hospitals any more than it has. The first is that the veterans themselves do not want them. They want to be in hospitals and homes where their buddies are. The second is that the average cost in a general hospital is $7 and some odd cents per day while in the Government hospital, where he gets exactly the same treatment, and, the Government thinks, a little better, a more personal treatment, it is $3 and some odd cents per day. Of course, the gentleman knows that when you go to a private hospital, you have not only the cost per day for bed and board, but you have physicians', surgical, and medical fees.

Mr. RICH. Does that figure in in the cost of the Government hospital all of the overhead cost?

Mr. WOODRUM. No. Not if you consider as overhead the initial cost of construction.

Mr. RICH. Then it costs the taxpayers of the country a whole lot more in the veterans' hospitals than if they were taken care of in private hospitals.

Mr. WOODRUM. That is not so. The increasing load will be confined more especially to mental cases. They are increasing the load, and the reason that we are having to increase the facilities is on account of mental cases, and the private hospitals do not want those cases.

Mr. RICH. I was not thinking so much of that.

Mr. WOODRUM. Those cases constitute from 75 percent to 80 percent of the problem.

Mr. HEALEY. By domiciliary beds does the gentleman mean treatment of the veterans in their own homes?

Mr. WOODRUM. No; I mean veterans' homes. I am not speaking about patient treatment. There is not only an increase of 10,000 beds, but in 1935 there were 838,938 beneficiaries of all descriptions drawing compensation from the Veterans' Administration. In 1937 there will be 899,485, or an increase of 60,547 beneficiaries. There we have an increase of 10,000 hospital cases and an increase of 60,000 beneficiaries, but at the same time a decrease in the administrative cost in the total. How is that made possible? I want to be fair, I do not want to give the Veterans' Administration credit for anything to which it is not entitled. There are one or two places where this figures in. One is in the military and naval insurance, the old war-risk insurance.

Some of the veterans tell us that on the original policies they paid for all that insurance. They think they did, but they did not. The Government has paid so far one and one-third billion dollars, and the veterans have paid $454,000,000. The Government has paid about 75 percent. The veterans have paid $454,000,000, to be exact, and the Government has paid one and one-third billion of the cost of that war-risk insurance. The Government has a potential obligation of some $600,000,000 before that old contract is wiped out. The new policy which is issued, of course, is self-sustaining, and the veteran is paying for it. There is a reduction in this total cost of the Veterans' Administration. Here is a department whose activities are greatly increased, whose load is increasing, yet its administrative cost is being held down to the minimum. The veterans' organization is the largest activity in the Government.

Mr. REECE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Certainly.

Mr. REECE. Are the veterans paying the entire cost on the present insurance policies, or is some of the cost chargeable to the Government?

Mr. WOODRUM. None of it is chargeable to the Government except the administrative cost of handling it. The veteran is paying the entire cost of the policy, except that there is no charge made against the life-insurance fund for the clerical and administrative cost of handling it, which is not a great item because it is handled in connection with other affairs in the Bureau.

Mr. REECE. So that when dividends are paid to the policyholders, those administrative items are not taken into account and charged against the policy?

Mr. WOODRUM. Not at all; no, sir.

Now, I want to mention one other activity and then I will yield the floor.

Mr. SEGER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SEGER. Will you say again what the number of deaths was last year? Did you say it was 50,000?

Mr. WOODRUM. I said they gave out approximately 50,000 flags.

Mr. SEGER. That would mean that 50,000 veterans passed away in that year?

Mr. WOODRUM. That is my understanding. It sounds like a great many, but that figure includes veterans of all wars. Now, I exhibit to you the latest model of a Douglas transport, with 17 or 18 passenger accommodations, and a cruising speed of 200 miles an hour. I am not definite, although I am reasonably sure of it, that that is the type plane which recently crashed in Arkansas. We have in our bill the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, which we think is one of the most useful activities of the Federal Government. That is a company of highly trained scientists and specialists who devote their time and energy to research and experimentation in airplanes and their problems. This particular Douglas plane, which is built very similar to the Martin clipper, has on it two notable improvements in aviation which were a direct result of the activities of the National Advisory Committee on Aeronautics. There is simply no way of placing a financial value on the work which that commission has done.

You may recall, in the first place, that in some of the older planes, and perhaps some of them are still in use, the engine was suspended over the fuselage. On some of them it was under the fuselage. It has been found by this commission, after careful investigation, that by placing the engine as you see it placed here, on the leading edge of the wing, not only do they get additional power but less interference, and they are able to get a higher speed and get decreased fuel consumption. It is because of that that these high-power planes are able to make a speed of 200 miles an hour. Now, they say that commercial transports are asking for planes that will go at least 300 or 350 miles an hour. That is going pretty fast.

Another development that this commission has brought to the field of aviation is this little hood which, in aviation parlance, is called a cowling. It is a little cap that goes over the edge of the motor. It is an air-cooled motor. It permits enough air through the propeller to cool the engine, yet it prevents interference or resistance which retards the speed of the planes and causes an increase or acceleration in fuel consumption.

Those two propositions have been adopted by the manufacturers of airplanes all over the country now. The latest planes have them. This little wing that you see on the bottom of the plane which is controlled by the pilot and is lowered or put up at his desire is used when the plane comes down to a stop. That balances or equalizes the plane and permits a high-powered heavy plane to land with much more safety than it could have done otherwise.

The National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics was organized principally to serve the Army and Navy; to do their research and experimental work, but the benefits of their discoveries and research are made available for commercial aviation. I mention that just now because it seems to be so appropriate, right at a time when this great industry is growing; yet, with all of the precautions for safety which have been thrown around it, we find a few days ago such shocking things happen, as brought sorrow to the hearts of all of us.

Now, you have been very kind and patient and I want to leave the floor. I dislike to leave these charts without going into them much more in detail. I want to commend this to you, that you take the hearings and look them over, and especially look over the statement of General Hines on the Veterans' Administration, because every Member here is vitally concerned with that. This will give you accurate information of what we are doing for our veterans, so that when we go back home we can tell them the real story of what the Government is doing for their health.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Is it not a fact that the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics played a prominent part in the development of the retractible undercarriage?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes. I neglected to mention that.

I want to thank you very much for your kind patience and attention. My colleague from Massachusetts, Mr. WIGGLESWORTH, will have something to say on this bill, and then we hope that, after such long debate, it will be the pleasure of the committee to permit us to proceed as expeditiously as possible with the reading of the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 25 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include two short tables I have prepared and several letters which I have written to or received from agencies covered by this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, at the outset I want also to express my appreciation of the courtesy which has been accorded me by the majority members of this subcommittee. I have had the pleasure of working on this bill for a number of years with the distinguished chairman of this subcommitee the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM]. He is one of the outstanding Members of this House. It is always a pleasure and a privilege to serve with him. I am indebted to him and the other majority members of the subcommittee for their consideration at all times.

There has been some discussion as to the totals involved in this bill. When we brought this bill on the floor a year ago, we provided for total appropriations amounting to about $777,000,000, an increase of about $160,000,000 over the previous fiscal year. During the year this total was increased by deficiency items until it reached the sum of $805,000,000, or thereabouts.

The total made available by the bill before us today amounts to approximately $927,000,000, or an increase of about $122,000,000, as compared with the total for the present fiscal year. If we take into consideration five items to which the chairman has referred appearing in the bill for the present fiscal year but not included in the bill under consideration, if we also take into consideration one or two items of reappropriation which are not reflected in the table at the end of the committee report, I think it is fair to say that the increase made available for the next fiscal year as compared with the present fiscal year amounts to well over $127,000,000.

There are 22 items in the bill. Of these items seven reflect a decrease.

As has been pointed out, the increase is reflected in large measure both in the direct cost and in the indirect cost of new Federal activities set up under the present administration. It is also reflected in the items for the Veterans' Administration.

The principal item in the bill, of course, and one in which we are always greatly interested, is the item the chairman has just discussed dealing with the Veterans' Administration. This item amounts for the next fiscal year to about $794,000,000, an increase of about $67,000,000 over the present year. This increase is explained in three ways: First, by the liberalization, with which we are all familiar, in respect to Spanish War veterans who were so drastically cut under the terms of the Economy Act; second, by the increase of $60,000,000 in respect to the adjusted-service certificate fund, an increase which seems to be largely academic; and, third, by an increase in respect to hospital facilities, to which the chairman has already made reference.

It will be recalled that last year emphasis was placed on the absolute necessity for additional hospital facilities, particularly for neuropsychiatric cases, of which there are today, unfortunately, no less than 21,000, and of which General Hines tells us we must ultimately expect a total approaching 44,000. If the construction program contemplated in this bill is carried through, it will make possible the expenditure of some $12,000,000 in the present year, and some $17,000,000 in the next fiscal year, providing an increase in the number of beds of about 12,000. To be exact, it is anticipated that we shall have a total of 55,858 hospital beds as compared with 44,793 as of June 30 last, and 21,216 domiciliary beds as compared with 20,073 on June 30 last. Four new units are included in the program, one at Reno, one at Detroit, one at White River Junction, and the fourth either in Alabama or Tennessee. The committee questioned General Hines as to the adequacy of this hospital program and was assured by him that in his judgment it should be adequate for all foreseeable needs during the next 5 years.

Turning now to the new activities carried in the bill, I call attention, Mr. Chairman, first, to the appropriation for the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield before he leaves the subject of hospital facilities?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Gladly.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. I am pleased to state that the subcommittee having charge of the location of a neuropsychiatric hospital are now making investigations in Tennessee and Alabama looking to the location of this facility. They are on the ground at this time through appointment by General Hines.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I thank the gentleman for the information.

In the item for the Interstate Commerce Commission the committee will find provision for two additional activities, $160,000 for air-mail regulation and $1,700,000 for motor-transport regulation. Both of these, of course, result from recent legislation. I call attention to the fact that the Commission has decided that it is desirable, insofar as motor-traffic regulation is concerned, to organize an independent unit under the supervision of those having motor-carrier experience, exercising control over the hundreds of thousands of carriers brought under the jurisdiction of this unit through an extensive field force, the country being divided into 16 districts, the work being carried on in cooperation with the several States. The Commission feels that the peak in the work of this activity will be reached almost immediately because of the necessity of issuing certificates of public convenience and because of the necessity of the determination of tariffs.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Before he leaves the subject of motor-truck transportation, can the chairman give us any explanation of the very considerable difference between the amount asked by the Commission and the amount allowed by the Budget and the Appropriations Committee?

As I understand it, the Commission asked for $3,000,000. The amount carried in the bill is only $1,700,000. Yet the peak of the work will be reached immediately. I wonder if, in the gentleman's opinion, the amount carried in the bill is sufficient to meet the situation?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. The committee did not feel justified in raising the amount. I may say to the gentleman that in several cases in this bill he will find that the amounts requested, particularly by the newer activities, have been very materially slashed by the Bureau of the Budget.

For the Railroad Retirement Board there is carried a total appropriation of $47,645,000, all of which, with the exception of $1,025,000, is for the payment of annuities estimated as payable during the next fiscal year. The Board estimates that there will be some 40,000 persons who may be expected to apply for annuities as of the 1st of July next. Annuities are payable at the age of 65 or at the completion of 30 years of service. The maximum monthly payment is $120, one-half of that sum being paid in the event of death to the widow or next of kin. The Members of the House will have in mind the companion tax measure, which was passed along with this bill. The tax measure is effective until February 28, 1937. The Board estimates the yield from this tax at between $135,000,000 and $140,000,000 and makes the further estimate that if continued in effect the receipts from this tax should about balance estimated annuity payments as of the year 1950.

I commend to the members of the committee the testimony of the Federal Power Commission and the Securities Exchange Commission for some idea of the enormous additional duties that have been placed upon the shoulders of those two agencies under the public-utility holding company legislation. The bill carries $1,325,000 additional for duties devolving upon the Power Commission and $1,223,400 additional for duties devolving upon the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The National Labor Relations Board is, of course, another new agency provided for in the bill.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I yield to my colleague from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONNERY. With reference to the National Labor Relations Board, I understand the amount allowed by the committee is sufficient for the coming fiscal year. However, I understand that unless the amount is raised considerably in the deficiency appropriation bill, the Board will not be able to function between now and July 1. I call the attention of my colleague and the members of the committee to that fact.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I think the Board is one of the agencies that feels it has been severely cut at the hands of the Budget Bureau.

The Board as at present constituted consists of three members, with a total personnel of 146, functioning through 21 regional offices. Three hundred and seventy-four cases have been received by the Board since September 14. Of these 105 have been definitely closed.

The Central Statistical Bureau has been referred to, and I shall not dwell upon it at length. One hundred seventy-five thousand four hundred and twenty dollars is provided in the bill. There is a maximum statutory limitation of $180,000. Just to show the conditions confronting the Board, I call attention to the fact that the testimony in this connection indicates the existence of about 180 statistical agencies in Washington. There are more than 20 Federal agencies engaged in collecting statistical data pertaining to electricity, almost identical information being required by a number of these agencies.

The testimony indicates that the Board recognizes "a rapidly increasing resentment on the part of the public against the number of statitsical inquiries"; also that "a chaotic situation" resulted in 1933 from the discontinuance of long-established statistical services under the Economy Act, while new agencies, particularly under the N. R. A., were springing up, proposing to do with newly organized forces the same sort of work that old agencies were being compelled to discontinue; also that the Board believed at that time that unless coordination could be brought about "the burden upon respondents would be intolerable"; also the fact that the Board has "disagreed violently with some of the philosophy of the Works Progress Administration and its predecessor organization", leading to the disapproval of projects that "would have harassed the public * * * and produced statistics that might have been worse than useless."

The Board cited in this connection the placing of enumerators on station platforms "to interview commuters going to New York upon their breakfast habits." This testimony, I think, gives some idea of the maze of uncoordinated effort, the duplication of effort in this field of work as between the many Federal agencies. The Board hopes to contribute to bringing some order out of existing chaos and, incidentally, to realize the saving of substantial sums of money.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. There was something suggested this morning I should like to comment upon. If the Statistical Board had the power to eliminate a lot of this duplication, it would accomplish a whole lot more in doing away with the work that one department is doing in duplication of that of another. Does the gentleman not believe it would be wise for Congress to adopt the policy of giving this Board the power to make these adjustments?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I think the Board should be given a chance to see what it can do. I think it has paved the way for helpful action, and, for my part, I am willing to give it a chance. It is confronted by a chaotic situation, and I hope it may accomplish something of real value.

One other new activity has been referred to, and that is the Federal Register set up as a branch of The National Archives. The Members of the House are familiar with the impossible situation which has arisen during the past 34 months as a result of the issuance and cancelation of Executive orders, proclamations, rules, and regulations by this and that Executive agency, having the force of law, as a result of authority delegated or surrendered by the Congress. It has been impossible to know what orders have been issued, what orders have been withdrawn, or where to find applicable orders. It is the aim of this new activity, as I understand it, to collect, compile, and publish all orders, rules, regulations, and other documents of this kind having general applicability.

The publication is to be made first through a daily register which it is planned to publish about five times a week; and, second, through a supplement which it is estimated will require from 10 to 20 volumes. The purpose is to provide in this way a register which may be turned to and used as a reference book just as the volumes containing the laws enacted by the Congress are used today. It is hoped in this way to mitigate to some extent the trials of government by Executive order by which we have been confronted during the last 3 years.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I yield.

Mr. RICH. When the gentleman started his discourse this afternoon he stated there was an increase in this bill of $127,000,000 in the 22 items which it carries, but the report states the increase is $74,509,747.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. If the gentleman will add to this figure the amount of $47,600,000, or thereabouts, appearing as a saving realized by the committee, but in fact a saving through the medium of reappropriation of unexpended balances, he will arrive at the approximate total which is made available through the medium of this bill.

Mr. RICH. Does not the gentleman think in enlightening the Members of the Congress these savings taken from other appropriations should be included in the totals, so we would be properly informed of the total amount of increases in the appropriations of the departments from one year to another?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I think the committee has been very frank as to what the savings actually are. The chairman made it very clear in his remarks.

Mr. RICH. I should also like to ask the gentleman this question: In the last several years when we had the reports of the Appropriations Committee on these various department bills, we have found out that funds have been delegated from various channels and reappropriated to the various departments. Does the gentleman now know whether funds of the Federal Government from any other source are going to be applicable to these bureaus and establishments during the year 1937?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I cannot assure the gentleman, of course, as to the future. I can say, however, that the committee has endeavored, consistently, to check up on each and every activity appearing before it as to funds which it has received in the past, and the gentleman will find a statement by each agency as to what funds, if any, have been received from emergency appropriations.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself an additional 20 minutes.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Yes; I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DONDERO. Can the gentleman tell the House how much more the present bill carries by way of appropriation than the bill of last year?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I stated at the outset of my remarks that the total amounts to approximately $127,000,000, explained in part by the direct cost of additional activities, in part by their indirect cost, and in part by an increase in the item for the Veterans' Administration.

I want to say a word about the indirect cost of some of these new activities, because I think that a glance at the appropriations for such agencies as the General Accounting Office, the Civil Service Commission, and the Employees' Compensation Commission makes this indirect cost very apparent.

Let us take the General Accounting Office just for a moment. You will find a total appropriation of over $5,300,000, or an increase of over $336,000, as compared with the present fiscal year. This appropriation takes care of a force of about 2,400 employees; but in addition to this amount there is the sum of approximately $3,000,000 provided out of emergency funds taking care of a further force of 1,700 employees on a temporary status. Some idea of the increase in work devolving upon this Office is found, I think, in the fact that normally, before this administration, the Office was called upon to audit about 31,000,000 checks each year. This number has now risen to about 90,000,000; and in addition to this the Office testifies that there are from 7,000,000 to 8,000,000 checks each month coming in in respect of the $4,800,000,000 lump-sum appropriation made available to the President during the last session. The testimony indicates that even if there should be curtailment in the spending activities of the departments and agencies during the fiscal year 1937 the effect would not be felt by the General Accounting Office for at least a year thereafter. I quote from the testimony:

> There is only one ray of hope—that agencies may become more proficient and thus make our work less difficult. * * * As yet, however, there has been little to justify encouragement in this regard.

For the Civil Service Commission, Members will find a total appropriation of $48,885,000, an increase of about $6,255,000. Of this sum $6,050,000 is in respect of the civil-service retirement fund, resulting, in large measure, from work in connection with the 30-year retirement law.

For the Federal Employees' Compensation Commission the bill provides an appropriation of about $5,300,000—$4,750,000 being for the employees' compensation fund, an increase of half a million dollars over the present fiscal year. The increase, of course, is the result of the increased number of civil employees in Federal agencies, including administrative personnel for relief agencies.

The Commission reports 34,325 compensation cases, an increase of 25 percent during the fiscal year 1935.

I want to emphasize that this is only a beginning insofar as compensation cases are concerned. In addition to the employees' compensation fund there are three special funds set aside applicable respectively to the C. W. A., the C. C. C., and the W. P. A. workers.

Eleven million dollars is available for the C. W. A. workers. There have been 168,855 cases, with expenditures to date of about $4,000,000, and an estimated total of $28,000,000.

For the C. C. C. there is a fund of $5,200,000 available. There have been reported to date 16,797 cases, with a total expenditure of $300,000.

The W. P. A. fund is $28,000,000. A supplemental estimate will be submitted in this connection. Between 450 and 500 applications for compensation are being received each day.

Mr. BOLTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I yield.

Mr. BOLTON. Those are for compensation alone. Will the gentleman call attention to the fact that medical treatment is also given the W. P. A. and the C. C. C. workers, in addition to the compensation fund, which means an expenditure of millions of dollars.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. That is correct. The additional cost is, of course, impossible to estimate.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I yield.

Mr. GIFFORD. I was hoping that the gentleman would go into the Securities and Exchange Commission as to the indirect cost. I presume there was no estimate made before the committee as to the indirect cost to the people of the country.

I thought when the gentleman talked about indirect costs, that probably it might be a matter of some interest.

From the testimony offered—and I read the hearings in entirety—it seems to me many pertinent questions were not asked by the committee. Now, I wish to ask if the type of reports for purposes of registration that are required are not proving very costly to the corporations and individuals?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I was not attempting to cover the whole field of indirect cost but merely to state two or three instances where it seemed to me to be obvious.

Mr. GIFFORD. What I wanted to bring out is this: It has constantly been stressed that when we placed these new activities with power to make corporations or individuals make just the exact statement the particular activity required, it is very costly to the particular company. Take the income tax. It costs the people of the United States $400,000,000 to make returns and recover taxes illegally collected. In every instance when we add to these activities I would like to see real justification and results from such activities. I should like to know whether it has been a deterrent, whether registrations to date have been asked for just for the sake of refinancing at present low rates of interest, and why new activities fear to register.

I see the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce present. I want to know whether I am correct in my supposition. The registrations for new business and new activities have been extremely small—$30,000,000 out of a billion and a quarter the first 6 months of 1935, as I recall it, and before that even less. The Appropriations Committee is the only committee having opportunity to question the Commission. I am interested. I am on the Committee on Expenditures. We cannot get a single activity of the Government before my committee to ask them to justify their expenditures, and that is why I have asked these general questions of this committee. When you are appropriating this money they should justify their activities. The gentleman will pardon me, but that is not a criticism of his committee. But this is the information we desire.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Yes.

Mr. TABER. I wonder if the gentleman can tell us anything about the number of employees assigned from different bureaus and departments to other bureaus and departments in this bill. For instance, I know that there is a very large amount of that sort of thing going on, and it makes it almost impossible for the congressional committees to tell what is going on in these executive bureaus and departments if we do not know just how many employees are paid out of particular funds, who are doing work in these different bureaus and independent offices.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. It is difficult to answer that question in a general way. I think there has been some of that which has been reflected in the bill, but, on the other hand, the committee has tried to check up in each instance. I recall that certain of those carried on the rolls of the National Recovery Administration, for instance, were made available, I think, to the Trade Commission, and, of course, a great many temporary employees have been made available in some instances out of emergency funds.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. Noting the interrogation of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] with reference to the Securities Commission and the administration of the Securities Act, it has been my definite impression for the last 18 months that whatever the gentleman calls the burdens placed upon companies that desire to float a new issue of securities, it has not been deterred by the act. I am speaking of those companies of the better type. Of course, there are companies in the country that in the past, without the people knowing the facts called for in these questionnaires, have issued securities and sold them to the public that were practically entirely worthless. I call the gentleman's attention to this fact. During the years from 1922 to 1932 there were issued in this country by various corporations $50,000,000,000 in new securities.

The Department of Commerce, over which Mr. Hoover presided for 8 years, made an investigation of those securities and gave it as his deliberate judgment that $25,000,000,000 of those were not worth the paper on which they were written. It was to discourage things of that sort that the securities act was passed, and that called for the facts with reference to a company, its financial condition, its history, its prospects, and so forth, so that the Commission, if an inquiring prospective investor asked the question, could give him the facts with reference to that company. The securities act was not passed to stop or prohibit a company from issuing securities and it does not do that. It simply says that in order to float their securities in interstate commerce they must register with the Securities and Exchange Commission and give all the facts that that Commission asks for.

Mr. GIFFORD. Does the gentleman recall the company that I have just referred to which was put to an expense of a million dollars to do that—a very respectable company?

Mr. RAYBURN. It was a far-flung company, which, as I remember, had not had an audit or made an accounting to its stockholders for more than 10 years. It was a far-flung company. It owned businesses in many States of the Union, and in my opinion the Securities Commission did, not only that company but all of its stockholders, a very great favor in bringing its business up to date.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield that I may put one more question?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I am always glad to yield to my colleague from Massachusetts.

Mr. GIFFORD. This is an important matter. The Commission appeared before the gentleman's committee and justified their existence by telling how many crooked stockbrokers they closed out of business in Boston, but I can get the figures, I think I have them partially. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] not know that very few registrations have been made before that Commission for new activities?

Why is it? Has this proved a deterrent and an expensive proposition, and has it justified putting out of business a few crooked stock brokers?

Mr. RAYBURN. Not at all, for the reason that the gentleman must know the country has not been in shape to launch new business. It has been difficult enough to refinance the business we have, and a great deal of that has not been refinanced. What we try to do in this act, and I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will pardon me, so far as I am concerned, with this statement I am through—what we tried to do in this act and in the administration of it was to hold up the good company that has not in the past issued spurious securities, that has conducted a good business. In other words, we tried to take the desperado out of business, who in the past has been disgracing the man who tried in the same line of business to do a decent, high type and fair type of business.

Mr. GIFFORD. Closing my remarks, Mr. Chairman [laughter], if, to catch a few crooks, this enormous expense and this real deterrent to business is justified we should be informed. The gentleman speaks about this not being a good time to launch new business. There has not been any degree of confidence in launching new business. We insist that this has been a deterrent to new business.

Mr. RAYBURN. Of course, I deny that it has been a deterrent to the proper kind of business.

Mr. GIFFORD. Of course, I am wrong [laughter], but I think these questions might bring some results, and I again ask why we are appropriating all this money simply to catch a few crooks in Boston.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH] has expired.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, under the rules of the House I have only a few minutes left. I wonder if I may have the same privilege as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] and ask unanimous consent to proceed until my remarks are concluded.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman may proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield for one further inquiry?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I yield.

Mr. TREADWAY. I should like to call the gentleman's attention to the appropriation made in this bill for the maintenance of the Tariff Commission in the sum of $941,000. In the hearings I do not find any reference to how that is divided, but I do find a table on page 16 of the committee's report showing the reciprocal trade agreement amendment to the Tariff Act of 1930, wherein $178,000 is set aside out of the $945,000 for reciprocal-trade agreements. May I ask the gentleman whether in the Organic Act establishing the Tariff Commission, there is any provision for an appropriation of that sort, in order to give the Department of State the power to investigate reciprocal-trade agreements, so-called? I personally do not see why that item should be included in the needs of the Tariff Commission for the purpose for which we suppose the Tariff Commission acts.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I will say to my colleague that I cannot answer his question as to the organic act establishing the Tariff Commission. I am informed that the gentleman is correct in stating that the sum of $178,000 was allocated by the Bureau of the Budget for reciprocal-tariff work in determining the total appropriation for the Tariff Commission.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman makes a very illuminating reply. May I ask the gentleman's opinion as to the value of the work done by the Tariff Commission in looking up reciprocal trade treaty matters?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I had intended to go into that before concluding my remarks, if allowed to conclude them.

I may say, however, that in my judgment the value of the work done by the Commission in this connection has certainly not been established by the testimony before the subcommittee.

I do not want to presume on the time of the Members unduly, but I do want to make three or four observations of a general character before concluding my remarks.

The first observation I would make is this: Yesterday my colleague from Massachusetts, Mr. CONNERY, introduced a resolution of investigation with reference to the work of the Federal Communications Commission. I was particularly interested in this resolution and in the remarks which the gentleman made in connection with it, because it seems to me that our minds have been running along similar lines in this connection. As a matter of fact, under date of January 4, as a result of the hearings and developments incident to those hearings, I addressed a letter of inquiry to the Communications Commission. I have just received a reply to that letter. Under the authority already accorded me, in view of the interest of the matter at this time, I shall insert at this point in my remarks a copy of my letter and the reply.

JANUARY 4, 1936.

Hon. A. S. PRALL,
Chairman Federal Communications Commission,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: With further reference to your testimony before the subcommittee on appropriations for the independent offices, and in light of questions raised since that time, I should appreciate it if you would be good enough to furnish me with answers to the following questions:

1. How many of the high-powered, clear-channel radio stations (about 40 in number, I believe) are owned or operated by those independent of and not affiliated with any of the three major networks?

2. To what extent evening time, between 8 and 10, has been sold during the past year to agencies acting for national advertisers?

3. The extent of control, if any, exercised by your Commission over leases or assignments by licensed stations.

4. The foundation, if any, for the assertion that licensed stations have in fact concluded leases for long periods of time (5 to 10 years, for example)?

5. The foundation, if any, for the assertion that one license was issued without cost to the licensee, the licensee with or without approval of your Commission having concluded a 10-year lease calling for a payment of several million dollars?

6. Extent to which leases by licensees, when approved by your Commission, are a matter of public record and open to inspection?

7. Whether or not it is the intent of your Commission to give any further consideration to the petition addressed to you under date of April 5, 1935, bearing the signatures of 16 Members of the House of Representatives in the light of affidavits said to have been filed with your Commission.

8. Whether or not in such inquiry as was made in this connection the parties or any one of them making the affidavits referred to were examined and, if not, the reasons for nonexamination.

9. Whether or not your Commission has ever ascertained how the trade publication, Broadcasting, happened to publish on or about May 1, 1935, the statement in regard to the activities of the Commission in this connection.

10. The basis for revoking or refusing to renew the license of the Meyer Broadcasting Co.

11. The steps taken by your Commission, if any, to secure compliance with "cease and desist orders" issued by the Federal Trade Commission.

12. In what instances, if any, has compliance proved difficult or impossible.

13. The foundation, if any, for the assertion that in at least one instance 22 months have elapsed before final briefs are presented after case is before your Commission.

14. The length of time that your Commission has had under consideration the question of issuing an additional license to the Shepard Broadcasting Co. or one of its subsidiaries.

15. A list of radio stations owned, controlled, or operated by the Shepard Broadcasting Co. in New England and the percentage which those in Masachusetts bear to the total number in Massachusetts.

An early response would be greatly appreciated.

Sincerely yours,

———— ————.

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., January 13, 1936.

Hon. RICHARD B. WIGGLESWORTH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In response to your letter of January 4, 1936, there are presented herewith answers to your questions as follows:

(1) Five high-powered, clear-channel radio stations are owned or operated by those independent of, and not affiliated with, any of the three major networks.

(2) The records of the Commission do not disclose to what extent evening time between 8 and 10 has been sold during the past year to agencies acting for national advertisers, and I am, therefore, unable to give you this information.

(3) Section 310 (b) of the Communications Act of 1934 provides:

"The station license required hereby, the frequencies authorized to be used by the licensee, and the rights therein granted shall not be transferred, assigned, or in any manner either voluntarily or involuntarily disposed of, or indirectly by transfer of control of any corporation holding such license, to any person, unless the Commission shall, after securing full information, decide that said transfer is in the public interest, and shall give its consent in writing."

Pursuant to this section, the Commission has promulgated its rule no. 103.18, which provides:

"An application for consent to assignment of a construction permit or license, or for consent to transfer of control of a corporation holding a construction permit or license, shall be filed with the Commission at least 60 days prior to the contemplated effective date of assignment or transfer of control.

"If the assignment of property of a station, or transfer of control of a licensee corporation is voluntary, the appropriate application shall be fully executed by both assignor and assignee and, if involuntary, by assignee only.

"In support of each such application affecting a radio station there shall be submitted under oath or affirmation, in addition to the information required by the forms furnished by the Commission, in properly marked exhibits, the following information:

"A. If the application is for transfer of license:

"(1) A complete detailed list of all the items of property and assets of the station, including intangibles; real property must be listed separately showing both the buildings and land. If no real property is involved, applicant must so state.

"(2) A similar list showing with reference to the items of property and assets given: (a) The original cost to the licensee, when and from whom purchased; (b) the present depreciated value and method of computing depreciation, and the replacement value and method of determining same.

This information may be given on one sheet in different columns, and the total of each column must be given. Applicant must show the latest tax assessed value, separately of buildings and land, together with the date of assessment. If the real estate has not been recently assessed or has not been assessed at full value, applicant must submit a report of independent appraisal of the realty, showing date said assessment was made, together with the name of the assessor.

"(3) A profit-and-loss statement of the assignor showing receipts and disbursements in detail and also profit or loss for a period of 6 months preceding the filing of the application;

"(4) A financial statement of the assignee showing in detail the items of assets and liabilities and assignee's financial ability to continue the operation of the station in the public interest, together with the date of said statement.

"(5) Where the assignment is voluntary, an executed copy of the contract or lease agreement which must provide (a) that assignee shall have complete control of the station, its equipment and operation, including unlimited supervision of programs to be broadcast; (b) transfer shall be subject to the consent of the Commission; and (c) the price, whether paid or promised, and all the terms and conditions of the proposed sale or transfer.

"(6) Where assignment of property of the station is involuntary, a certified copy of the court order or other legal instrument effecting the transfer, showing all the terms and conditions under which the transfer is made, including the consideration therefor.

"(7) A copy of the articles of incorporation of the assignee, if a corporation, showing its power to engage in radio broadcasting, certified by the secretary of state of the State in which the assignee is incorporated.

"(8) A list of names, nationalities, and addresses of incorporators, directors, and officers, and of all stockholders owning 5 percent or more of the stock of said assignee corporation and all corporations controlling said assignee.

"(9) Applicants for the Commission's consent to the transfer of a license from one licensee to another must join in a statement under oath as to whether there are contracts, agreements, or understandings (other than the one submitted under subparagraph 5 above), whether written or oral, which may in any wise affect or concern the transfer contemplated, the financial arrangements between the parties, the equipment of the station, or its operation or supervision. If there are no such contracts or understandings, the statement should clearly evidence this fact; if there are any such contracts, full and complete copies thereof properly executed must be submitted. Action will not be had on any such application until this information is fully supplied.

"B. If the application is for transfer of control of a licensee corporation:

"(1) A complete detailed list of all the items of property and assets of the station, including intangibles.

"Real property must be listed separately, showing both the buildings and land. If no real property is involved, applicant must so state.

"(2) A similar list showing with reference to the items of property and assets given: (a) The original cost to the licensee, when and from whom purchased; (b) the present depreciated value and method of computing depreciation, and the replacement value and method of determining same.

"This information may be given on one sheet in different columns, and the total of each column must be given. Applicant must show the latest tax assessed value, separately of buildings and land, together with the date of assessment. If the real estate has not been recently assessed or has not been assessed at full value, applicant must submit a report of independent appraisal of the realty, showing date said assessment was made, together with the name of the assessor.

"(3) A financial statement of the licensee corporation, control of which is to be transferred, showing in detail the items of assets and liabilities, together with the date of said statement.

"(4) A profit-and-loss statement of said licensee corporation showing the receipts and disbursements in detail and also profit or loss for a period of 6 months preceding the filing of the application.

"(5) If control of the licensee corporation is to be transferred by contract, a fully executed copy thereof, showing the date and all the terms and conditions, including the exact consideration paid or promised, with a condition that the transfer be subject to the consent of the Commission.

"(6) If control of said licensee corporation is to be transferred by involuntary means, a certified copy of the court order or other legal instrument affecting the transfer of control, showing all the terms and conditions thereof, including the consideration therefor.

"(7) If control is to be transferred to a corporation, a copy of the articles of incorporation, properly certified by the secretary of state of the State in which the corporation is incorporated;

"(8) A list of names, nationalities, and addresses of incorporators, directors, and officers, and of all stockholders owning 5 percent or more of the stock of said assignee corporation and all corporations controlling said assignee; and

"(9) Applicants for the Commission's consent to the transfer of control of a licensed corporation must join in a statement under oath as to whether there are contracts, agreements, or understandings (other than the one submitted under subparagraph 5 above), whether written or oral, which may in any wise affect or concern the transfer contemplated, the financial arrangements between the parties, the equipment of the station, or its operation or supervision. If there are no such contracts or understandings, the statement should clearly evidence this fact; if there are any such contracts, full and complete copies thereof properly executed must be submitted. Action will not be had on any such application until this information is fully supplied."

On August 21, 1934, the Broadcast Division promulgated its order no. 2, whereby, pursuant to the provisions of section 310 (b) of the Communications Act, it was ordered that the licensee of every radio station was required to file with the Commission on or before September 1, 1934, verified statements showing the following information as of July 15, 1934:

"1. If the licensee is a corporation—

"a. A list of the stockholders of record, together with the address and the amount of stock held by each;

"b. Whether the stock is voted by a person other than the record holder, and, if so, a copy of the agreement or other instrument authorizing same;

"c. A list of the officers and directors of said corporation, together with their addresses and the amount of stock held by each;

"d. Any other arrangement or agreement with any person or corporation which may affect the conduct or control of the business of the licensee corporation.

"2. If the licensee is a partnership, association, organization, or company (other than a corporation)—

"a. A list of the persons or corporations owning any interest therein, the amount of interest held by each person or company, and their addresses;

"b. A list of the officers and directors, and their addresses."

The licensee was further required to inform the Commission of any changes subsequent to July 14, 1934, in the ownership of stock in the licensee corporations or of the issuance of additional shares of stock and to whom issued, or any changes in the ownership of the licensee partnerships, associations, organizations, or companies. Appropriate forms for the furnishing of this information were supplied by the Commission.

Attention is particularly invited to paragraph 1 (d), which requires "any other arrangements or agreements with any person or corporation which may affect the conduct or control of the business of the licensee corporation." This of necessity includes leases or contracts for control of the station in whole or in part. The Commission has kept careful check to see that full compliance with this order was made by every licensee.

Every contract and agreement filed with the Commission under Broadcast Division order no. 2 or under section no. 103.18 is carefully scrutinized, and, if any doubt exists as to the legal effect thereof, the application is designated for public hearing, after notice to the applicant and other interested parties.

(4) The records of the Commission disclose that there are several licensed stations which have, in fact, concluded leases for periods of time from 5 years or longer. Where such contracts appeared the Commission required such licensees to file applications for permission to voluntarily assign the station license in question. You will understand, of course, that the act does not require licensees to be the owner of the station, and lessees may be licensees; but wherever a licensee executes a lease of its station to another, thus relinquishing control of the same without consent of the Commission, this constitutes a violation of the Communications Act of 1934.

(5) I have no knowledge or information with respect to your fifth question sufficient to form a belief, and therefore cannot answer the same. No approval has been requested, and none has been given, to any licensee for a 10-year lease calling for the payment of several million dollars. It is my belief that this statement is without foundation in fact.

(6) Rule 100.6 of Practice and Procedure of the Commission provides:

"Subject to the provisions of sections 4 (j), 412, and 606 of the act, the files of the Commission shall be open to inspection as follows:

"(a) Tariff schedules required to be filed under section 203 of the act and annual and monthly reports required to be filed under section 219 of the act.

"(b) Hearing dockets, only as to applications, licenses, and other instruments of authorization, notices, appearances, motions, petitions, and other pleadings, depositions, transcripts of testimony, exhibits, examiners' reports, exceptions, and orders of the Commission.

"(c) Other files, in the discretion of the Commission, upon written request describing in detail the document to be inspected, and the reasons therefor."

(7) After thorough investigation and detailed consideration of the charges contained in the petition of Representative CONNERY and others on April 5, 1935, the opinion of the Commission was that the charges were not sustained by the evidence, and the matter was therefore closed. The Commission felt constrained, on the basis of the limitations of the act under which it functioned and under legal precedent, to arrive at this conclusion. It is not the present intention of the Commission to give the incident further consideration.

(8) The Commission called upon the licensees involved to submit the continuity in question. This was done. The Commission caused a translation by one of its own employees to be made of the Spanish program alleged to be obscene, and also requested a translation to be made by the licensee. The two were then compared. A careful examination of the whole program disclosed nothing which could be determined "obscene" within the meaning of section 326 of the Communications Act of 1934. (See Knowles v. U. S., 170 Fed. 409, and Duncan v. U. S., 48 F. (2d) 128.)

(9) No.

(10) Violation by the licensee of the terms of its existing license.

(11) The Federal Communications Commission is not the enforcing agency for cease-and-desist orders issued by the Federal Trade Commission. However, the fact that a cease-and-desist order has been issued by that body is an important consideration to this Commission when action is taken upon any station's application for renewal of license. In other words, the Commission considers the fact that any station licensee may be broadcasting programs against which cease-and-desist orders of the Federal Trade Commission have been issued, as an important element in determining whether its continued operation will serve public interest.

(13) There has been no instance where any length of time even approximating 22 months has elapsed between final submission of a case to the Commission and the filing of briefs.

(14) Consideration of the Sheppard Broadcasting application has been delayed because it involves a request for an allocation of facilities contrary to existing regulations of the Commission. By reason thereof, the Commission, at considerable expense, directed the conduct of a survey through its engineering department, of the entire broadcast structure. This survey has not yet been finally completed, and no action can be taken on the Sheppard application until the Commission has before it the results of this investigation.

WEAN, Rhode Island (licensee).

WNAC, Massachusetts (licensee).

WICC, Connecticut (owns 95 percent of the stock of licensee corporation).

WAAB, Massachusetts (owns 100 percent of the stock of licensee corporation).

There are 15 stations in Massachusetts. Of these, two are owned or controlled by the Sheppard Broadcasting Co.; in other words, the Sheppard Broadcasting Co. owns or operates 13.33⅓ percent of the stations in Massachusetts.

Trusting this information meets your requirements, I am,

Very sincerely yours,

ANNING S. PRALL, Chairman.

I want to say that I agree with the point of view expressed by my colleague [Mr. CONNERY], namely, that a full, impartial, nonpartisan investigation into the entire field of work covered by this Commission would be in the national interest at this time. There is so much smoke that it is not surprising that many are led to believe that there must be some fire. If there is no fire, then it seems to me the best way to establish the fact is by dispelling the smoke. I hope it will be possible for an investigation to be conducted. I think it ought to cover the whole field of work, including specifically the allocation of channels; the leases and assignments made by licensees; the allotment of time; the control exercised by the Commission; the cooperation with the Federal Trade Commission; the taxes, if any, which may be fairly imposed on licensees in accordance with the testimony of the chairman of the Commission; and, in general, all matters bearing on the regulation or operation of radio subject to the jurisdiction of the Federal Communications Commission.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Gladly.

Mr. CONNERY. I have read the hearings before the Appropriations Committee in respect to which the gentleman refers. The gentleman's reference now has nothing to do with whether President Roosevelt had a certain amount of time or Governor Landon or anybody else had a certain amount of time. The gentleman agrees with me, though, there is something in the Radio Commission that ought to be looked into, does he not?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I agree. I think the whole situation should be looked into thoroughly in view of the importance of this great means of communication.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. CONNERY. I was just informed by telephone that there is at the present time a delegation of veterans from Brooklyn, N. Y., waiting in my office to see me to protest against their station, which was used to support disabled veterans, being taken away from them and given to the Brooklyn Eagle, which did not need the facilities at all.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. There have been complaints, as the gentleman knows, all along the line from many sources and from various angles. I hope the gentleman succeeds in carrying through his resolution.

The second observation which I wish to make is in respect to the Tariff Commission. A great many complaints have, of course, been made in respect to the general field of tariff regulation since the reciprocal trade agreement policy went into effect.

A great many of these complaints have come my way in connection with these hearings. I am not going to set them forth at length, but I may mention in passing a letter received from a man in New York protesting bitterly against the reduction in the tariff on hay, presumably on the findings of the Tariff Commission. The writer stated that this action in his judgment has jeopardized one of the great crops of central and western New York as well as of Michigan and Ohio. I have endeavored to ascertain from the Tariff Commission what, if any, recommendations the Commission made in this connection, but to date have received no response in the matter.

I may also mention the case of lumber interests in our Northwest, and the apparent failure to give proper consideration to the difference in transportation costs as between lumber shipped to Atlantic and Gulf ports from the Canadian Northwest and from our own Northwest. The result of the slash in the protection of lumber there, presumably on the findings of the Tariff Commission, has apparently been to set up a handicap of $1.75 on every 1,000 feet of sawed lumber for the lumber industry in our own Northwest.

I may mention also the case of potato interests, and the apparent failure to give proper consideration to the difference in transportation costs as between potatoes shipped from Canada to New York on the one hand and potatoes shipped from Maine or our own West to New York on the other hand. Many similar complaints could be cited.

There have been, of course, countless complaints in regard to importations from Japan. In the hearings you will find some discussion of the charge that importers of pottery from Japan have admitted under oath that pottery has been imported by them on a false basis. It appears that this charge is well founded; that the facts were turned over to the Treasury Department over a year ago, and that to date no effective action has been taken to meet the situation.

The committee also attempted to investigate the charge that Japanese swordfish has been landed both on the Pacific and the Atlantic coasts at transportation rates serving to reduce the protection afforded by law by 50 percent and more. The Commission is supposed to have made a special investigation of this item. Questioning at the hearings and an inquiry since that time has failed to yield satisfactory response either as to whether or not this is a fact or as to what recommendations, if any, have been made with a view to meeting the situation.

Under the reciprocal trade agreement policy, so much power has been delegated to the President that it is difficult to know just what is expected of the Tariff Commission. I confess that in spite of inquiries made at the hearings it still is not clear in my mind just what the functions of the Commission are in this connection or just how far the Commission has lived up to the functions it is expected to perform.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Gladly.

Mr. CULKIN. Has not the State Department now its own fact-finding committee on these tariffs and relative costs?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I am not sure as to that. I may say to the gentleman that the so-called Committee on Reciprocity Information is primarily responsible, as I understand it, for this new policy.

Mr. CULKIN. Is that under the Tariff Commission or the State Department?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. It was organized as an interdepartmental committee, the Tariff Commission having one out of six members composing the committee.

Mr. CULKIN. But it is a fact that the Tariff Commission has been definitely relegated to the rear by the activities of the State Department.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I may say to the gentleman that I think as a result of the hearings that were conducted it was shown that the duties and responsibilities of the Commission have been materially reduced. I think it appears, for example, that only one change has been made under the flexible provision throughout the entire year. It also appears, as I have said, that the Commission has only one vote in six on the Committee on Reciprocity Information. The representative of the Commission testified, I think, that bringing the tariff summaries up to date was the most important work carried on during the year. The Commission had some work under the N. R. A. and subsequently under the A. A. A. This work, of course, has now terminated. It appears, as I have said, that the work of the Commission has been materially reduced.

Mr. CULKIN. The Tariff Commission with its shortcomings, nevertheless, had the merit of operating in the open as distinguished from the present in camera performance of the State Department. Is not this true?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I think it is very difficult to find out just what the situation is now, and I think it would be highly instructive if we could have a further inquiry into the entire field of tariff regulation with a view of determining the basis upon which agreements have been reached in trade agreements and what steps, if any, should be taken with a view to protecting American labor, agriculture, and industry against the tremendous importations which have been coming into this country recently.

Mr. CULKIN. And if the gentlemen will pardon the interjection of this further observation, the only effective way this can be brought about is by a change of administration, the election of a Republican President and a Republican Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLARD. It would help a lot; yes.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I may say to the gentleman that this would certainly be conducive to that end. [Applause.]

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I will yield for a brief question.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. It will be brief. Is it not a fact that complaints are coming from manufacturers' associations throughout the country against the importation of Japanese products where the importation does not amount to anything on certain classes of goods? Is this correct or not?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I think the increase in importation of commodities from Japan, taken as a whole, has been tremendous. There may be instances such as the gentleman refers to; but, taken as a whole, I think the increase has been very great. Only today the junior Senator from North Carolina said, "Japan will shortly capture the Philippines, commercially."

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman have any idea of the proportionate value of the importations from Japan?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. No; I cannot give the gentleman any exact figures right now. I commend to the gentleman's attention the hearings and report of the Commission on Japanese pottery, with particular reference to subsidies said to be made available by the Japanese Government to the Japanese Pottery Manufacturers' Association.

Mr. Chairman, I have just two more observations to make and then I shall be through. The first is in regard to the civil service of the Government.

The figures show that we have today about 800,000 people on the Federal rolls, not counting legislative, judicial, or military personnel. This is an increase of 225,000 since 1933. The record also indicates that about 220,000 of these workers are totally exempt from civil-service requirements, a very high percentage of all appointments made last year being exempted. It is alleged that the spirit, if not the letter, of the civil-service law is being violated by the interpretation given the word "expert" in many instances, and, further, by an abuse of temporary appointments, these temporary appointments being made in many cases at rates of pay which are out of line as compared with the rates of pay of those on a permanent basis, and also for periods apparently in excess of those authorized by law. I have endeavored to obtain accurate information in this connection. I have not received it as yet, but I have received assurance recently from the Civil Service Commission that it will be furnished. I hope it will be available in the near future.

In a recent report, the National Civil Service Reform League states:

> That at no time since the enactment of the civil-service law has the merit system faced such a test as now. We may well ponder how much longer our Government can be administered effectively with its civil service recruited half on merit and half on patronage.

As one who believes in the merit system, as one who believes that the adoption of the Civil Service Act took us out of intolerable conditions existing before its adoption, I urge a thoroughgoing investigation of conditions prevailing in the field of civil service. Inefficiency, destruction of morale, and increase in the cost of government are inevitable if the civil service of this Government is to be undermined. The Nation is entitled to know what the real situation is.

One more word and I am through. This is in reference to a matter referred to by my colleague the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BOLTON], a matter which I stressed in my remarks on this bill a year ago.

This bill emphasizes the direct and indirect cost of certain of the new agencies. It does not begin to emphasize the cost of all of the new agencies, many of which are classified by the Bureau of the Budget as independent establishments. On the contrary, the bill emphasizes by omission the utter lack of normal control over a great many of these new agencies. Under the authority accorded me I insert at this point two tables, the first prepared by the General Accounting Office, showing 23 agencies which are not required at this time to submit to the General Accounting Office for audit; the second showing some of the agencies, at least, which have been financed out of lump-sum appropriations or other allocations or through the use of the public credit and which have never up to this time been required to justify expenditures to the appropriating committees of either Senate or House.

LIST OF ACTIVITIES WHICH DO NOT SUBMIT ACCOUNTS TO GENERAL ACCOUNTING OFFICE FOR AUDIT

Agricultural Credit Corporation (under F. C. A.).
Alien Property Custodian.
Central banks for cooperatives (F. C. A.).
Corporation of Foreign Security Holders.
Comptroller of Currency (assessments and insolvent, etc., banks).
Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.
Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation (F. C. A.).
Federal savings-and-loan associations.
Federal Reserve Board.
Gorgas Memorial Institute (field audit).
Home Owners' Loan Corporation (offers to account).
Hospitals of various services.
Inland Waterways Corporation.
Insular governments' funds in Treasury, except Virgin Islands.
Merchant Fleet Corporation (local audit).
Panama Railway Co.
Panama Steamship Co.
Perry's Victory Memorial Commission (collections).
Reconstruction Finance Corporation.
Smithsonian Institution (funds, etc.).
Tennessee Valley Associated Cooperatives, Inc.
Various special deposits.
Virgin Islands (partial).

In his Budget message the President told us that in the last few months 20 agencies not heretofore under the control of the Director of the Budget had been brought under that control. He further urged legislation with a view to bringing all agencies, including Government-owned and Government-controlled corporations, under the control of the Director of the Budget. I commend this progress. I hope the legislation recommended will be speedily enacted. I submit, however, that the recommendation does not begin to go far enough. I submit as a general rule that the disbursement of all public funds should be subject to the control not only of the Director of the Budget but also of the Comptroller General and the appropriating committees of both the Senate and House. I had not heard of the resolution which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BOLTON] states has been introduced by the junior Senator from Virginia. I do not know its exact terms. I sincerely hope, however, if I understand its purport correctly, that it will prevail and prevail promptly. It seems to me that there should be a thorough investigation at the earliest possible moment of all agencies of the Government, including corporations owned or controlled by the Government, which have not been required to justify their expenditures to Senate and House. I submit that this investigation is advisable from the point of view of coordination and elimination of duplication. I submit that it should be for the protection of any administration. I submit that it is essential in the national interest.

Mr. Chairman, I thank the members of the Committee for their attention. I am sorry to have presumed so much on their time and good nature. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT

Salaries: For personal services in the office of the President, including the Secretary to the President, and two Assistant Secretaries to the President at $9,500 each; $125,982: Provided, That employees of the executive departments and other establishments of the executive branch of the Government may be detailed from time to time to the office of the President of the United States for such temporary assistance as may be deemed necessary.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question.

I wonder if the gentleman in the hearings went into the question of how many employees of other bureaus or departments of the Government have been detailed to the Executive Office under this provision.

Mr. WOODRUM. We did not. We have never made that inquiry of the White House. It has always been the custom under all administrations to draw some personnel, especially emergency personnel, from other departments, and since I have been a member of the committee, both as a minority and majority member, that inquiry has never been made.

Mr. TABER. It has always been the practice to draw personnel from different bureaus and departments of the Government?

Mr. WOODRUM. That is my understanding.

The pro-forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Traveling expenses: For traveling and official entertainment expenses of the President of the United States, to be expended in his discretion and accounted for on his certificate solely, $25,000.

Total, Executive Office proper, $294,032.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee: Page 3, line 5, after the figures "$294,032", insert "Provided, That the President shall not appoint anyone related to him by blood or marriage within the third degree to perform the duties provided for in this said appropriation."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is legislation on an appropriation bill and, I think, is an insinuation against the Chief Executive of the United States as well.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. I hope my colleague will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. WOODRUM. I will not withdraw the point of order, and I insist upon it, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. I just want to make an explanation.

Mr. WOODRUM. No. I do not think there ought to be any debate on it, and I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The point of order is well taken, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I should like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled and has sustained the point of order.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. You do not permit me to make myself understood.

Mr. WOODRUM. I will permit the gentleman to withdraw his amendment, if he would like to do that.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. I will not insist on the amendment.

Mr. WOODRUM. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

For all printing and binding for the Civil Service Commission, including all of its bureaus, offices, institutions, and services located in Washington and elsewhere, $85,900.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I got a letter this morning from an old farmer out in my district in Colorado that had something in it which I think is too good to be buried in the files of a Congressman's office. His orthography was not Websterian, but he said the best thing I have heard thus far on the Supreme Court decision on the Triple A, or that I expect to hear, and it was this. He said, "They amended the Constitution to give us something to drink; now, why can't they amend it to give us something to eat?" [Laughter and applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

CANAL ZONE RETIREMENT AND DISABILITY

For financing of the liability of the United States, created by the act entitled "An act for the retirement of employees of the Panama Canal and the Panama Railroad Co., on the Isthmus of Panama, who are citizens of the United States", approved March 2, 1931, and acts amendatory thereof (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 48, sec. 1371n), $500,000, which amount shall be placed to the credit of the "Canal Zone retirement and disability fund."

Total, Civil Service Commission, $48,879,000.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I regret that my distinguished colleague from Virginia saw fit to make any reference to a proposed amendment that would indicate for one moment that what the author of the amendment had in mind could, by any means, be construed as a reflection upon the great President of the United States. Certainly nothing could be more foreign to my intention or motive. Some precedent exists for my amendment. Without any effort whatever to reflect upon the Chair, heretofore a similar amendment, at the first session of the Congress, to the Guffey coal bill was permitted by a distinguished Presiding Officer, and the amendment offered by me was made a part of the bill. This amendment was similar to the one I am here and now proposing. What was in mind then and what is in my mind now with reference to this proposed amendment is that it is the beginning of legislation that I think is wholesome and would be helpful; and I am quite sure that my distinguished colleague from Virginia must be in accord with the purpose. I am proposing a similar amendment to every section of this bill, if the Chair will permit and holds it in order.

I simply wish to say to the House that at the first session I proposed a bill, H. R. 8617, which I am assured will be given consideration by the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, and in this bill it is provided that no Federal officer, including the President, the Vice President, the members of the Cabinet, the members of the Supreme Court, all district courts, and all Federal officials, shall be permitted to appoint his next of kin to any position or office under him as such appointing power.

Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to undertake to impugn the motives of anyone who has a different conviction on this bill from what I hold, but I make the observation that nothing could be more wholesome or helpful than to clarify criticism that comes to Members of the House and comes to all the appointing powers when they continue, as is frequently done, especially in the different bureaus that are set up here from time to time, to pad the pay roll and put on their next of kin and have the taxpayers settle the bill. We are entitled to clean government. I do not mean to say that everyone on the pay roll may not be earning his compensation, but it leads to flagrant abuses in the public service.

What I have in mind is the principle. We as the lawmaking power owe it to ourselves to live above suspicion, beyond any criticism that may arise because of appointing our next of kin. Surely, it was not in my mind or thought to criticize the President of the United States or the Vice President or anyone else.

I am talking about the principle. We as the legislative branch of the Government are expected to enact such bills and measures as will help to make living conditions better in America.

I know, and you know as Members of this House, that many are placed on the pay roll by some relative who is temporarily at the head of a bureau or agency of the department without regard to merit.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, whatever merit the amendment had as a fundamental proposition, the gentleman's remarks have nothing to do with the point of order I made against it.

No one approves of people being put on the pay roll with a salary that they do not earn. I can recall two distinct former Speakers of this House whose wives were their secretaries. The country was better off because these distinguished women helped perform the service.

There may be Members of Congress who may have their relatives on the pay roll. I do not have. They earn their money. I do not wish to discuss the merits, but, it seems to me, passing strange that the gentleman, without any contact with the committee on my side of the House, should endeavor to put restrictions on the President of the United States, which I still say is a reflection on his high office.

Since I have been a Member of this House there has never been any question as to the expenses of the Executive branch of the Government. No President, as far as I know, has ever abused the privilege. I cannot conceive of any man who could arrive at the high office of President abusing the privileges of that high office. That, I say, is an insinuation against the office of the President of the United States, I do not care by whom it is made or against which President it is made.

Now, my friend from New York a moment ago asked whether employees of other departments were detailed to the Executive Office.

The organic law provides that—

Employees of the executive departments and other establishments of the executive branch of the Government may be detailed from time to time to the office of the President of the United States for such temporary assistance as may be deemed necessary.

The Clerk read as follows:

FOREIGN SERVICE PAY ADJUSTMENT

Foreign service pay adjustment of officers and employees of the United States in foreign countries due to appreciation of foreign currencies: For the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of the act entitled "An act to authorize annual appropriations to meet losses sustained by officers and employees of the United States in foreign countries due to appreciation of foreign currencies in their relation to the American dollar, and for other purposes", approved March 26, 1934, and for each and every object and purpose specified therein, $1,800,000, together with $2,048,611 of the unexpended balances of the appropriations for this purpose for the fiscal years 1934, 1935, and 1936.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Would the gentleman tell us how much it is expected will be spent in this fiscal year for that particular purpose?

Mr. WOODRUM. The estimate as I recall it is a million dollars which they expect to be necessary to use this year.

Mr. TABER. Why should we need $3,800,000 for 1937 if we only need a million dollars this year? It strikes me that this is a good case where we might be able to save a little money.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman will find that on pages 388 and 389 of the hearings. They estimated for 1937 that it would require $3,848,000.

Mr. TABER. I know, but they expect to spend a million dollars in the year 1936.

Mr. WOODRUM. No; I am mistaken. The amount was $5,383,476.

Mr. TABER. That was the appropriation. There was a total of $3,848,000, and I understood the gentleman to say the expenditures this year would be only a million dollars.

Mr. WOODRUM. I was in error on that. The table the gentleman will find on page 389 of the hearings.

The Clerk read as follows:

Motor-transport regulation: For all authorized expenditures necessary to enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to carry out the provisions of the Motor Carrier Act, approved August 9, 1935 (49 Stat., pp. 543–567), including one director at $10,000 per annum and other personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; traveling expenses; supplies; services and equipment; not to exceed $1,000 for purchase and exchange of books, reports, and periodicals; contract stenographic reporting services; purchase (not to exceed $3,250), exchange, maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles when necessary for official use in field work, $1,700,000, of which amount not exceeding $75,000 may be expended for rent in the District of Columbia provided Government-owned facilities are not available.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This motorbus law that was passed last year is, like all transportation laws, a somewhat complicated matter; and the original set-up, of course, is pretty hard to arrive at. The first thing the Commission has to do, I am informed, is to register all of these thousands of busses and trucks that operate in interstate commerce, something like 200,000, I am informed. It is my understanding that those in responsible positions believe the sum of $1,700,000 is wholly insufficient with which to set up the machinery and bring about all the rules and regulations that will not only do justice to the public but also to the men who operate these motor vehicles, busses, and trucks in interstate commerce. It appears to me and to those who have been dealing with this whole thing, trying to get it going, that the first year in the administration of the act will be the most expensive, for the reason that all of these matters are to be set up. I understand that the committee has followed the lead of the Budget. It is also my understanding that the Interstate Commerce Commission thinks it will need $3,000,000 for the first year for the administration of the act. Could the gentleman from Virginia give us any information in that respect?

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] has stated the situation. We are giving the Interstate Commerce Commission something like $1,000,000 in the deficiency appropriation bill which will be here in a few days to carry them through the rest of this present fiscal year. The Interstate Commerce Commission, as the gentleman from Texas says, feel they ought to have $3,000,000 for the fiscal year 1937, and the Budget recommended $1,700,000. Our committee appreciates the large task ahead of the Interstate Commerce Commission in setting up this new agency, but we feel that if they can intelligently and efficiently use $1,700,000 during 1937 they will be doing a good job. An organization of that kind cannot be set up overnight. They will have to have civil-service examinations to get a highly specialized group of people to look after the law. It is a big job. There is no disposition on the part of the Committee on Appropriations to unduly hamper the Interstate Commerce Commission in its administration, but we feel that $1,700,000 will start them off. If it can be shown to our committee, and to the Congress later, that the law is being poorly administered or that they are not having enough funds to get along, we will lend an attentive ear.

Mr. RAYBURN. Does the gentleman mean next winter?

Mr. WOODRUM. Oh, we will be here. It is my experience that you cannot cut these amounts down. You can build them up, but you cannot build them down. The Budget and our committee desire to compel all of these agencies to go slowly and build efficiently. They must show absolute need for more appropriations before we give them, and we feel we have given the Interstate Commerce Commission a fund that will enable it to start off in an adequate manner, and if they need more money, we will be here.

The Clerk read as follows:

NATIONAL CAPITAL PARK AND PLANNING COMMISSION

For each and every purpose requisite for and incident to the work of the National Capital Park and Planning Commission necessary toward carrying into effect the provisions of the act entitled "An act for the acquisition, establishment, and development of the George Washington Memorial Parkway along the Potomac from Mount Vernon and Fort Washington to the Great Falls, and to provide for the acquisition of lands in the District of Columbia and the States of Maryland and Virginia requisite to the comprehensive park, parkway, and playground system of the National Capital", approved May 29, 1930; personal services, including real-estate and other technical services, at rates of pay to be fixed by the Commission and not exceeding those usual for similar services and without reference to civil-service rules and the Classification Act of 1923, as amended; travel expenses; expenses of surveys and searching of titles, purchase of options, and all other costs incident to the acquisition of land, $400,000, to remain available until expended, including $200,000 for the acquisition of lands as authorized in section 1 (a) "For the George Washington Memorial Parkway" and $200,000 for advances and contributions to the Maryland-National Capital Park and Planning Commission as provided for in section 1 (b) of the act.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word to ask the chairman of the committee a question with reference to the situation that exists at the present time in connection with the Washington Memorial Parkway. How much money have we spent there, and can the gentleman from Virginia tell us what we are obligated to spend in the future?

Mr. WOODRUM. The appropriation this year is to buy a little strip of land up near the Key Bridge. It is a continuation of the parkway project. The authorization calls for the purchase of land on both sides of the Potomac all the way up to Great Falls, as the gentleman remembers.

Mr. SNELL. I recall that; but I was wondering how far we had gone and what proportion we had expended, and so forth. This must be a fairly good-sized parcel of land if it is going to cost $200,000.

Mr. WOODRUM. This is to purchase some strips of land in the neighborhood of the Francis Scott Key Bridge on the Virginia side. The State of Virginia must match dollar for dollar with the Federal Government before this can be expended.

Mr. SNELL. I see a provision here for $200,000 to purchase land for the Maryland National Capital Park.

Mr. WOODRUM. That is a continuation of the extension of Rock Creek Park under a different authorization. It is under a different act. The State of Maryland also has to match those funds and has been matching them by the issuance of bonds.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman have at hand how much additional we are obligated to spend on this parkway?

Mr. WOODRUM. They have never estimated how much it is going to cost. The gentleman will recall that the original authorization for the purchase of this land was on both sides of the Potomac as far as Great Falls.

Mr. SNELL. I remember it; and I opposed it.

Mr. WOODRUM. Now they have come in from time to time with requests for appropriations, just as they have here. Of course, it will depend on the price they are able to get the land for at that particular time.

Mr. SNELL. It will go on indefinitely in an indefinite amount?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes; so long as this Congress is in a mood to appropriate for it until it is completed. They asked the Bureau of the Budget for a very much larger sum. They wanted to get a great deal more land.

Mr. SNELL. Is there any limit to the amount of land they can buy? How far back can they go?

Mr. WOODRUM. The limit is a territorial limit and not a limit of funds. It authorizes the purchase of land for the creation of this park going up the Potomac on both sides to Great Falls.

Mr. SNELL. For instance, out in Maryland, how far does that go?

Mr. WOODRUM. We are just providing $200,000 for a certain area. If there is more area to be gotten in, they will come back for further appropriations.

Mr. SNELL. Do the hearings show what they are paying per acre for that land?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes. We have that information. It is around $600 an acre.

The pro-forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I have sent to the desk.

Amendment offered by Mr. TABER: On page 25, line 22, strike out all down to and including line 22, on page 26.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this motion to strike out the whole of this paragraph, because it seems to me it is about time that we stopped making large expenditures for this purpose. We must come to a head sometime and come to the point where we will stop spending the people's money. I know of no better way to begin than to begin. For a long time we have been going on, and as near as I can figure, upon this entire project we have probably spent fifty or seventy-five million dollars. I do not think that within the District of Columbia we are subject to so much criticism, but when we go outside of the District with our parkway system at national expense, it seems to me we are going further than the Congress of the United States ought to go. Having that in mind and having in mind that we have an authorization for the purchase of 600,000 acres of land outside of the District, over which this Congress, as such, would have no more than joint control, and having in mind that it is an unlimited authority for expenditures that can run into millions and millions of dollars, I believe this would be a good point to begin to retrench. For that reason I have offered this amendment to strike out the appropriation for this particular purpose. Sometime we are going to come to the point where the people of the United States will wake up and will realize that we cannot stop a mounting debt and a mounting deficit unless we stop appropriating money. The way to start is to throw out those appropriations that we can possibly throw out as we go along. I hope this amendment will prevail.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, the appropriation, of course, is a very small amount, $400,000. The National Park and Planning Commission, carrying out the mandate of Congress, has proceeded with a plan to build this parkway, which, as the gentleman will remember, was authorized in the Cramton bill. The gentleman from Michigan, Mr. Cramton, devoted a great deal of time and a great deal of study to the development of this parkway, and in my judgment it is a wonderful contribution, not only to the District of Columbia, but to the Nation as well.

Now, very little has been done in the past few years in the development of that parkway plan. The National Park and Planning Commission wanted to go forward this year with it, but, with the exception of this small amount of $400,000, the Bureau of the Budget refused to permit them to do it; but it did seem the part of wisdom and the part of ultimate economy to get control of this little parcel of land at the end of the Francis Scott Key Bridge, which will be so necessary for the continuation of that parkway. There are only $200,000 involved and a like amount is to be matched by the State of Virginia. That will connect up these links in Rock Creek Park while the land can be secured. It is a very small matter, and the Budget committee and all of us have gone into it, and we share the opinion of the gentleman that it is not any time to launch into big expenditures, but it is a small matter and a necessary link in this ultimate plan, and we feel that it will be ultimately economical for the Government to do it now.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. TABER. I should like, if I might, in the gentleman's time, to call his attention to page 567 of the hearings and to the fact that there is an authorization of $4,500,000 for the Cabin John and Rock Creek development, $7,500,000 for the George Washington Parkway, and $16,000,000 for the District, a total of $28,000,000 that is ahead of us. Now, it would seem to me that the Congress ought to be rather careful about embarking on these large expenditures, and this is a start toward it.

Mr. WOODRUM. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. I think he bears out what I said—that we are not embarking on it; we are practically standing still; but we are now confronted with the necessity of acquiring two little connecting links in this program. If Congress wants to go further with this development, it will need this land, and we are merely getting these two small parcels that will permit us ultimately to go forward and not tie our hands.

I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. GRAY of Pennnsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want anyone to feel that in what I am about to call to the attention of the committee I am criticizing the Appropriations Committee. I heard the gentleman from Virginia a moment ago refer to $400,000 as being a very small item. In the sense the gentleman means it and in the connection it bears to this bill I realize that it is a small item, but I want to bring to the attention of this committee the fact that during the last session of Congress I introduced House Joint Resolution 353 to rehabilitate several mine rescue cars. This bill would have called for the expenditure of some $27,000 by the Bureau of Mines to rehabilitate several mine rescue cars for use in the bituminous and anthracite coal fields of this Nation. The bill did not get through the Appropriations Committee because of the principles of economy that seemed to govern at least some of the members of that committee.

Mine rescue work is important. It is more important than building highways, because it has to do with the saving of human life. These mine rescue cars were to be made available for location at various parts of the mining districts of the country, from time to time, to train not only operators but the miners, who bring the coal from the earth for the use of the people, in the prevention of accidents and of mine disasters and the best methods of rescue and salvage when such things occur. I think the Appropriations Committee could well look into the real necessity for rehabilitating some of the cars that have been put out of use. Recently there were only two of these mine rescue cars in operation under the Bureau of Mines. The results accomplished by these cars while they were in operation certainly justifies the rehabilitation of several more. I have had numerous requests from safety associations and those engaged in mine rescue work in the coal regions to present this matter to the Congress in the hope that some provision can be made by which they may once again have the facilities of a sufficient and adequate number of such cars.

Let me briefly present some facts for your consideration. Because of the very bad safety record of the mines in the United States, and because of the occurrence of mine explosions prior to 1910, the Bureau of Mines was organized that year. For the 5-year period ending in 1910 there were 84 major coal-mine disasters, with total fatalities from explosion from gas or dust of 2,388, an average of about 478 per year. The total fatalities from all causes in the mines of the country in that period were 13,288, or an average of 2,658 per year.

In the year 1922 there was an explosion in one of the coal mines at Spangler, Pa., almost at my doorstep, resulting in the death of 77 coal miners, nearly all of whom were personal acquaintances and friends of mine. This terrible tragedy causes one to realize most acutely the tremendous importance of safety work. A number of other somewhat similar disasters have occurred in that territory.

Coal mining is a most hazardous occupation. Not a day goes by in the coal fields but we can expect to hear of some fatality. Unquestionably there has been a reduction in the number of deaths and disabilities since the operation of mine rescue cars. It is probably true that coal mining can be made comparatively safe if sufficient effort is put forth, but this cannot be done by stingy restricting of funds that should be made available for first aid and mine rescue-training work.

Whether it is railroad cars that are to be used for the purpose or whether it is automobile trucks is only a matter of policy which the Bureau of Mines could decide as the most workable instruments for the purpose. Previously 10 all-steel railroad mine rescue cars were provided for. Lately but two have been in operation. The result has been that the work of education and training, not only of those directly concerned in the production of coal but also of the general public, has been seriously neglected. The Bureau of Mines is of the opinion that, if given adequate support in its safety efforts, accident occurrence in our coal mines can be reduced 75 percent.

Mr. Chairman, I appeal to this Congress to have thought of the lives, of the limbs, and of the families of the men who tunnel through dark passages in the interior of the earth and bring forth that basic commodity—coal. Every dollar wisely expended in safety work will return tenfold into the Treasury of the United States. It would be a blot on the strenuous efforts of the Roosevelt administration and of this Congress, who have extended themselves in a great humanitarian endeavor to save our people and rebuild the economic and social structure of our Nation, if a few paltry thousand dollars were refused for the work about which I have spoken.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

Total, Railroad Retirement Board, $47,645,000.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the subcommittee a question.

I wonder if the chairman of the subcommittee could tell us how much revenue the Government expects to derive from the tax which has been placed upon the railroads and their employees in this connection during the fiscal year 1937?

Mr. WOODRUM. The estimate—and it was just a sheer estimate, I may say to the gentleman—was about $150,000,000.

Mr. TABER. Is $47,000,000 a fair estimate of what it is expected this Board will require for its operation?

Mr. WOODRUM. That is what we understood it to be; yes.

Mr. TABER. And the revenue is expected to be $150,000,000?

Mr. WOODRUM. Over a period of years they figure the best they can actuarily, and there is very little of an actuarial basis they can go on, that after 15 years it will be self-containing from the tax.

The Clerk read down to and including line 16, page 31.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOLAND, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 9863, the independent offices appropriation bill, 1937, had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—REPORT OF THE DIRECTOR OF EMERGENCY CONSERVATION WORK

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Labor:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress, the report of the Director of Emergency Conservation Work, embracing the activities of that organization, which includes the group popularly known as the Civilian Conservation Corps, for the period April 5, 1933, through June 30, 1935. Text and tables are included, showing in considerable detail the extensive activities of this organization in relieving unemployment, providing for the restoration of the country's natural resources, and assisting in the program of national recovery.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 16, 1936.

THE CONTRIBUTION OF THE RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION TO THE RECOVERY PROGRAM OF PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT

Mr. KENNEDY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address made by the Honorable Jesse Jones in Baltimore on January 11.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. KENNEDY of New York. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Jesse H. Jones, Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, at the Concord Club Jackson Day dinner, Lord Baltimore Hotel, Baltimore, Md., January 11, 1936:

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I appreciate the honor of dining with and addressing so important a body of men and women. I have been your neighbor now for 4 years and have come to know a good many of you, both personally and in a business way. I see a number of friends of much longer standing.

It has been a privilege to be of some assistance to Baltimore and Maryland during the trying period from which we are just emerging. I am also glad to say that every investment and every loan that we have made here has proven to be thoroughly sound, notwithstanding that Baltimore was hard hit, as was the entire United States.

We at the R. F. C. have seen and had dealings with people from all sections of the country. Most of them were in distress—many confronted by failure; some of them worse—besides seeing the savings and accumulations of a lifetime slipping away under the grinding juggernaut of depression and fear.

It was as impossible to protect one's self against the depression as against the infuriated elements. Baltimore was no exception, and you have cause to feel a just pride in the recovery thus far attained.

Reasonably good conditions prevail throughout the country, and we are now in such a comfortable state that we forget how distressed and how really miserable we were in the spring of 1933.

This I understand to be your annual dinner given in honor of that great statesman and patriot, Andrew Jackson. There has been so much said about him in the past few days that there is little I can add.

I have pride aplenty in his memory, because I, too, hail from Tennessee—the grand old Volunteer State. He was a great character, Andrew Jackson—with great courage, great understanding, and great determination. He was of and for the average man, and, with all his virtues, had many human weaknesses.

I love and admire him for those weaknesses as much as for his great strength. They enabled him to better understand human nature and to fight for the rights and liberties of men.

He was known to swear at times, and even to take a drink. He owned race horses and fought game chickens. He even fought a duel and killed his antagonist. He seized Florida from Spain before the National Government had authorized such action, and our diplomats had quite a job backing him up. So you see he was quite a man, and sometimes even obstreperous.

I have often wondered what Jackson would have done in this particular period, as I have also wondered what Jefferson would have done.

We Democrats—and I believe all true Americans—hold these two great characters very high, and the further time takes us from them the greater are their statures. They stand out as guides and signposts to the course the American people, as a people and as a Government, should follow.

While wondering what either of these might have done during the several crises we have had during the past 50 years, I feel assured that either would in the main have followed the course Cleveland followed, and Wilson and Franklin Roosevelt. That is, they would have met the problems that confronted these three Democratic Presidents in much the same spirit and with the same determination insofar as the preservation of human liberties is concerned.

Those of us who lived during Cleveland's administration would not have done everything just as he did it, and that applies with equal force to Woodrow Wilson and Franklin Roosevelt. The same would have been true of Thomas Jefferson and of Andrew Jackson. But I believe we would have tackled their problems, had it been our responsibility, with as great determination. Few of us do anything exactly alike, or take the same route for a given destination. The object is to get there, or to accomplish the purpose.

The responsibility for the welfare of a great nation is one thing—especially when millions are out of employment, with no way of making a living or taking care of their families. Criticizing the course taken by the leaders who have that responsibility is quite another.

Because of the unusual unemployment situation and the utter despair in which President Roosevelt found the country at his inauguration, there have been more opportunities for error in efforts to extricate the country from that despair than was perhaps true ever before.

Looking back 3 years is much like looking down into a deep valley resembling oblivion, from which we have climbed by extreme effort and under a leadership that has had but one purpose in mind. If at times we have felt that leadership was veering too far to one side or the other, we should not falter or turn back, any more than the army should fail to follow the general or the field marshal.

While out of danger, we are not entirely up the hill and will not be until there is work for all who want work. We can get along—and very well—with a goodly number out of employment, but business and industry—and those with jobs—will have to support the unemployed. None can escape this responsibility and none should want to. Certainly no one must suffer for life's necessities.

I have no desire to make a political speech, even at a Jackson Day dinner, but am glad to talk with you men and women about the serious side of our daily lives—about business.

I speak as a businessman, as much interested in the welfare of business as any of you, or as in any business.

The word "business" encompasses almost every phase of human activities. We are a country of business. We are a country of free people who want the privilege of engaging in business, large and small, for a livelihood and for a profit, whether that business be agriculture, industry, merchandising, banking, or what not.

And upon the whole, business is now very good. Certainly it is greatly improved over the past few years. Most people made some money in 1935. From the viewpoint of business, much ground has been regained, and we should feel good about it and very hopeful.

I am aware that there is fear about what is ahead of us, but do not believe the fear justified. I have confidence in the wisdom of the American people to preserve our freedom and our liberties.

Certainly we do not want to go back, even to the days of 1929, because we would be sure to fall again. And it goes without saying we do not want to go back to 1930 and 1931 and 1932 and 1933.

I am not one of those to fix the responsibility for our depression troubles entirely upon a political party. I have felt, however, that we would not have gotten so far out of line if the three preceding administrations had taken a different course.

But none of us calls the doctor until he is sick.

There is much talk to the effect that business, industry, and banking are against the present administration. I do not believe in the final analysis this will prove to be true. Why should it? We are doing very well in business, and much lost ground has been regained.

It is doubtful if we could have gotten a start back without the bank holiday and without the assistance given to banking, business, and industry through the R. F. C.

Home-loan activities and farm credits were very helpful, but it was absolutely necessary to repair the banks and to get a sound banking system before a start or any progress could be made.

Probably the billion dollars capital stock invested by the R. F. C. in 6,000 banks did more good than any Government activity. It gave us a strong banking system. Our banks are now stronger in deposits, excess reserves, and in capital than they have ever been.

Rebuilding the banks was like putting a new foundation under the house. It was absolutely necessary to prevent the house falling down.

Another billion loaned for distribution to depositors in closed banks also helped greatly and reached perhaps 20,000,000 depositors. The additional $1,200,000,000 loaned to going banks, over 85 percent of which has been repaid, was a very great benefit.

Over 70 percent of our loans to closed banks have been repaid. One hundred and forty million dollars of our bank capital investment has been retired, although maturing over a period of 20 years and payable only from a part of earnings.

We have authorized loans of all character, including investments in banks and insurance companies, in the aggregate amount of $7,923,000,000; $1,007,000,000 of these authorizations were canceled, the borrowers finding that they did not need the money. But the fact that it was available to them, and that the loans and the security had been approved, made it possible for these borrowers to go about their affairs with confidence.

Approximatey $1,072,000,0000 of these authorizations are yet undisbursed, but still available to the borrowers. Much of this will not be taken, as recovery continues and private credit becomes operative.

We have actually disbursed on these loans authorizations, including investments in banks and insurance-company stocks, slightly less than $6,000,000,000, $5,873,000,000 to be exact, and our repayments have been $3,258,000,000.

We have bought $296,452,321.92 par value of securities from P. W. A. and have sold $147,205,200 of these at a premium of $4,870,000 above cost. We are authorized by Congress to buy P. W. A. securities and to have invested in them as much as $250,000,000 at any one time. By buying and selling these securities, we create a revolving fund for relending by P. W. A. for self-liquidating projects, greatly aiding employment and at no cost to the Government.

Our interest rates are approximately 1 percent more than we pay the Treasury for the money we borrow to lend, and our operating expenses approximately one-half of 1 percent.

This affords an operating reserve of approximately one-half of 1 percent to cover losses. This reserve, to date, is over $116,000,000, which, in the opinion of our directors, will cover all our losses, from the creation of the Corporation, so that the operations of the R. F. C., extensive as they are, will not result in any loss whatever to the taxpayer.

We have tried to be prudent as well as helpful, realizing it is the taxpayers' money we are trustees for.

The R. F. C. is the original alphabetical agency and, as you know, was started under the former administration. It has been expanded many times under the Roosevelt administration, and we have endeavored to be of assistance to the President in his efforts for recovery. Without a doubt R. F. C. activities have been helpful to every person in the United States.

I have said on many occasions, and here repeat, that I should like to see the Government out of the lending business, but not until credit is available from private sources at interest rates and upon terms that can be met without placing too great a burden upon borrowers.

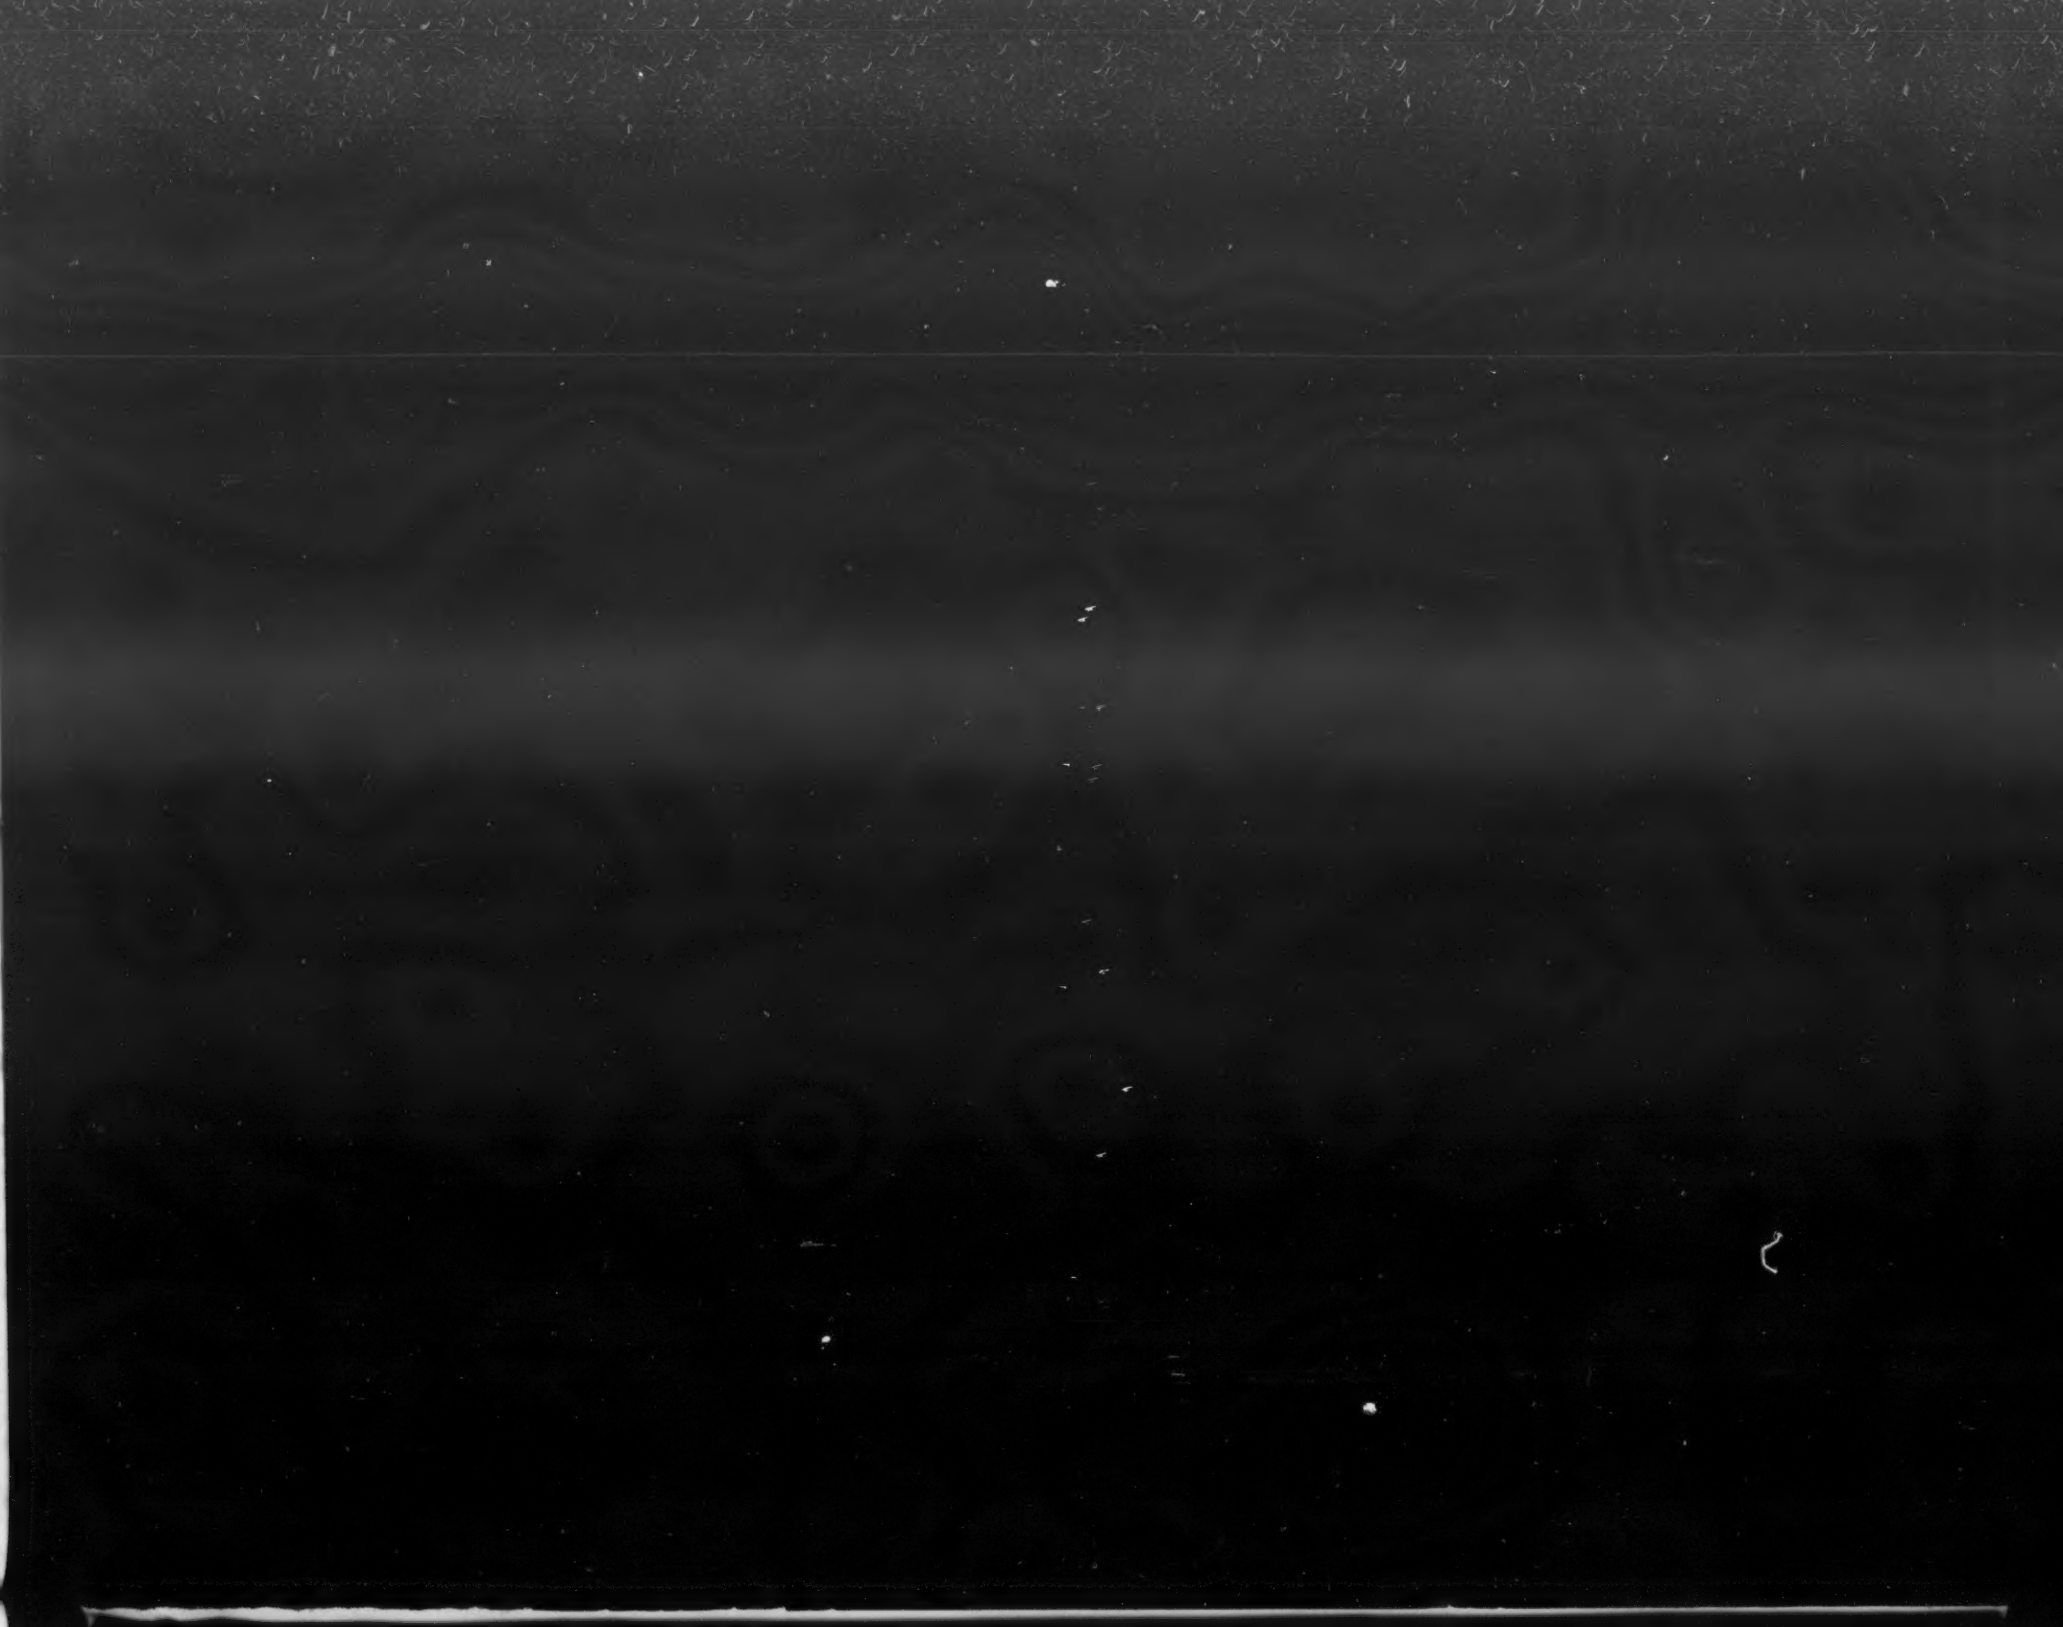
It is the money borrower that feeds most of us.

Interest rates have been too high and terms too exacting. I am convinced that potential borrowers will need to be encouraged to borrow. While depositors in closed banks have suffered, borrowers as a rule have had a tougher time.

We will not get back to normal conditions until the average citizen—the little fellow—can borrow within reason, at fair rates, and on more liberal terms of repayment.

The big fellow with unquestioned credit borrows on his own terms and at very low rates. But credit for the average man, the average business, is too sparingly given, and at much higher interest rates.

And remember that there are millions in this class, and that they constitute the great majority. They must be built up. They must be encouraged. They must be welcome in the big banks and in the little ones. In the language of Amos 'n Andy, they must be members of the lodge.



I believe Jackson would subscribe to these principles.

Some of my banker friends and others in that environment, including some of our financial writers, are all hot and bothered about our efforts to reduce interest rates.

We are not only trying to help the average man—the small borrower—but we should like to help the railroads in getting lower interest rates. This is one way the Government can help the railroads, without loss to the Government.

I should like to repeat here, with emphasis, statements I have heretofore made, to the effect that too many of our railroads are dominated by bankers whose principal interest in them is to make money out of their financing.

This is within the law, but should not be.

The Great Northern—one of the best systems in the country, never having defaulted in its 57 years of existence—has been paying 7 percent on a $115,000,000 issue of bonds imposed by its bankers 15 years ago. And what is more, the bankers only paid the road 91½ for these 7-percent bonds—a discount of nearly $10,000,000.

These bonds mature next July, and it is our purpose to help them renew them at 4 percent, a saving to the road of more than $3,000,000 a year. This will pay the cost to that road of the social-security tax and leave a handsome balance.

The bankers agreed to a 5-percent rate plus an underwriting charge of a million dollars and an additional 1 percent on such bonds as they might buy. Except for the R. F. C., this, or even a greater rate, would have been imposed upon the road. Incidentally, the bankers thought the deal was buttoned up, and the proposed 5-percent bonds were quoted on the New York market at a premium of 9 percent, or $10,000,000 more than the road was to get for them.

We tried to prevail upon the bankers to underwrite these bonds at 4½ percent, with a half-million-dollar underwriting charge instead of a million dollars, R. F. C. agreeing to buy up to one-half of the issue if not taken by the road's stockholders and by private investors.

If a bond is good enough for a banking house to recommend to its investors at 5 percent, I fail to understand why it is not a better investment at 4 percent. Certainly the borrower has a better chance of meeting his payments at the lower rate than the high.

This applies with equal force to the small-business man—the man who does not enjoy Triple A credit and cannot dictate terms to his bank.

We will save the Great Northern more than $11,000,000 on this one issue under the best terms the bankers offered, and that $11,000,000 will give many a man a job and, incidentally, improve the railroad.

Getting back to bank credits:

The Bank Act of 1935 allows national banks to lend on improved real estate for as long as 10 years, and on unimproved real estate for 5 years. It allows loans to industry by national banks up to 10 years.

Such loans are available for borrowing or rediscount by the banks at the Federal Reserve, and there is no reason why commercial banks should not meet the legitimate requirements of real estate, business, and industry in proper proportions to their lending funds, as provided in the 1935 Bank Act.

And there is no longer any valid argument for extreme liquidity, especially since approximately 98 percent of all depositors are insured by Federal deposit insurance, which makes bank runs extremely unlikely.

There should be a change in the lending policies of many banks so that all deserving borrowers may be accommodated.

I say this with due appreciation of the responsibility which bankers feel for the funds of their depositors and their stockholders and notwithstanding that many banks got in trouble by lending on security that was not readily convertible into cash.

That experience was not a fair test, because of the unprecedented economic avalanche.

Business cannot be carried on without a free flow of credit, based upon a going country, and bankers must adopt that policy if the Government is to quit lending, for as long as banks confine their lending to the Government the Government will be forced to provide private credit.

I do not favor unsound banking in any sense, but most of our bankers have reached a stage where the only loan they are willing to make is one that can be collected practically on demand, or so secured that the collateral can be sold upon short notice. The borrower is given little freedom and little confidence.

Character and confidence are at a low ebb as a basis of credit, and in my opinion, with few exceptions, every man and every woman should have some credit—maybe $50, maybe much more—but character, confidence in our country and in each other are our greatest assets.

That is why we are talking about Jackson at this time—his character, his principles, and his faith in the country and in the people.

Those that believe with Jefferson, Jackson, Cleveland, Wilson, and Roosevelt, in my opinion, interpret the spirit of America.

The responsibility of government is with the President and the Congress, all duly elected by the people. It is for you and me to support them while in office and to register our approval or disapproval at the polls.

CONGRESSIONAL SUBSERVIENCY

Mr. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radio address which I delivered over the Columbia Broadcasting System on October 2 last.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the permission given me, I wish to insert in the RECORD a radio address delivered by me from station WJSV, Washington, D. C., over the Columbia Broadcasting System, Wednesday, October 2, 1935, on the subject of Congressional Subserviency.

President Roosevelt once more is making promises to the American people in the hope of reviving a lost confidence in the New Deal. The President does this in the face of a past record of shattered pledges that makes his new assurances unconvincing. Again it is obvious that he takes for granted that a subservient Congress will do his bidding. But the fact is that proper legislative functioning, impossible under the present New Deal majority in Congress, is one of the great needs confronting the country.

Three sessions of Congress have been held under the New Deal. They had certain characteristics in common. All three were distinguished by the headlong speed and abandon with which questionable and controversial legislation was enacted, by the absence of debate worthy of the name, and by the absolute dominance of the executive branch of the Government. The session which closed late in August was, with the least justification, the most abject and servile of all.

The conduct of the New Deal Congress in this last session, the record of which is fresh in our memories, has caused more apprehension than anything that has gone before in all our long legislative history.

It will be borne in mind that in the earlier stages of the New Deal the gravity of the emergency was such that President Roosevelt was given almost unanimous support of press and public in his demand for action. He had stated with seeming frankness that the measures he proposed were largely emergency measures, and for the period of the emergency only. He had stated further that if these experimental measures failed in their purpose he would be the first to acknowledge it. He had just been elected by an overwhelming majority and the disposition of the country was to trust to his judgment in unprecedented degree.

The country and the Congress did not then appreciate the far-reaching and disastrous effects of the measures he proposed—the radical changes they were to bring about in our national life. The country then had confidence that the President would not go too far with his experiments and innovations. It relied on him to have that appreciation of the consequences of his own acts that is an essential attribute of statesmanship.

To a large extent, therefore, the support given in Congress to the earlier New Deal measures demanded by the President was spontaneous. It may be argued in the light of subsequent events that the people had a right to look to their chosen Representatives to exercise seasoned judgment in meeting the demands of the Executive. But the point is, that the sinister and unsavory aspects of the situation which obtained in the last session of Congress were not then in evidence. A gigantic political machine, which has been turned over to the spoilsmen, had not then been set up to enforce administration demands. Unlimited public funds had not been provided to fill to overflowing what has become, in effect, the most gigantic political pork barrel of all time, operating and influencing public opinion and public men after the insidious manner of all other pork barrels, and with the same ultimate disastrous effect on the taxpayer.

In those early days of the New Deal many still nursed the hope that the cost of government was to be reduced and the Budget was to be balanced. Mr. Roosevelt pledged that as a candidate. He agreed to carry out 100 percent the promises in the Democratic platform on these points. It was not then foreseen that, as President, Mr. Roosevelt would repudiate these pledges in the Democratic platform 100 percent.

But all of this was forcefully brought to the attention of Congress in the last session. It was clearly understood by those who wanted to understand. The situation was changed to a marked degree, if not almost entirely reversed. An aroused press and public, including leading Americans of both parties, were demanding that Congress resume its deliberative functions in lawmaking and its rightful place in the control of the finances of the Government to the end that further fruitless experimentation be ended and the orgy of spending and waste be checked. Yet in the face of this Nation-wide demand, and in the light of the alarming situation which had caused it to arise, a pliant and servile New Deal majority, who had power to punish and favors to bestow, put through in its practical entirety, largely under gag rule, an administrative program but little understood, and in the opinion of a great body of the American people, more destructive in its potentialities than anything that had gone before.

This shows the inevitable goal to which such a flagrant disregard of the plain intent of the Constitution leads.

Thoughtful Americans agree with the sentiment recently expressed as that of the President by a New Deal spokesman in a magazine article, purporting to interpret the Presidential mind, that the Constitution was not "intended to stand as a barrier against social and spiritual progress." But they emphatically disagree with the theory that the Constitution may be changed by subterfuge and indirection to conform to the ideas of any political group, however powerful, of what constitutes social and political progress. The Constitution stands in the way of nothing that the American people, in their seasoned judgment, decide that they want to do. It may be changed to meet changed conditions, but only after the whole people have had an opportunity to pass upon the change proposed. Any other method of changing it strikes at the basic theory and form of our Government.

Even the New Dealers now appear to appreciate the force of public opinion aroused against them on this point. Secretary Roper, in what had all the earmarks of an authoritative New Deal utterance, in his speech on Constitution Day, gave us a pretty strong hint of what is in the New Deal mind when he asked this question. I quote:

"If there is not sufficient constitutional authority for the Federal Government to deal properly with a Nation-wide economic and social crisis, is it the will of the American people to amend their Constitution so that the Government, in times of acute national distress, may, by bold, direct action, avoid utter chaos?"

In the light of the "bold and direct action" taken by the New Dealers, without regard to constitutional authority, vast numbers of the American people shudder to think of where they would be now if there had been no constitutional barriers. The New Dealers desire a change in the Constitution to make the New Deal constitutional. I say let them propose such an amendment and make concrete the issue before the American people. The inevitable trend of the New Deal has been away from our form and theory of government. Do the American people want this?

The American people have the undoubted right to change their Constitution through the orderly processes provided for in the instrument itself. They have the right to remove from the Constitution the safeguards that have protected them in their individual liberties since the birth of the Nation. They have the right to emasculate their Constitution so as to change the essential spirit of their form of government to make it conform to the New Deal theory and philosophy of government. They have the right to make constitutional dictatorship in time of stress. Do you want to do it? Do you want this Nation to proceed on an uncharted course, without limitations of political and Executive action, or do you favor real progress under prescribed limitations, based on fundamental and proven truths?

How clearly Calvin Coolidge foresaw the danger of centralizing power in the Executive when, nearly 10 years ago, he said:

"No plan of centralization has ever been adopted which did not result in bureaucracy, tyranny, inflexibility, reaction, and decline * * *. Unless bureaucracy is constantly resisted it breaks down representative government and overwhelms democracy."

Let us consider how truly he predicted the inevitable result of such an experiment as the N. R. A., a typical example of the New Deal legislation, resulting from legislative surrender to Executive dictation.

When the N. R. A. was passed in the House, under a drastic gag rule, limiting debate to only a few hours, it was frankly stated by its sponsors that it made the President of the United States a dictator over industry for the time being, but that it would be a benign dictatorship. Under the stress and urgency of the occasion the measure was hurried through the Senate, despite its ominous aspects.

It was not long before the American people were to find that it provided, in fact, for a dictatorship, and that the effects of this dictatorship were not benign.

Such was the clamor of public opinion against it, there was general relief when the Supreme Court declared it unconstitutional. Whatever there was of good in it was so outweighed and overborne by the arbitrary, burdensome, and oppressive methods of its administration that this attempt at a benign dictatorship was thoroughly discredited before the Supreme Court gave it the finishing blow. The N. R. A. was so thoroughly discredited, in fact, that it now would be scarcely worth while to mention it but for one thing. Though its body lies mouldering in the grave, its meddlesome spirit goes marching on in the New Deal ranks.

This spirit was exemplified in the last session of Congress by the insatiable appetite of the New Dealers for further control over the activities of American citizens. It lurks in the cautious inquiry of Secretary Roper, which I have quoted. It was unmistakably evident in President Roosevelt's irritation shown at the historic press conference following the announcement of the Supreme Court's decision declaring the N. R. A. unconstitutional. You remember his "horse and buggy" comment.

This spirit of control dominated most of the important legislation the New Deal Congresses enacted. Consider the many acts dealing with industry, agriculture, banking, and labor, all tending to centralize control in the hands of the Chief Executive. Think of the general terms employed in the authorization for administrative initiative and activity in public works and relief, even social reforms, all centered in the hands of the President. Does this correspond to our ideas of a representative form of government, under which the legislative branch is expected to express its definite intent in legislating?

Consider the financial record of these three New Deal sessions, with authorizations for expenditures of over $30,000,000,000—greater than the entire cost of government from 1789 to 1913, inclusive, and greater than the direct cost of American participation in the World War for fighting and demobilization. Compare these figures with the promises of President Roosevelt. This vast authorization of expenditures was demanded by the New Deal Executive and driven through Congress without regard to the burden to be placed upon the country and its people in the future. A large part of this sum was placed in the hands of the Chief Executive for expenditure at his direction. Does this conform to our understanding of legislative functions and the duty of Congress to determine how the revenue of the country, derived from its people, together with the huge sums borrowed by the New Deal administration, is to be spent?

Even the President seems finally to have realized that American business had had enough for the time being, having announced in his recent letter to publisher Howard that business was to have a "breathing spell." Of course, you remember that was what Max Baer got in the fight the other night between the third and fourth rounds. Doubtless, during that brief "breathing spell" his anticipation of what he was likely to receive in the fourth round was not made more pleasant by his recollection of what he had received in the preceding three. It is not a pleasing duty to remind you of this, but the President will be back soon, and the New Deal Congress will be here again for a fourth round in a few short months.

I believe the American people now realize what has happened and will continue to happen unless our legislative branch of government resumes the duties and responsibilities originally intended. Reassumption of legislative responsibility, clear-cut and well-defined, would not be a backward step. It would be a mighty step forward. It would make possible progress and cooperation to a far greater degree than buck passing and placing in the hands of the President powers and resources never before dreamed of in a democracy—powers greater in many respects than are at the command of the dictators in Europe. Let us return to our representative form of government. Let us return to sanity.

HOSPITALIZATION OF DISABLED VETERANS

Mr. HAINES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAINES. Mr. Speaker, I want to discuss the bill that is before the House rather than enter into any political discussion. I want to discuss only one section of the bill, which has to do with hospitalization of our sick and disabled veterans. I am pleased, indeed, to note that the committee has recommended an increase of almost $5,000,000 for hospitalization purposes and that a part of the increase will be for additional hospital beds.

Surely these beds are necessary, for I am quite certain that every Member of Congress is familiar with the great need for additional beds. We have a modern new naval hospital located in Philadelphia which has a capacity of between 900 and 950 beds and at the present time the capacity is rated at 650 beds. The Veterans' Administration in Philadelphia have been most considerate of me in my desire to aid the sick veterans in my congressional district, but unfortunately they have been unable to give me the service that I need for my district due to the fact that they have a limit of 200 beds after March 31 of this year. Up until that date they have available 250 beds, but this will not begin to take care of the applications that come to them from the area in the Philadelphia district.

Upon orders of the medical director, the Veterans' Administration is only permitted to accept applications from metropolitan Philadelphia, which does not include the counties in my congressional district. I find it most difficult at times to have veterans residing in my district admitted, and let me say that it is through no fault or disposition on the part of the Veterans' Administration in Philadelphia.

All applications from my district are then forwarded to the Veterans' Administration facility, Bronx, N. Y., but only to learn that the latter could receive no further applications due to their crowded capacity and long waiting lists for admission from metropolitan New York. All Pennsylvania veterans are entitled to just as much consideration as those who reside in the metropolitan areas, but it is most evident to me that little consideration has been given to that group who do not reside in these metropolitan areas. I stated that the full capacity of this hospital is 900 to 950 beds. This maximum could be made available if the placing of the beds were arranged in such a way as to not overcrowd the hospital. At the present time the beds are placed on 9-foot centers between beds, which is more than is necessary, and if this were reduced, and which would not be causing an overcrowding condition, you could place three beds where you now place two.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it to be our duty to care for these sick and disabled men. I believe that the citizens of our great country expect us to do this. I have the daily census report of this naval hospital as of December 3, 1935, and I shall insert it as a part of these remarks for the information of the House.

This report, subtracted from the estimated capacity of the hospital, clearly indicates a vacant bed capacity of well over 500, available if the budget of the Veterans' Administration were sufficient to allow the Veterans' Administration to reimburse the Navy Department as per the diem rates in effect.

And yet, notwithstanding all of this, the veterans I represent must wait for weeks and months before given the treatment and care a grateful people want them to have. I am reliably informed that at the present time there is a waiting list for the naval hospital of more than 400 applications which have been reviewed medically and approved for admission if and when the beds become available. With this great new modern hospital built to care for 900 or more patients and then to know that about 200 are being cared for, I am sure we want this additional appropriation used to take care of that long waiting list. If this is true in the Philadelphia area, I believe it must be true also with other districts.

The American Legion in its State convention last year sent me copy of a resolution adopted by the convention asking for an increase in the new naval hospital in Philadelphia to full capacity and that Aspinwall Hospital, in western Pennsylvania, be increased 250 additional beds for mental patients, and that Coatesville Hospital be increased 500 beds for mental patients, and that a hospital be built in northeastern Pennsylvania for general medical cases.

These men are familiar with the needs and are to be commended for their interest in their buddies, and I sincerely hope that very sympathetic consideration be given to the necessity for additional hospital facilities and that immediate action will be taken by those authorized to act. I believe it to be the sentiment of this body to give this hospital care to our veterans, for it is an honest debt the Nation owes those unfortunates who were willing to sacrifice for country and now suffer by reason of their patriotism and service. We can do no less.

NEW DEAL EXPENDITURES DENY YOUTH OPPORTUNITY

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radio address which I made.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered over the radio on October 30, 1935:

I wish to express my appreciation to the Columbia Broadcasting System for the privilege of talking over the radio tonight.

For 32 months now, Mr. Roosevelt has been President. During that time we have drifted far away from sound principles of government, from the Constitution of the United States, and have given up a large portion of the liberties which have been handed down to us through the ages.

For 3 years prior to the Roosevelt administration the appropriations for each year had run between $4,500,000,000 and $5,000,000,000, with a considerable downward trend indicated in 1932. The appropriations to be spent in the fiscal year 1934 aggregated a total of $8,791,000,000. The appropriations supposed to be spent in the fiscal year 1935 aggregated $11,534,000,000, and the appropriations of the last session of Congress just closed aggregated $10,256,000,000. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, the expenditures of the Roosevelt administration were $7,105,000,000, and the deficit for the year was $3,989,000,000. The expenditures for the year ending June 30, 1935, were $7,375,000,000, and the deficit was $3,575,000,000. The national debt on March 4, 1933, was approximately $22,000,000,000. At the present time it is $34,000,000,000, including the guaranties and the bonus, all of which the President leaves out in his statement.

There is now appropriated and unexpended $11,000,000,000. All of this, except perhaps a very small amount, has been allocated by the President for one purpose or another. All of it will be spent with the possible exception of $2,000,000,000 of R. F. C. funds. This leaves total expenditures in sight of $9,000,000,000 in the year ending June 30 next. The total revenue in sight, including Post Office revenues, processing taxes, and everything else, does not exceed $3,250,000,000. With the probability that $9,000,000,000, or at least $8,500,000,000, will be spent, with a revenue of $3,250,000,000, this would leave a deficit of upward of $5,000,000,000 for the balance of the fiscal year 1936. This will make a net public debt of $39,000,000,000. The President told us on September 30 that he was going to reduce the deficit to $3,281,000,000 for this year. This can only be done by cutting down the expenditures which he is now planning to make, and the big item with which he proposes to reduce his borrowings is $158,000,000 of reduction in the General Treasury balance.

So far this year the deficit is way ahead of last year. The 1st of October—for the first 3 months of the fiscal year—it ran $911,000,000, as against approximately $600,000,000 for the same period last year. On the 15th of October it showed a more marked increase. The revenue does not show the increase which was anticipated by the President.

PROGRAM MEANS TROUBLE

I have no desire to destroy the confidence of the people, but I cannot see how we can go on with the present spending program and not get into trouble. The President has had appropriated to him for direct relief, without including the R. F. C. appropriations, and without including any other capital stock of Government corporations, or any other items which are called "emergency appropriations", approximately $12,000,000,000. Of these funds for relief, for emergency conservation work, and for the C. W. A. there has been used approximately $5,000,000,000. For the promotion of rackets and pet hobbies of the President there has been allocated $7,000,000,000. You will remember that the President insisted upon an unconstitutional appropriation of money for relief which gave him the authority to use the money as he wished and which did not require him to use it for a particular purpose that Congress should specify.

Under this, upward of a billion dollars has been allocated, and most of it spent on reclamation projects, to bring into cultivation desert land to drive our farmers out of business at the same time that processing taxes were levied for the purpose of taking good land out of cultivation.

RELIEF?

Millions upon millions of dollars have been allocated under the "Chic Sale division" of the United States Public Health Service for the purpose of building sanitary toilets in the mountains of Tennessee, Kentucky, North and South Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama; and then, so that they may be properly embellished, rambler roses have been planted around them at Government expense. And they call this relief!

Even now the President is spending about $50,000,000 of relief money for the so-called national youth movement, and under this he is using the taxpayers' money to teach young people to act in plays and to dance and to teach them how to make puppet actors and conduct puppet shows and make dolls and all that sort of thing. Imagine, using money that had been entrusted to you for relief for such a purpose.

If only legitimate demands for relief were taken care of by the Federal Government instead of using or allocating $12,000,000,000 and fooling away the billions which the President has fooled away, we could have provided adequate relief for those who needed it if it had been administered by local organizations with $2,500,000,000 or $3,000,000,000. And we would have eliminated the waste which has so demoralized and corrupted the American people.

DEBT AND TAXES

This mounting public debt has reached the stage where the present generation will never be able to meet it. We are going to have inflation to meet the governmental expenditures, we are going to have repudiation, or we are going to have taxes.

Inflation to meet a deficit cannot be controlled and would bring unquestionable disaster.

Repudiation, to me, is impossible.

The only recourse, if we are to permit the President to continue the spending program, is taxes, and this is what taxes mean:

1. In England a man with a family with a $1,000 income pays $30 per year income tax. In the United States he is exempted up to $2,500. On the other hand, the man with a large income in England pays a much smaller tax than we do here. With surtaxes and direct taxes, and the New York State taxes, the tax on the large income has already reached a point where it is 90 percent of the income. That these large incomes cannot be taxed much farther is manifest. We are driving people out of productive enterprises into tax-exempt securities, where they pay no income tax, and there are outstanding $50,000,000,000 to $60,000,000,000 of these bonds. These taxes will bear heaviest on people with small incomes.

2. A sales tax on all sales of 2 percent, which might yield $1,500,000,000 if it was made without exemptions.

3. An increase in the gasoline tax to 10 or 12 cents, whereas the Federal tax is at present only 1 cent.

I do not advocate these taxes, but they are what the continuation of the Roosevelt spending program means.

PEOPLE ENSLAVED

By the A. A. A., by the N. R. A., by the Guffey coal bill, by the social-security bill, and by the direct appropriation to the President of all these funds for his allotment, an attempt is being made through legislation to regiment and enslave the people and tell them what they can raise or produce. By those same bills, the liberty of the American people is destroyed and their opportunity to earn a living is destroyed. The young man of the future is the one who must bear the brunt of the Roosevelt measures. He will be tax-conscious all through his life.

The young man will not have the opportunity to make something of himself as we did in our day, but his course will be mapped out for him by a dictator with supreme power. The policies of President Roosevelt are heading us for financial ruin and for a dictatorship, in which I believe he desires and expects to be the dictator.

Socialism, fascism, or communism—and there is little difference between them except in name—are the goal of the Roosevelt administration. Unless the people wake up and throw the Roosevelt administration bodily out of office, we are going to get into a situation where the Constitution is destroyed, the liberty of the American people is destroyed, the opportunity of youth is destroyed, and business recovery is prevented by terrible taxes.

My idea is to wake the people up before it is too late. The only recourse is the election of a Republican President and a Republican Congress in 1936, and as a preparation for that important event we should lay the foundation by electing our Republican tickets everywhere this year.

SENATE ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the Senate of the following titles:

THIRTY-THIRD ANNUAL MEETING OF UNITED STATES GROUP OF INTERPARLIAMENTARY UNION

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Monday, January 20, at 10:30 a. m., the thirty-third annual meeting of our group of the Interparliamentary Union will be held in the Senate Committee on the Library, on the Senate floor, west side. Every Senator and Representative is ipso facto a member of this group and, as such, entitled to participate in the meeting. The program will include the reading of the minutes of the last meeting, announcements and communications, the report of the Thirty-first Conference of the Interparliamentary Union, held on July 26–31 last in the city of Brussels, Belgium, the election of officers, and other business.

Mr. President, in connection with the notice given by me relative to the forthcoming Thirty-third Annual Meeting of the United States of America Group of the Interparliamentary Union, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the minutes of the last meeting, held in 1935.

There being no objection, the minutes were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The minutes of the last annual meeting having appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Friday, January 18, 1935, it was voted upon the motion of Mr. Carter, seconded by Mr. Eaton, that the minutes be approved without reading.

The permanent executive secretary called attention to certain rules and regulations of the Interparliamentary Union, under the terms of which it is the duty of the United States group to keep the Congress informed, through its committee or through one of its members, of resolutions adopted at the conferences which call for parliamentary or governmental action.

Again, the Interparliamentary Union expects its members to do their utmost to see that the work of the Union is made known in their respective countries, in order to obtain as large a measure of support as possible. The members of all groups are invited "to assist to the best of their ability in the maintenance of peace amongst the nations."

In article 17 of the Regulations for Conferences it is provided that "at the close of each conference the president shall enumerate the principal resolutions adopted which it will be the duty of the groups to present to their respective governments and parliaments (Stat., art. 5) in the shape of bills, motions, questions, or under any other form suitable to the circumstances."

We are notified from Geneva that:

"In view of the importance of promoting the work in favor of peace and international cooperation pursued by the Interparliamentary Union by putting into execution the resolutions passed by its conferences;

"In view of the fact that it lies with the national groups of the Union to secure the application of those resolutions in the political life and in the legislation of their respective countries, as also in international life;

"In view of the fact that, if positive results are to be obtained in this respect through the action of the groups, it is indispensable that those groups, as autonomous members of the Union, should exercise a permanent and continuous influence within their respective parliaments."

As set forth at the Twenty-eighth Inter-Parliamentary Conference at Bucharest, the following measures are recommended to the national groups:

"1. That two regular group meetings at least should be called in the course of the year, one of which should discuss the actior to be taken in connection with the resolutions passed by conferences. (See art. 17 of the Regulations for Conferences.)

"2. That detailed information should be given in the annual reports of the groups (Stat., art. 3) as to the steps taken in connection with the resolutions of preceding conferences and especially as to the motives which may have led a group to refrain from action with regard to any particular resolution.

"3. That debates on questions placed on the agenda of the union should be instituted within the groups. Such debates might be opened by national or foreign experts, parliamentary or nonparliamentary, invited by the groups."

With regard to resolutions of conferences recommending the ratification of international conventions, the conference asks our group "to see that the steps taken with the Government with a view to ratification should be renewed until the group has achieved its ends."

The resolutions of the Istanbul Conference were summarized by your executive secretary in his statement printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 18, 1935, page 690. It remains for our group to take action in accordance with article 5 of the statutes of the Union, which lays upon each group the duty of "keeping its parliament informed, through its committee or through one of its members, of resolutions adopted at the conferences which call for parliamentary or governmental action."

No group is asked to act in support of a resolution which has not been favorably received by a majority of its members. The resolutions adopted at Istanbul were passed unanimously by the delegates present, excepting those on security and the reduction of armaments.

It is readily apparent from a reading of the resolutions that the Interparliamentary Union has the single aim of promoting the solidarity of all states through the maintenance of peace through justice. In his book Le Droit constitutionnel et l'organisation de la paix, Professor Mirkine-Guetzévitch, secretary general of the Institute of Public Law and coeditor of L'Annuaire Interparlementaire, points out that it was the Union which first had the honor of launching the principle of "harmonization of national legislations with the new principles of international law."

The resolution adopted at Istanbul advising the adoption of a universal system of security, providing for a consultative body with power to express its opinion on any violation of the prohibition of recourse to force and to define the aggressor state, and for the application of sanctions of force was not approved by the American delegates.

After having defined the contents of a universal pact of security, the Istanbul resolution recommends the signature of continental pacts (such as the European draft security pact, or the Saavedra Lamas Treaty signed in Rio de Janeiro in 1933 by several American states), culminating in a system of regional treaties, which may be either multilateral or bilateral. These treaties must be in accordance with the rules of existing regional pacts, such as the Paris Pact, and must not be directed against any power or group of powers.

From Geneva our attention is also called to the fact that at the present time diplomats appear to prefer regional treaties. It may be recalled in this connection that a Balkan pact has already been concluded, and that efforts are being made to draw up an eastern pact of nonaggression.

We of America may have occasion to study the drafts of other regional pacts which may be drawn up within the next few months, and profitably to consult the Istanbul resolution, which is the fruit of several years of thorough study.

The Istanbul Conference made a point of declaring the faith of the Union in the cause of the reduction of armaments, despite the repeated failures of the disarmament conference and the general pessimism. To this declaration it also added the list of measures which the Union has long advised and which are known to all its members.

For the first time the Union was called upon in Istanbul to deal with social questions.

The resolution relating to the evolution of the representative system and technical problems is worth consideration for several reasons.

In the first place it fixes in its preamble the method which the Union should adopt in the study of the representative system. This method, if adopted, would open up sources of useful knowledge to all members of the Union, especially of the evolution of political institutions in the different countries, and ought to result in courteous exchanges of opinion. Thus the members of the Union are asked to give their experiences in regard to their respective parliaments, without criticizing the systems in use abroad. The Union can in this way remain faithful to its wise policy of respect for the convictions of all its members in a sphere which is particularly delicate.

The resolution then gives several suggestions in respect of the passing of the budget, remedies for the imperfections of parliamentary procedure, governmental stability, the separation of the political and judicial powers, finally, the independence of parliaments. These suggestions give an echo of discussions which have taken place in all countries on current problems, which are sometimes of burning interest. They prove that in many parliaments almost similar solutions have been considered, a sure proof that the ills from which the representative system is suffering are widespread, and that international consultations on the matter, as offered by the Interparliamentary Union, should be nothing but profitable. Our group will, therefore, find in the resolution adopted at Istanbul a valuable contribution to the study of the evolution of political institutions.

Attention was called to the fact that the permanent executive secretary had received a receipt from the secretary general of the Union for $7,500 which, because of the depreciation of the dollar, represents a depreciation of approximately 15,000 Swiss francs, something over $1,800, in the net value of the grant of the United States to the Interparliamentary Union for the year 1934–35. The executive secretary called attention to a statement by President MONTAGUE upon this point, reading as follows:

"I have learned that our contribution to the Bureau of the Interparliamentary Union last year of $7,500 would have been normally 38,500 Swiss francs; but because of the drop of the dollar the Bureau was only able to realize 24,750 Swiss francs, a reduction of about 37 percent. For the coming year the following drop in the dollar will mean that our appropriation to the Bureau will drop from 38,500 to 23,000 francs, a loss to the Bureau of 15,000 Swiss francs."

Under date of November 24, 1934, the executive secretary wrote to Dr. Boissier, secretary general of the Union, saying: "I see no way by which we can make up the loss to the Bureau due to the depreciation of the dollar, except possibly by getting the appropriation for next year increased." To this statement Dr. Bossier replied that it seemed to him "an excellent suggestion."

The members were reminded that President MONTAGUE had urged the Congress to appropriate $10,000 to the Bureau of the Interparliamentary Union at Geneva; and that he had also urged that an authorization act be passed by the Congress authorizing an appropriation not to exceed $20,000 per annum, $10,000 of which should be for the contribution of the United States to the maintenance of the Bureau at Geneva, and $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to assist in meeting the expenses of the United States of America Group of the Interparliamentary Union. It appeared to be the opinion of all the members present that both these suggestions by President MONTAGUE should be approved by the Congress.

ELECTION OF OFFICERS

Upon the motion of Mr. CARTER, it was voted that Senator ALBEN W. BARKLEY, of Kentucky, be elected president.

Upon the motion of Mr. EATON, who called attention to the great services and high character of Mr. ANDREW J. MONTAGUE, Mr. MONTAGUE was elected vice president of the group.

Upon motion of Mr. BLOOM, Senator WALLACE H. WHITE, of Maine, and Representative SAM D. MCREYNOLDS, of Tennessee, were elected vice presidents.

It was voted that Representative SOL BLOOM, of New York, be reelected treasurer, and that Representative CHARLES A. EATON, of New Jersey, be reelected secretary.

The executive committee was elected as follows: Senator ALBEN W. BARKLEY, ex-officio chairman; Representative ALBERT E. CARTER, California; Representative EVERETT MCKINLEY DIRKSEN, Illinois; Representative WILLIAM BACON OLIVER, Alabama; Senator TOM CONNALLY, Texas; Senator JOSEPH T. ROBINSON, Arkansas; Senator MILLARD TYDINGS, Maryland; Senator ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG, Michigan; Representative A. PIATT ANDREW, Massachusetts; Representative ROBERT L. BACON, New York.

Representative ANDREW J. MONTAGUE and Senator JOSEPH T. ROBINSON were elected members of the Council of the Interparliamentary Union.

Dr. Arthur Deerin Call was reelected permanent executive secretary for the fifteenth consecutive year.

Under the head of new business the executive secretary called attention to the six permanent study commissions of the Interparliamentary Union and asked if any wished to volunteer for services upon them. The permanent study commissions are:

1. Commission for the study of political and organization questions.
2. Commission for the study of juridical questions.
3. Commission for the study of economic and financial questions.
4. Commission for the study of ethnic and colonial questions.
5. Commission on the reduction of armaments.
6. Commission for the study of social and humanitarian questions.

It was voted that appointments to these commissions be left to the executive committee with power to act.

It was voted that Representative CHARLES A. EATON be asked to draft a letter, expressing the regrets of the group that Mr. ANDREW J. MONTAGUE had found it necessary to end his fine services as its president, and thanking him for his long-continued devotion to the high purposes of the Interparliamentary Union.

The meeting adjourned at 12 o'clock noon.

ARTHUR DEERIN CALL,
Permanent Executive Secretary.

CLAIM OF MRS. M. N. SHWAMBERG

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State recommending the enactment of legislation authorizing an appropriation in the sum of $500 in settlement of the claim presented against the Government of the United States on behalf of Mrs. M. N. Shwamberg, nationality indeterminable, as compensation for personal injuries sustained by her as the result of a collision between a public jinrikisha in which she was riding and a United States Marine Corps ambulance on Seymour Road, Shanghai, China, on January 31, 1935.

I recommend that Congress enact legislation authorizing an appropriation in the amount mentioned, in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of State.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
January 17, 1936.

[Enclosure: Report from the Secretary of State.]

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Greenville (S. C.) Trades and Labor Council, favoring the prompt enactment of legislation in place of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by a mass meeting of farmers and businessmen of Mayes County, Okla., favoring the adoption of measures whereby farmers may receive payments due them for 1935 corn-hog and cotton programs and also for the portion of the 1936 wheat program already complied with; also the enactment of legislation to continue the A. A. A. in a constitutional manner or some substitute therefor, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the League of Young Democrats of the State of Oklahoma, assembled in Mayes County, Okla., expressing their faith and confidence in and loyalty to the President of the United States and to the Congress in efforts to alleviate and improve the economic condition of farmers, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also laid before the Senate a memorandum on the relief situation submitted by the executive committee of the United States Conference of Mayors, being recommendations based on resolutions adopted at the last annual meeting of that conference, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the first annual meeting of the American Indian Federation, assembled at San Diego, Calif., reaffirming the stand taken by the American Indian Federation assembled in constitutional convention at Gallup, N. Mex., in 1934, asking for the removal of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and condemning the program and policies of the said Commissioner, and also favoring the repeal of the so-called Wheeler-Howard Act, relative to Indian affairs, which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate a letter in the nature of a petition from Mrs. J. M. Smith, of Shrewsbury, Pa., praying for the adoption of the so-called Townsend old-age-pension plan, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF MILITARY AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 3646. A bill to repeal an act of March 3, 1933, entitled "An act to provide for the transfer of powder and other explosive materials from deteriorated and unserviceable ammunition under the control of the War Department to the Department of Agriculture for use in land clearing, drainage, road building, and other agricultural purposes" (Rept. No. 1469); and

S. 3647. A bill to repeal certain provisions of the act of February 25, 1929, entitled "An act to authorize appropriations for construction at military posts, and for other purposes", and the act of July 3, 1930, entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1930, and June 30, 1931, and for other purposes" (Rept. No. 1470).

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED

Mrs. CARAWAY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on January 16, 1936, that committee presented to the President of the United States the enrolled bill (S. 430) for the relief of Anna Hathaway.

By Mr. CONNALLY:

A bill (S. 3745) to aid in the control and disposition of the surplus of agricultural commodities, to provide for the issuance of export debentures, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

THE ROOSEVELT ADMINISTRATION—ADDRESS BY THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by Hon. Homer Cummings, Attorney General of the United States, at New Haven, Conn., on November 9, 1935, his subject being the achievements of the Roosevelt administration.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

When President Roosevelt took the oath of office on the 4th day of March 1933 he confronted a nation discouraged and defeated. Every effort that the outgoing administration had made to stem the tide of adversity had proved to be either inadequate or futile. We were steadily drifting toward lower standards of civilization and were upon the verge of a great economic catastrophe. The leaders of finance, who in the old days had seemed to possess such supernatural wisdom, were in a state bordering upon abject terror. They had given up hope and saw nothing ahead but universal bankruptcy and the liquidation of assets under conditions so terrible that they could not have been endured by any free people.

The captains of industry were turning appealing eyes to Washington. The managers of every bank in America, sound or unsound, were looking for help. Such was the strain upon our financial institutions that even the best of them were in serious danger. The gold reserves of the country were being rapidly depleted, universal hoarding was the order of the day, and foreign trade had been brought to a standstill. Price levels were falling and industries were closing. Failures and bankruptcies had reached enormous and, indeed, unparalleled proportions. Farmers and their families were being evicted from their homes at the rate of 200,000 a year, and millions of people were out of work. The hopes and the prayers of the whole country turned to the man who was taking his oath of office at Washington.

Did he lack vision? Did he lack courage? Did he lack resourcefulness? Did he lack devotion to the public service? Did he lack the power of leadership, or the capacity to guide in a great national emergency? The united voice of America testifies to the contrary. His wisdom, his courage, and his buoyancy of spirit brought hope and confidence to our people. He restored the forgotten man; gave hope to the desperate man; courage to the fearful man, and bread to the hungry man.

His first proclamation, closing the banks of America until they could be reopened under happier auspices, was a courageous act of the highest statesmanship. He set in motion manifold agencies designed to restore the broken life of America.

Why do I advert to the desperate experiences of those dark days? Because the memory of man is very short. We have made so much progress since that time that there are people who have either forgotten, or want to forget, or want others to forget, so that they may restore the conditions that, in large part at least, produced the perils from which they so narrowly escaped.

Let it not be forgotten that this recovery legislation, which is now under attack in many quarters, was conceived in a nonpartisan spirit and supported by Members of the Congress of all political parties. That the Nation is recovering is too obvious for serious debate. The evidences of it are upon every hand.

Who is it that is dissatisfied with the work of the administration? Not the farmers who have been rescued by the Agricultural Adjustment Act. Not those whose farms have been saved by the Farm Credit Administration. Not those whose homes have been saved by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. Not the stockholders of banks, insurance companies, and railroads that have been saved by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Not those who have found work through the Public Works Administration. Not the 300,000 boys who were taken from idleness and given an opportunity in the Civilian Conservation Corps. Not the 52,000,000 American citizens whose deposits in the banks of the country are made secure by the act creating Federal deposit insurance. Not the laboring groups, in whose interest the National Recovery Administration established collective bargaining, improved working conditions, outlawed the sweatshop, abolished child labor, and gave to industry leadership and a breathing spell. Not those whose humanitarian instincts approve of the Social Security Act, which provides for old-age insurance for the industrial population of the country; and, in cooperation with the States, old-age benefits for people who have now reached an age which makes it impossible for them to take advantage of the insurance plan; and which further provides for a Nation-wide system of unemployment insurance to be operated in cooperation with the States; and for grants to States for the purpose of widows' pensions, child welfare, and public-health service. Not those who recognized the need of abolishing holding companies formerly connected with the banks of our country which made it possible to gamble with the funds of the depositors. Not those who favor stock-market regulations such as have been established under the Securities and Exchange Act, and the provisions of the securities act, whereby the public is protected in connection with sales literature which, now under penalty of law, must state not only the truth but the whole truth and nothing but the truth in connection with securities offered for general sale.

Not those who wanted to see the price level restored and take satisfaction in the fact that, by the devaluation of the dollar, and other measures of financial relief, the debt burden of the country has been made bearable. Not those who realize that the finances of the Government are upon a sounder basis than ever before; and that the outgoing tide of gold withdrawals has not only been checked, but has set the other way, and behind every dollar issued by the Government there is a larger gold and silver reserve than at any time in the history of this or any other nation.

Who then are these critics? Who is there that would reverse these processes?

There are, of course, ultrapartisans whose devotion to a party shibboleth is so intense that they are psychologically incapacitated for independent judgment. There are, also, many powerful groups in this country who have an intense distaste for the present administration. In these instances it is well to ask the previous question. It is well to ascertain the motives which actuate such groups. You will usually find a fear of the permanent loss of political power, or a deep resentment at the revocation of special advantages or a conservatism so deep and unreasoning that all change is looked upon as undesirable or revolutionary. Those who benefit by special privilege, and those who believe in a controlled government, have never been our friends and never can be, and when criticism emanates from groups of this kind, who stand upon the side line and criticize the great forward march of America, I cannot help but remind them that they have had their day. The world has passed them by. No matter what may be said of the defects of the Government at Washington, it cannot be said that it is in the hands of selfish interests, or that it is controlled from great financial centers, or that any ulterior purpose is being served by it, or that it owes any allegiance except to the people of America as a whole.

I undertake to suggest that it would be an act of unparalleled folly for the American people to take any steps that would tend to check America in her progress to better things. Those who, at this hour, seek for selfish purposes to sabotage the program of recovery are assuming a heavy responsibility.

That administrative mistakes have been made is, of course, not for a moment denied in any responsible quarter. These things are inherent in any great and successful program. The essential thing, however, is that we are moving forward and that we are moving forward triumphantly.

But they tell us that we are spending too much money. What would they have us do? Would they have us reverse the record of the last 2 years and erase from the statute books all of this constructive legislation? Would they have us recall the boys from the conservation camps and turn them loose in the streets again? Would they deny food and lodging to the starving and homeless? America would never consent to such a program.

Of course, recovery has cost a great deal of money, but it has not cost as much as unfriendly critics assume. During the world conflict we spent nearly $26,000,000,000 for the direct and destructive purposes of war. We have appropriated less than $14,000,000,000 for the constructive purposes of peace. Of this sum only about $10,000,000,000 have thus far been spent, and about half of this sum is recoverable.

From the 4th day of March 1933 to the present time, a period of a little more than 2½ years, there has been added to the value of the assets of the American people an amount many, many times in excess of the sum thus spent. This increase is estimated by some authorities to be as high as $100,000,000,000.

The national income for 1935 is about $9,000,000,000 more than the national income for 1933. The expenditures the Government has made are in reality national investments fully justified by their rich returns.

The case for the administration is overwhelming and the discouraged leaders of the old order cannot stay this great movement by a resort to ancient epitaphs or discredited phrases, nor by simulated anxiety about the safety of the Constitution.

In no land on earth are the people and the press so free as they are right here in the United States. I have but recently returned from abroad and I have a deep sympathy for the people there in their effort to deal with questions far more serious than ours. It is with no feeling of exultation, but rather with a sense of gratitude, that I reflect upon the state of my own country. We have our troubles, of course. Many things yet remain to be done, but the spirit is here with which to do them. The means are here. The leadership is here. The courage is here. Nowhere in our skies is there any dark cloud threatening the peace of our people. We are moving up the slopes of progress and are destined to advance to constantly higher planes of civilization and to wider fields of happiness and prosperity than we have thus far known.

ADDRESS OF POSTMASTER GENERAL FARLEY BEFORE LINCOLN MEMORIAL UNIVERSITY

Mr. BACHMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the address delivered by the Postmaster General, Hon. James A. Farley, before the Lincoln Memorial University, Cumberland Gap, Tenn., on Monday, November 18, 1935.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is with grateful humility that I accept the honor Lincoln Memorial University has extended to me. I will cherish it beyond any other distinction for it comes from an institution based on a clearer ideal and with a mission more definite than those of the older, bigger colleges. The great metropolitan institutions of learning naturally draw their philosophy from their environment. Theirs is the philosophy of the big city—a rather cynical psychology for the most part—and prone to run in a pattern of conservatism by reason of traditions consequent on their long history. Their student body is largely made up of the scions of prosperous families, whose advent in the halls of higher education is almost automatic. Naturally their school of thought is that of particularly contented people who, having fared well themselves, are hesitant at entertaining the idea of any change, however slight, in the existing order of things. Of course, this is a generalization. Nobody knows better than I that a bold spirit may develop anywhere, and our history is studded with brilliant examples of progressive men and women rising amid the most conventional surroundings to lead the world to higher aims and greater welfare.

The world is steadied by the staid conservatism of the majority, but any advance must proceed from the occasional liberal, whether in the faculties, the student bodies, or from the mass of the people who never saw the inside of a university—like the immortal Lincoln, to whom you owe this fine enterprise among the Tennessee mountains.

When I speak of liberalism I do not mean radicalism. Progressive thought is the motor that makes humanity a moving and not a static body. But, like every other motor, it must not speed beyond the margin of safety. If it runs wild, it will wreck the machine The Communist, and those political sects kin to him, at this stage of the world's progress, are even more distinctly a menace to the advance of social well-being than the rock-ribbed reactionaries who denounce every step as tending to the chaos of the extremists.

Government is not a motionless science. It must keep pace with the aspirations and instincts of the people. All through history we find that the dynasties that have failed to realize this have perished. There is not an absolute monarchy in the Caucasian world today. The dictatorships that have been established in certain nations are merely a passing phase, born in tumult and brought into being as one of the consequences of the inability or unwillingness of arbitrary or incompetent rulers to meet the needs of their subjects. The successful governments are those that have moved in unison with changing conditions, as our own has done. Our Government is not that of the early days of the Republic, admirable as it was when our country consisted of 13 States on the Atlantic shore, far scattered geographically, according to the communication facilities of that time, with varying interests and only a few simple questions—either domestically or in relation to each other. The problems of yesterday are not the problems of today or tomorrow. As our Nation expanded and developed, as the great corporations displaced the small individual or community enterprises in supplying the necessities and luxuries of the American people, as distances vanished until now it is only an overnight flight from one of our boundary oceans to the other, our Government met the new conditions. It met them carefully but courageously and fearlessly. It preserved intact the principles laid down by the makers of our Constitution, but it amended that Constitution 21 times as the welfare of citizens called for the amendments. And who is there that will say that we are not better off, that we have not added to the comfort of our people by these changes?

You here breathe in liberty with your mountain air. There has never been a national crisis that has not found you in the front rank of those who were meeting the emergency. No people in all our Nation have been as ready to fight for the principles they believed to be righteous. It would not be possible for men and women with your background to be otherwise than independent in thought. The folks from whom you spring lived their own lives, followed their own ideals. If there has been isolation, it was isolation of their own choosing. This university has given the people of this section an opportunity of value not to be estimated—not only to the student body for your own advantage but the opportunity for service, for I see in you a band of missionaries whose work will be of inestimable value to the whole country.

I have spoken of the ultra conservatism of some of the larger universities and have prophesied a less stringent adherence by you to old methods than is the case with so many of your brother and sister collegians in more conventional institutions. It is because of this contrast that I welcome the hail from the hills that brings me to Cumberland Gap. I think it is one of the finest compliments that has ever been paid me.

Perhaps there is another reason that makes your favor even more appreciated. We are already in the midst of a political campaign. As part of that campaign, because of the political position I hold, I have been kicked around a good deal recently by the folks on the other side. That, of course, is only to be expected. It is part of the mechanics of politics, and I ought to be used to it. Nevertheless it is a relief to receive a pleasant word from such an institution as this, and I can never fail to thank you for it.

Washington owes much to the State of Tennessee for the men it has sent to represent it at the National Capital. You gave us Andrew Jackson and Sam Houston, and that much misunderstood President, Andrew Johnson. No man stands higher today in the national estimation than Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, who came into the administration after notable service in the National Legislature. And let me also pay tribute to the skill and sense of duty with which Senators MCKELLAR and BACHMAN are discharging their senatorial functions. Nor should the effective work of the men you sent to the House of Representatives be overlooked. And let me also take off my hat on this auspicious occasion to your gracious Governor, Hill McAllister.

Tennessee is much in the public eye today by reason of the Tennessee Valley project. Muscle Shoals, Norris Dam, and the other sections of that great work are in the newspaper headlines every day. The project is a magnificent experiment; and as long as the rivers flow to the sea the beneficent results of this harnessing of the great water power will pay untold dividends in comfort, convenience, and more material returns to the people of this whole section. In such a period of depression as that from which we are now issuing, the employment it has given to many of your people, the prosperity of the business houses that have supplied the materials, and the incidental aid to industry and business have been a great factor in reducing unemployment. You know the statistics of this vast enterprise better than I do. And you know the benefits that will accrue from it far more accurately than I.

Here is really a great public work, nonpartisan, nonsectional, nonpolitical. I do not know whether the devoted men who are handling it are members of my party or of the other party, nor does it make any difference. It is enough to know that this magnificent work is being splendidly done. It is good to think that an enterprise in which the Government had invested many millions of dollars, originally as a war measure, is being pushed to completion and that the war purpose has become at most only a minor incident to the peacetime uses that mean so much to this and neighboring States. A great natural force that was running to waste now becomes a vital aid to industry as well as making life easier for millions of individuals.

In your political economy courses the undergraduates of this university have learned to appraise accurately the advantages of this use of natural resources in the interest of the whole people. I dare say they have already debated the vexed question of how far the Government is justified in entering the field which has so long been monopolized by utility companies for their own profit. The question the Government had to decide was where its duty lay; whether it was better to let this wonderful source of power and light lie fallow, when its development would give better and cheaper service to a multitude than was being afforded by private corporations, or to keep its hands off and trust to private enterprise to treat the people fairly.

I know that the Tennessee Valley project has been severely attacked, but I also know that its development was motivated by no hostility to existing corporations. Its output and service charges have been described as a "yardstick" by which a legitimate price for light and power could be measured. Under such a system no private corporation could have a right to complain. There can be no rate war as between the Government-owned plants and the private plants, because all the Government will seek to do will be to keep prices below the extortion plane. I do not know that the local corporations have been exorbitant in their charges, but I do know that in many cities dependent on a private monopoly the prices they have to pay are beyond all reason; far in excess of a legitimate return on the investment represented.

Tennessee Valley is an experiment, the influence of which will be felt all over the United States. Its success implies that extortion in every section will be checked. What is being done in Tennessee can as well be done elsewhere, not necessarily by the Federal Government, but by the States themselves, and even counties and municipalities. And that, it seems to me, is in itself full justification for the enterprise.

I have read, of course, the dramatic story of the founding of this university. I have seen in your literature that the greatest of our Presidents since Washington said to a great general, while the Civil War was raging, as he pointed to these mountains, "These people are loyal and true, General Howard. I know all about them. They are my people. Their tragedy is lack of opportunity. They haven't any better chance than I had. Something must be done. I want you to promise me, General, if you come out of this horror alive—and I pray God you may—that you will provide them educational opportunity."

This great university is the outcome of Lincoln's dream. It was made possible by the patriotism of men of wealth, and it is no more a monument to Abraham Lincoln than it is to those whose public spirit and interest in education led them to contribute their millions to its foundation. We have heard a great deal in recent years of the fierce greed of certain individuals and the dubious means they took to pile up their great fortunes. It is a heartening thing to set up against this background of selfishness and callousness the example of men like Du Pont, Sieberling, John Hays Hammond, Proctor, Governor Lowden, of Illinois, and others who have immortalized themselves with you by creating the Lincoln Memorial University. I note among those who played a conspicuous part in this great work one of my predecessors as Postmaster General, Dr. Hubert Work. I can imagine no better use to which men of wealth can put their fortunes than to devote their millions to the cause of education. I can imagine no greater satisfaction than must come to the survivors among these benefactors than to stand here on the Boone trail and note the wonderful campus and the adequate buildings that have risen among these mountains.

Their names will be affectionately remembered by the graduates of this college because of this performance long after their achievements in the business and professional world have been forgotten. The men and women who go out into the world after finishing their courses here will retain throughout their lives their appreciation of what has been done for them. We know, of course, of undaunted spirits who accomplished great things without the help of a college degree. The picture comes to mind of Lincoln in his humble home reading law by the light of the fireplace, dragging out an education with the hardest sort of labor. Amid tremendous odds, genius may be able to accomplish these things, but it is far beyond the capacity of most of us. The general run of men upon whom must depend the ordinary progress of civilization need all the help they can get, and such an education as is afforded by this institution implants the knowledge they require. It cannot, of course, take the place of experience, but it can and does supplement experience and given two people of equal capacity the college student will outstrip the other.

We have progressed far during the last generation away from the point when the college man was the exception, and the education of a great majority ceased at the high school or even earlier. Such establishments as this have made the route to knowledge comparatively easy. Private help and public scholarships have made it possible for nearly every boy or girl with the thirst to know to slake that thirst at one or another of the numerous universities. It has been said, and it is undoubtedly true, that the idle and the indolent gain nothing from the veneer of a college course. But every man and woman who takes such a course with the actual desire to learn gains something beyond price. The average college graduate takes the great advantage he has as a matter of course. It is the man who has not been to college who is sensitive of what he has lost. I know that for a fact, because I am one of those men. I wish I could tell you how often, and how keenly, I have felt the lack of the training that you members of the student body are receiving. The rest of the world must learn to concentrate, while concentration instilled in your classrooms is a mere matter of habit with you. The rest of us try to make up by reading in the sparse moments of the busy life of an adult for what we have missed in our youth. This moves me to say to you in closing that you will never realize how fortunate you have been. It is not mere pride of accomplishment in the future that will repay you for the effort you are making here, for if I have learned one thing it is that the more a man learns as he goes through life the wider is the vista of the things he feels he ought to learn in addition. Every grain of knowledge, whether obtained out of a book or through experience, is an additional asset, and he who is without wisdom—which is just another name for learning—is the poorest person in the world.

In taking leave of you here let me reiterate my feeling of gratitude for the compliment you have paid me. Let me extend my thanks to Dr. McClelland, president of this university, and to the devoted members of his faculty. Actually, I believe that the educator is the most consistently useful person in the body politic.

Most of us work with inanimate things to attain success. The teachers take the raw material in the shape of boys and girls and process them into the men and women who will guide our country. Their material rewards may be meager, but I can conceive of nothing that could give such gratification as the knowledge that you have taught your students to be honest, courageous, patriotic, and industrious; to maintain through their lives a high moral standard and to realize that a true man's duty is not only to himself but to his fellow men. For your teachers I have the utmost admiration, and for you students I cannot escape a feeling of envy.

My best wishes to all of you.

PORTRAIT OF THE LATE SENATOR CUTTING—PRESENTATION ADDRESS BY HON. HARRY B. HAWES

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by Hon. Harry B. Hawes, formerly a Member of this body from the State of Missouri, at the Malacanan Palace, Philippine Islands, on November 16, 1935, on the occasion of the presentation by the congressional delegation to the Philippine Government of an oil portrait of the late Senator Bronson Cutting.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, this palace nearly 100 years ago was first occupied by a Spanish Governor General appointed by the King of Spain.

A little more than a generation ago America assumed possession, and it has since then been occupied by American Governors General appointed by the President of the United States.

The last of these is Gov. Frank Murphy, who, with his tactful sister, has been with you for the past 3 years. During his administration all the fine traditions of his predecessors were preserved and, in addition, he has secured your entire confidence as well as your affection.

Yesterday, for the first time, a native-born Filipino took possession of this edifice as Chief Magistrate of the new Commonwealth. He came into possession of this office by a popular vote so conclusive and overwhelming that we in America would have termed it a political landslide.

In the early days, when Philippine independence was discussed by your Commissioners and by the distinguished commissions which were sent to the United States, American curiosity always introduced the inquiry, "Who will the Filipino people select for their first President?"

As my mind reverts to those times, I find that without exception your able Commissioners GUEVARA and Osias without hesitation replied it would be Quezon.

When your brilliant commission with whom I was associated in framing the Hawes-Cutting Act visited our Congress, the same inquiry was made, and I remember particularly the answers from Osmeña, from Roxas, and from all others that the first President would be Quezon.

Speaker Roxas was your outstanding brilliant advocate. He won congressional committees by his eloquence, his logic, and grasp of the vital needs of your country. I do not exaggerate when I add that no other witness before a congressional committee made a more profound and lasting impression than he.

The prediction that Mr. Quezon would be your first President was always accompanied by the statement that Senator Osmeña would be the first Vice President.

Senator Osmeña brought to America a balanced judgment, a logical mind, and a fine patriotism. He knew how to stand for the vital things and let the smaller issues pass for later solution. He was your Filipino Benjamin Franklin, courteous but persistent, and ably abetted by his brilliant wife. He and Roxas wrote a flaming page in Philippine history.

Time will not permit the individual mention of the names of the other able Commissioners, whose cheerful temper, whose kindly activity finally secured the first great charter of your liberty, but you Filipinos know their names. They are written in the hearts of your countrymen where they will remain in the same historic position as the signers of our Declaration of Independence.

It was no surprise to me, nor was it a surprise to anyone here or in the United States, that your people should, in what we in America would have described as a peaceful and orderly election, have fulfilled this prophecy of many years by your selection of Manuel L. Quezon.

Mr. President, it was your thought that originated the plan of a visit from the Vice President, the Speaker of our House of Representatives, and the distinguished Senators and Congressmen.

It must be gratifying to you to know that, with the possible exception of a few, those Members of Congress who served with you and who remember you with affection as Commissioner to the United States are here in this room. What a fine tribute from all these associates and friends of men who knew, respected, and loved you!

The American delegation on its way to your inauguration stopped for a while in Canada, in Japan, in China, in the great British outpost at Hong Kong.

Since arriving here, again under the Stars and Stripes, I observe a change. There is a serious note of inquiry, the beginning of a feeling of responsibility; there is a desire to know, and under the surface, in the heart of this delegation, is a sincere desire to be helpful.

It is unfortunate that all of your guests could not deliver addresses, but 44 speeches would have been too many, and I have noted with some amusement the expressions of relief from nearly all of those who have been omitted from the program.

The eloquent voices of your friends, of Senator KING, one of the first for independence; of Senator TRAMMELL, head of our great Naval Affairs Committee; of Senator ASHURST, the dean of the delegation; of Congressman DOUGHTON, of Congressman TREADWAY, and of some 40 others, would, if time permitted, be heard in speeches of force and brilliance.

Mr. President, on this occasion your guests are not Democrats nor Republicans; your guests are just American statesmen, who desire to be helpful and to know first hand and by individual inquiry what is best to be done for your country and our country. Their opinion will be world-wide in significance. That opinion may not only affect your 14,000,000 people and our 130,000,000 people, but it may affect the future political philosophy of the world.

The delegation did not come here upon an adventure of pleasure; it is composed of earnest men seeking the facts and the truth. And it is only on secure facts that the Congress will in the future express its mind.

Mr. President, probably the greatest of your many achievements was to secure from President Roosevelt the promise of the creation of a joint commission to report to our Congress at an early date upon changes necessary for economic stability and reciprocity between our two countries. This achievement offers a fair and practical plan for preserving the economic life of the Filipino people.

It must have been gratifying for you to have heard the approval of this plan by the Vice President of the United States and the Speaker of our House of Representatives.

You must be pleased to know that what might be termed the Roosevelt-Quezon plan meets with universal approval, and I believe with you that it prepares the way to work out an equitable solution of the present economic uncertainties.

Mr. President, we brought with us as a token of good will the portrait of Senator Bronson Cutting, whose brilliant senatorial career was cut short by an airplane accident.

His loss was profoundly regretted throughout the United States. Expressions of sympathy came from various portions of the world, and especially from the Philippines.

The congressional delegation believes that this oil painting will be accepted as a testimonial of good will, that it will be appreciated by your people.

It will interest you to know that the portrait was made from a photograph selected by the Senator's wonderful mother, that the colorings were furnished the artist by an intimate friend, and that the completed painting was submitted to the Senator's mother and family for inspection before acceptance.

His mother is what my wife calls a "grand dame." All the Senators and their wives know and love her.

I can only regret that his other intimate friends in Congress like Senators LA FOLLETTE, BORAH, JOHNSON, NORRIS, and others, are not here to do honor to him and you on this memorable occasion.

Bronson Cutting was a statesman. He made few speeches, but all that he made were effective. He was a man who, as we say in America, was born with a silver spoon in his mouth, but his whole career was devoted to the welfare of those not so fortunate. I hope that my friend, the able Congressman from New Mexico, Mr. DEMPSEY, will tell you more of the philanthropic side of his character.

If Divine Providence permitted Bronson Cutting to look down upon the scene of yesterday, it would fill him with happiness.

It is true that neither Senator Cutting nor myself were satisfied with the Hawes-Cutting bill as it was finally enacted. We believed that the transition period should have been 15 years. We believed that the plebiscite should have been placed at the end of this period and not at the beginning.

Neither one of us thought that any tariff should be levied prior to the end of the 10-year period. But as the bill was finally enacted there was a limitation placed on Philippine free exports to the United States during the transition period and an export duty on such goods after the expiration of the first 5 years.

You must know, Mr. President, as do all experienced legislators, that sometimes compromises have to be made in order to secure the passage of a bill.

Senator Cutting and I both knew that the Filipino people could not live with only 5 years within which to work out their world-wide destiny. We knew this, because a strait jacket had been placed upon both the exports and imports of your islands by our Congress. World trade cannot be secured in 5 years.

In conclusion, may I state with some degree of certainty that efforts to curtail the 10-year period of the Tydings-McDuffie Act will fail. I have been informed by the very highest authority in the United States that this period will not be changed.

America, through its Congress, made an offer for independence to the Filipino people to be consummated in 10 years. The Filipino people have accepted that offer. It is in the nature of a contract signed and sealed. It is unthinkable that the contract would be broken.

The time and efforts of your people and my people could be more profitably directed to those events and issues that will occur within the 10-year period.

As both the great Vice President of the United States and the Speaker of the House of Representatives have said, now is the time for unity; for harmony; for loyal support of the first President of the Commonwealth. Now is the time to put aside all personal ambitions and give the best that each one has for the benefit of his country.

Mr. President, knowing you to have a heart filled with grateful sentiments, I know that the photograph of every man who has come upon this pilgrimage of good will will ultimately find its way in Malacanan.

They will be seen with the portraits of past American administrators and those of JOHN GARNER, JOSEPH BYRNS, and the leaders who are here from both parties.

When they are upon your walls, visitors from many portions of the world, seeing them, will say: "This is like a man's home or his office. He has the pictures of his friends." Among those standing out conspicuously, historically and otherwise, will be the portrait of a statesman, a friend of the Filipino people, one of the ablest advocates of Philippine freedom—Bronson Cutting.

Mr. President, on behalf of the members of the congressional delegation who came to witness the inauguration of your Commonwealth, as an expression of their acknowledgment for the kindnesses they have received from you and your people and as proof of their continued interest in your welfare, I have the great honor of presenting to the Philippines this painting of a man for whom you feel sincere affection.

I return to my native land a happy man—an optimist regarding the future of your people. Trials and troubles you will have. But under your able leadership, wisdom, and patriotism I know you will overcome them.

Mr. President, "Mabuhay."

WHY NOT A PLEBISCITE?—EDITORIAL FROM WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a brief editorial from a leading daily newspaper of Washington, D. C., the Washington News, entitled "Why Not a Plebiscite?"

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Daily News of Thursday, Jan. 16, 1936]

WHY NOT A PLEBISCITE?

The will to power is inherent in human nature and in government.

That fundamental fact was recognized when our Nation was created on a check-and-balance concept. The tendency toward concentration of power was thoroughly understood by the founding fathers. Hence, the principle of three branches—executive, legislative, and judicial—coordinate and coequal.

As our history has unfolded there have been times when this, that, or the other branch has pressed for power to the point of unbalance, sometimes executive, sometimes legislative, sometimes judicial. In the emergency of 1933 the weight of power listed sharply in the direction of the Executive. As the emergency became less acute charges of attempted dictatorship began to be heard. Charges that Congress had become a rubber stamp, etc.

Now the Supreme Court is having its inning and complaints against that arise—talk of judicial autocracy.

Later it may be against the legislative branch.

But always, when there is a real or an apparent lack of equilibrium, the American people become alarmed, and with good reason. They are jealous of the power that they have delegated. For the idea of balance is essential to a democracy's survival.

But in the basic conception of democracy there is one spot where concentration of power is not dangerous but, on the other hand, is desirable; the original source of all power; not legislative, judicial, or executive. That source is the people. From the people democracy gets life. To them, if the theory of democracy is sound in the first place, it is safe to transmit for final decision any question.

We believe that with all the faults and frailties that characterize human beings as individuals the people as a whole, acting in their composite capacity, will come nearer to arriving at absolute right than any other authority, than any individual, legislature, or court.

We believe, therefore, that final power should be reposed in no other hands than those of the people.

And we believe further that in our constitutional democracy, if machinery could be devised for a speedy plebiscite on any great public issue that has reached an impasse, we would solve the problem of undue concentration of power.

We do not presume to suggest how that machinery should be constructed. That is a job for constitution makers and for law makers.

We merely contend that, if we are seeking perfection in democratic government, the idea of the people having the last say is sound.

Might it not be possible for any question of great national importance to be sent back to the people as a whole after it has arrived at stalemate; such, for example, as to A. A. A. or the N. R. A.? Suppose that each of those could be voted on as a separate referendum in the next general election. What would be wrong with that? Wouldn't that be simpler, more direct, fairer, and more in keeping with the very fundamentals of the democratic idea than any other way?

We consider it self-evident that if you can't trust the people you can't trust democracy. Equally, we believe that if such issues as those mentioned were passed on by the final power and the veto sustained or overruled there could be no complaint left in a democracy.

We may, in all this, appear to be groping. We are. But we sincerely believe that we are dealing with an idea that is basic and one which, if it could be practically applied, would solve a governmental difficulty which is becoming more and more puzzling and onerous and hazardous as our society becomes more and more complex.

We foresee that the first contention will be that we already have the plebiscite in the constitutional amendment method. Theoretically, yes. Practically, no—in some situations—because of the time element; because the patient dies while you are going for the doctor.

SANCTIONS AND NEUTRALITY—ADDRESS BY BERNARD M. BARUCH

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask that there be printed in the RECORD an address by Mr. Bernard M. Baruch, a well-known economist, statesman, and financier, on the subject Sanctions and Neutrality, in a broadcast over the Columbia network on Thursday, November 7, 1935. Mr. Baruch was Chairman of the War Industries Board during the World War and later a member of the Supreme Economic Council of the Paris Peace Conference.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen, much talk is to be heard these days of economic sanctions, of neutrality, and of related subjects. These are matters fraught with deep importance to all the world and especially to America. I shall here attempt briefly certain definitions, on the principle that we cannot act intelligently without being first intelligently informed. My experience as Chairman of the United States War Industries Board during the great conflict, and my preoccupation with kindred subjects, such as "taking the profit out of war", since then, may qualify me for this discussion. Let me add this thought at the outset: The definitions I lay down do not imply their advocacy; I submit them for such value as they may have in building a background before action is taken.

What happens to a nation and its people when economic sanctions are enforced such as are about to be leveled against Italy by members of the League? What happens to the trade and commerce of the nations engaged in the boycott? Economic sanctions are in effect a stoppage of all trade and finance between Italy and those in the boycott against her. Many question the ability to force an economic boycott without such nations as Germany, Switzerland, Austria, and others contiguous to Italy. But the boycotting nations can enforce their regulations by allowing those nations not in the boycott only such things as they were used to buying under normal conditions.

In other words, a system of quota is applied to those countries not joining in the boycott. Otherwise materials would flow into Italy from those nonboycotting countries in almost as great volume as that which had previously been sent from all the other countries together. The one country that could break down this boycott is the United States, which could sell to Italy, or to a country like Germany (which is not associated in the boycott), enough things to prevent an effectual application of the economic sanctions.

Let us try to visualize what happens in a boycotted nation. To be practical, let us discuss what would happen to Italy. Remember, there is no buying, selling, or moving of materials into or out of the country by land, sea, or air. It must, like a beleaguered city, live upon itself. Each person within the nation must adjust himself to the changed condition as if the nation were cut off entirely from the rest of the world, as it would be. Italian ships would have no place to sail to. There would be no cargoes coming in or going out. Ships could be used only as transports. Fishing could go on only within her own waters. An economic boycott engaged in by every country in the world would be as completely effective as an absolutely tight blockade by warships.

The state will have to take over and deal out everything. The more self-contained a nation is the less the privation, but even a nation like the United States would feel any blockade undertaken by the rest of the world. What, then, happens to a country like Italy, without adequate resources or any supply of the necessities of life to keep up the standards of living? She produces no coal, no copper, no cotton, no rubber, no tin, no oil, no gasoline, practically no raw materials, no coffee, no tea. She must import large quantities of wheat, meat, sugar, etc. The condition of her citizens in 90 days would commence to be pitiable. And all the time the supplies for some 300,000 troops over 2,000 miles away through unfriendly seas and countries would have to go on. In these circumstances, only by extreme sacrifice and complete militarization could Italy expect to hold out.

When a state takes over the rationing of supplies it must immediately put restrictions upon their use and endeavor to increase substitutes. If a nation is wise, it will plan in advance and certainly take every step to lay up as many supplies as she can before the blockade. Every available space must be used for the planting of food and raw materials must be as jealously husbanded as gold or precious stones, for they mean life itself—and victory.

Not only must the rationing of food, clothing, and raw materials go on but the price of everything must be carefully controlled. Improper hoarding must be watched. All belts would have to be tightened to the last notch.

There are two primary objectives to be gained: First, the feeding and arming of the soldiery; and, second, the feeding and care of the civilians—for without home morale there can be no fighting at the front. The plight of Italy will make plain again the necessity of an organization which will prevent profiteering on civilians, which is even more important than profiteering in armament, although the Senate munitions committee, which recently was sitting, placed most of its emphasis upon the latter danger. The prevention of profiteering against the government appears simple, but preventing profiteering against civilians is just as easy of accomplishment and is a very important part of winning a war.

Even in the World War, with our almost unlimited resources, we found it necessary to restrict the uses of labor, capital, and materials. We found it necessary to draw a line between the essential and less essential industries. We even made regulations limiting the styles and prices of shoes. We called on the makers of men's and women's clothing to discuss the standardization of all forms of dress in order to save materials as well as transportation and labor. It was the needs of the civilians that prompted many of the recommendations I made as a witness before the Senate committee.

With careful planning much can be done to prolong the ability of a nation to sustain itself against the world, provided it has within itself:

a. The elements of water and food in sufficient quantities.

b. Materials for defense purposes.

Scrap and second-hand materials assume great importance. Many materials can be used, recovered, and used over again.

A country which cannot look after its civilians will find itself faced by revolt at home. It is because of this that such stress is laid upon the creation of an organization to regulate the prices civilians would have to pay for things they need, and to see that there was the largest possible production of necessities in order to prevent a break-down in standards of life. It is also necessary to see that common sacrifices are made and that no one shall have more than another.

When a nation realizes that by flying in the face of the good opinion of the rest of the world it may have economic sanctions forced upon it, we may have better prospects for peace in the world. If Italy can be brought to terms by economic pressure, so also can Germany; so also can Japan. Germany is a little more self-contained than Italy, but not much more. Japan is somewhat more self-contained than Germany since her absorption of Chinese territory. Japan must hesitate and must fail in her conquest of China if the rest of the world placed an absolute boycott upon her to the extent of neither buying from nor selling to her. The most important factor in that action would be the United States.

The economic sanctions applied to Italy are the concrete expression of world disapproval. I do not now discuss the soundness of the verdict. I am concerned with its effect. It is a definite test of organized society. It is a cruel, a very cruel, punishment of the Italian citizens. If the sanction principle succeeds, the world will have found a new way to keep peace without the bloodshed that seemed necessary before this was attempted. Only the wholly mad will fly in the face of world opinion; will ignore treaty obligations; will assert the selfish right of the one against the enlightened good of the many. Behind the present diplomatic moves lies more than merely the Italo-Ethiopian dispute. Britain and France see the shadow of European conflict; they see a new and powerful Germany threatening the peace of the world.

And now we come to the second phase: Neutrality. Economic sanctions are part of the program of the League of Nations, to which we do not belong. Our role will be that of a neutral, not participating, at least not officially, in the application of the sanctions. But we have already a formula of action, tending to show a sympathetic attitude toward the movement against Italy, in the President's proclamation on neutrality.

Once more that which all men swore should never happen again is happening. Once more war is here.

Once more our beloved America is facing the ever-present danger of involvement.

But this time we shall escape, which proved impossible 18 years ago.

We must finally, firmly, and unalterably make up our minds that we are to stay out. We must resist all blandishment and avoid all embarrassment. That is to be done, not merely by a declaration of neutrality but by creating a state of mind that shall be closed and immovable. That way lies our salvation.

The reason that neutrality is not enough is due to the fact that the word is hard to define and even harder to enact.

The difficulties attendant upon our adventure into neutrality are almost insurmountable. What is neutrality? How shall it be observed? What goods are to be listed as contraband? Should we be content by proscribing the shipment of actual weapons of war or should we go full length and embargo the shipment of any single commodity that has a contribution to make toward the life of a belligerent? It is easy to say rifles, cannon, shot, and shell are to be embargoed, but what of cotton? What of oil? of copper? of food? I discuss these now from the standpoint of the nonbelligerent, while previously I considered them from Italy's position.

We have made a significant start toward our goal but I would not have you think that I am so completely a dreamer that I stand ready to urge our country into a complete neutrality regardless of the action of the other nations. I submit that such an action, which has as its purpose the attainment of justice and decency, should be participated in by every nonbelligerent. But I am sufficiently crass to say that if cotton is to be sold to a country from which it may find its way into the hands of a belligerent, then America should have the right to sell that cotton unless and until every other country agrees to withhold its supply. And so, too, with every other staple. Look at other countries who are selling, or who have sold, munitions and other supplies to both Italy and Ethiopia. Why should we continue to be the great international "fat boy", at whose stick of candy other nations take an unwelcome bite?

But we should always keep in mind the ever-present danger that strict neutrality carried to its ultimate end is almost certain to result in war because, in itself, it becomes an act of war. This may be questioned by the casuists but it is susceptible of easy and practical demonstration.

It would be best to avoid all danger of embroilment; for, once at war, the cost in the lives of our youth would be incalculable. It would be better to forego dollar profits and escape that cost. But if business of any sort is to be done by our people with a belligerent or with a neutral who is a cover for a belligerent, then it must be wholly at the risk of the individual, with absolutely no national protection to his enterprise. If the profits go to him, then he must risk all the losses. If we sell, let those we sell to come and get it. Let theirs be all the risk, since their action created the danger. Let us avoid the danger of embroilment; let us preserve peace, but—let us keep our powder dry.

PUBLIC HOUSING

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution on public housing adopted by the United States Conference of Mayors in annual conference in Washington on November 20, 1935.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution on public housing adopted by the United States Conference of Mayors in annual conference, Washington, November 20, 1935

Whereas there has been a great deal of public attention to the question of a public housing program, though relatively little has been accomplished on such a program; and

Whereas an extensive housing plan on a Nation-wide scale would give strength and stability to the economic structure of the Nation; and

Whereas numerous surveys and studies of housing conditions throughout the country indicate the growing shortage and congestion in housing facilities; and

Whereas the disgraceful conditions in city slums and country hovels have a directly detrimental effect on the social well-being of these areas and the surrounding communities; and

Whereas it is obvious that the Federal Government must assume the financing of such self-liquidating projects through loans or investments and low interest rates: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the United States Conference of Mayors does hereby urge upon Congress and the President the vital importance of this problem and the need for a well-coordinated and extensive housing program for the so-called low-income group, where desired and the need exists; and further

That the United States Conference of Mayors lend its assistance to the preparation and realization of such a program which will be substantially financed by the Federal Government, though in the interest of economy and efficiency the responsibility for the administration of the specific projects of the program be in the hands of the local authorities where so desired.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

The VICE PRESIDENT. According to the order of the Senate, the Chair lays before the Senate House bill 9870.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9870) to provide for the immediate payment of World War adjusted-service certificates, for the cancelation of unpaid interest accrued on loans secured by such certificates, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That notwithstanding the provisions of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended (U. S. C., 1934 edition, title 38, ch. 11), the adjusted-service certificates issued under the authority of such act are hereby declared to be immediately payable. Payments on account of such certificates shall be made in the manner hereinafter provided upon application therefor to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and upon surrender of the certificates and all rights thereunder (with or without the consent of the beneficiaries thereof). The payment in each case shall be in an amount equal to the face value of the certificate, except that if, at the time of application for payment under this act, the principal and unpaid interest accrued prior to October 1, 1931, with respect to any loan upon any such certificate has not been paid in full by the veteran (whether or not the loan has matured), then the Administrator shall (1) pay or discharge such unpaid principal and interest as is necessary to make the certificate available for payment under this act, (2) deduct such unpaid principal and so much of such unpaid interest as accrued prior to October 1, 1931, from the amount of the face value of the certificate, and (3) certify to the Secretary of the Treasury as payable an amount equal to the difference between the face value of the certificate and the amount so deducted.

SEC. 2. In the case of each loan heretofore made pursuant to law by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs and/or by any national bank, or any bank or trust company incorporated under the laws of any State, Territory, possession, or the District of Columbia, upon the security of an adjusted-service certificate, any interest unpaid accrued subsequent to September 30, 1931, that has been or, in consequence of existing law, would be charged against the face value of such certificate shall be canceled insofar as the veteran is concerned, notwithstanding any provision of law to the contrary. Any interest on any such loan payable to any such bank or trust company shall be paid by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs.

In the case of any such loan which is unpaid and held by a bank or trust company at the time of filing an application under this act, the bank or trust company holding the note and certificate shall, upon notice from the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, present them to the Administrator for payment to the bank or trust company in full satisfaction of its claim for the amount of unpaid principal and unpaid interest, except that if the bank or trust company, after such notice, fails to present the certificate and note to the Administrator within 15 days after the mailing of the notice, such interest shall be paid only up to the 15th day after the mailing of such notice.

SEC. 3. (a) An application under this act for payment of a certificate may be made and filed at any time before the maturity of the certificate (1) personally by the veteran, or (2) in case physical or mental incapacity prevents the making or filing of a personal application, then by such representative of the veteran and in such manner as may be by regulations prescribed. An application made by a person other than a representative authorized by such regulations shall be held void.

(b) If the veteran dies after the application is made and before it is filed, it may be filed by any person. If the veteran dies after the application is made, it shall be valid if the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs finds that it bears the bona fide signature of the applicant, discloses an intention to claim the benefits of this act, and is filed before payment is made to the beneficiary. If the death occurs after the application is filed but before the receipt of the payment under this act, or if the application is filed after the death occurs but before mailing of the check in payment to the beneficiary under section 501 of the World War Adjusted-Compensation Act, as amended, payment under this act shall be made to the estate of the veteran irrespective of any beneficiary designation. If the veteran dies without making a valid application under this act, no payment under this act shall be made. If the veteran dies on or after the passage of this act without having filed an application under section 1, in making any settlement there shall be deducted on account of any loan made on an adjusted-service certificate only interest accruing prior to October 1, 1931.

(c) Where the records of the Veterans' Administration show that an application, disclosing an intention to claim the benefits of this act, has been filed and the application cannot be found, such application shall be presumed in the absence of affirmative evidence to the contrary, to have been valid when originally filed.

(d) If at the time this act takes effect a veteran entitled to receive an adjusted-service certificate has not made application therefore he shall be entitled, upon application made under section 302 of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended, to receive, at his option, under such rules and regulations as the Administrator may prescribe, either the certificate under section 501 of such act, as amended, or payment under this act.

SEC. 4. The amount certified pursuant to section 1 of this act shall be paid to the veteran or his estate on or after June 15, 1936, by the Secretary of the Treasury by the issuance of bonds of the United States, registered in the name of the veteran only, in denominations of $50 or multiples thereof having a total face value up to the highest multiple of $50 in the amount certified as due the veteran, and the difference between the amount certified as due the veteran and the face amount of the bonds so issued shall be paid to the veteran or his estate by the Secretary of the Treasury out of the fund created by section 505 of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended. The bonds shall be dated June 15, 1936, and shall mature on June 15, 1945, but shall be redeemable at the option of the veteran or his estate at any time, at such places, including post offices, as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate. Such bonds shall be issued under the authority and subject to the provisions of the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, and shall not be transferable, assignable, subject to attachment, levy, or seizure under any legal or equitable process and shall be payable only to the veteran or, in case of death or incompetence of the veteran, to the representative of his estate. Interest on each bond issued hereunder shall accrue at the rate of 3 percent per annum from June 15, 1936, to date of maturity or payment of the principal of the bond, whichever is earlier, and will be paid with such principal: Provided, however, That no interest will be paid on any bond redeemed prior to June 15, 1937. The provisions of this section shall be carried out subject to regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury to be issued from time to time to effectuate the purposes of this act.

SEC. 5. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to redeem from the United States Government life-insurance fund all adjusted-service certificates held by that fund on account of loans made thereon, and to pay to the United States Government life-insurance fund the amount of the outstanding liens against such certificates, including all interest due or accrued, together with such amounts as may be due under subdivision (m) of section 502 of the World War Compensation Act, as amended. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to make such payment by issuing, to the United States Government life-insurance fund, bonds of the United States which shall bear interest at the rate of 4½ percent per annum. No such bonds shall mature or be callable until the expiration of a period of at least 10 years from date of issue, except that any such bond shall be redeemed by the Secretary of the Treasury and the principal and accrued interest thereon paid to the United States Government life-insurance fund at any time upon certification by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs that the amount represented by such bond is required to meet current liabilities. Bonds issued for the purposes of this section shall be issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, subject to the provisions of this section.

SEC. 6. The adjusted-service certificate fund is hereby made available for payments authorized by this act.

SEC. 7. Notwithstanding the provisions of Public Law No. 262, Seventy-fourth Congress, approved August 12, 1935, no deductions on account of any indebtedness of the veteran to the United States, except on account of any lien against the adjusted-service certificate authorized by law, shall be made from the adjusted-service credit or from any amounts due under the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended, or this act.

SEC. 8. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 9. If any provision of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of the act and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

SEC. 10. This act may be cited as the Adjusted Compensation Payment Act, 1936.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief statement explaining this bill and pointing out the differences between it and the bill recently passed by the House of Representatives, known as the Vinson bill.

The bill passed by the House provides for full cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates. It cancels all interest charges. The bill reported by the Senate Finance Committee, and now before the Senate, was substituted for the Vinson bill without a dissenting vote in the Finance Committee, the vote being 18 to 0.

The bill now before the Senate as a substitute for the so-called Vinson bill provides for the full payment of the adjusted-service certificates, but it differs from the Vinson bill in that it provides for the payment in bonds in denominations of $50 or multiples thereof, the bonds to be issued as of June 15 this year and to carry an interest rate of 3 percent. These bonds are collectible at any time after issuance at post offices in the United States or at any other convenient place, under such rules as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. If a bond dated as of June 15, 1936, and maturing June 15, 1945, should be collected 1 year after date and the cash obtained thereon at full face value before June 15, 1937, no interest would be collectible thereon. If the bond should be collected after June 15, 1937, the interest accumulated on the bond would be collectible. That is one of the main differences between the two bills. If there should remain an odd amount, less than $50, over and above the face value of the bonds, the odd amount would be paid in cash by check.

The other difference between the bill passed by the House and the bill reported by the Finance Committee is with respect to interest. As I have said, the so-called Vinson bill passed by the House cancels all interest. The substitute reported by the Finance Committee cancels only the interest which has accrued since September 30, 1931.

It will be recalled that in the various bills which have been introduced—the so-called Patman bill and other bills before the Congress, that the interest charges to be canceled were those which had accrued subsequent to September 30, 1931. The Vinson bill passed by the House sought to or did cancel all interest charges accruing since the passage of the adjusted-service-certificate law.

There is only one other difference between the bill as it passed the House and the Senate substitute, and I believe these differences cover all the differences between the two measures. If an ex-sevice man holding an adjusted-service certificate owed the H. O. L. C. or the Federal land bank or any other agency of the Government any money, there is some doubt under the law whether, before the bond could be issued or the cash could be paid, the lien thus created against the certificate must be cleared up. That did not appear to the Senate Finance Committee to be fair, and we changed the text of the House bill in that respect, so that now only those liens where the adjusted-service certificates have been put up as collateral are to be paid off and cleared by the Government. In other words, if an ex-service man holding an adjusted-service certificate is indebted to the Federal land bank for $300 or to the H. O. L. C. for $400, that would have no effect at all on his getting his money on his adjusted-service certificate. But if he had put up his adjusted-service certificate as collateral security with this fund in the hands of the Government or at some bank, then that indebtedness must be cleared before he can obtain his bonds.

It is believed by the members of the Finance Committee who heard the testimony presented to us by the heads of the veterans' organizations that the Senate substitute is a better bill for the ex-service men than the bill as it passed the House. They do not believe, as others contend, that as soon as the veterans obtain their bonds they will cash them in full. They believe that this method will be an encouragement to the ex-service man to hold his bonds and to cash in only those which may be necessary for his living expenses, and so forth.

It is difficult to say how much money will be needed immediately because no one can tell how many of the ex-service men are going to take their bonds as soon as they get them and cash them in full. Of course, one person's guess is as good as another's on that question.

The heads of the ex-service men's organizations believe this plan will be an encouragement to the ex-service men to hold on to at least a part of their bonds, and that it will diminish the demands on the Treasury of the United States more than if provision were made for full cash payment at this time.

Mr. President, since the question has been before the Senate so often and so long, I hope that we may hurry along without other matters being injected to delay consideration and final disposition of the bill. Of course, we have no desire to stop anyone from speaking on the bill as long as he wishes and having free and full discussion on it, because that is an old democratic principle.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. Is not the Senator going to tell the Senate what additional gratuity is granted to the veterans under this bill, and the additional obligation of the Government to the veterans? I thought that was a very important part of the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. I shall gladly answer any question the Senator wishes to propound to me.

Mr. COUZENS. I have asked the Senator if he would not tell the Senate what is the additional gratuity to the veterans under this bill, and how it differs from the existing law.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, under the law as enacted in 1924 the adjusted-service certificates were given to these men. I thought all were familiar with that fact. That is why I did not desire to trespass on the time of the Senate by going into great detail in presenting the matter. Those certificates were based upon the length of service of the veterans at home and abroad. If a man served so many days at home, he got a certificate for $1 a day for that length of time. If he served so many days abroad, he received a certificate on the basis of $1.25 per day. On that basis the calculations were made, and 25 percent was added. Some have said that was because of the delay in giving the soldiers their money and others contend differently.

On the basis just stated the adjusted-service certificates were issued, drawing 4 percent interest to be compounded annually, giving the veterans the safety of a life-insurance provision falling due some 20 years hence. If the certificates were issued in January 1925 they would fall due in 1945. It has always been my contention that the adjusted-service certificates were not now due and would not be due under the law until they reached their date of maturity. But we all know what the situation is, and accordingly, under the provisions of the bill now before us, provision has been made to take care of the veterans 9 years ahead of time to the extent of the full cash value.

Of course, the 4-percent interest has entered into the calculation. The veterans get that under this plan earlier than under the provisions of the law enacted in 1924. Under that act the maturity value of the outstanding certificates is $3,456,000,000. To that should be added the amount of the interest to be canceled, $263,000,000. The value of the adjusted-service-certificate fund as of June 15, 1936, is $1,482,000,000. At the present time the value of that fund is only $1,471,000,000. The amount due the veterans in bonds is, therefore, $1,836,000,000, and the amount due the veterans in cash would be $87,000,000 because of the bonds being issued in denominations of $50 or in multiples thereof. The amount due the United States Government life-insurance fund is $507,000,000, and the amount due the banks, where adjusted-service certificates have been deposited as collateral, is $60,000,000. The total amount is $2,491,000,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. Answering the inquiry of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], is it not true that the present bill, using his term of "additional gratuity", carries with it only an additional gratuity in the sense that a certain part of the interest chargeable to the ex-service man is remitted, and that those who hold their bonds until 1945 or until any other date subsequent to June 15, 1937, will draw 3-percent interest on the amount which they hold in deferred payments, except that they are paid now instead of having to wait until 1945, which may or may not be considered an additional gratuity?

Mr. COUZENS. If the Senator is answering the question which I propounded to the chairman of the committee I should like to ask what he considers the difference between the present-day value of the certificates and their value at maturity, which, of course, is a gratuity.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator ask me that question?

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator from Kentucky undertook to answer the question for the chairman, and I thought he might know more about it.

Mr. HARRISON. It is something over a billion dollars.

Mr. BARKLEY. Figuring it on that basis the present cash-surrender value of the certificates would be payable 9½ years from now. From that standpoint it might be considered a gratuity.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield for a statement in that connection?

Mr. HARRISON. Let me give the Senator from Michigan the figures. It is the difference between $3,760,000,000 and $2,420,000,000.

Mr. BLACK. Now will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. I asked the Senator to yield because I think it is proper at this time to place in the RECORD and call attention to the fact that there is a difference, as the Senator from Michigan states, between the present value of these certificates and the amount which will be paid.

The original certificate, however, was based on payment about 7 years after the services were performed. At the last session of Congress I placed in the RECORD a table which had been prepared by the Veterans' Administration showing what would have been the actual value of the certificates if payment had been made at the time the services were performed. If the certificates had been issued on the basis of payment at the time the services were performed, and a reasonable rate of interest had been added on account of the deferred nature of the payments, the amount would have been such as to make these obligations now past due. So that it is not simply a question of the certificate as it appears at the present time; but if we go behind that, and consider that payment was due when the services were performed, it makes quite a different situation, and there is no gratuity in that connection.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield at that point?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. If Senators will look in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 19, 1924, they will find a letter addressed to the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], signed by the legislative representatives of the American Legion, saying that they did not want cash; they wanted the bill to go through as proposed, providing for the adjusted-compensation certificates. The view I take is that if we enter into a contract with the veterans as agreed upon by themselves, and as stated in the records of 1922, when the matter was being debated and discussed, there is no reason for changing the contract at this time.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senator from Mississippi, but the remark has been made so often that the present adjusted-compensation certificate represents a contract that I cannot allow it to go unchallenged.

Of course, there was no contract between the Government and the veterans in the matter of these adjusted-compensation certificates. The Congress, on its own responsibility, enacted a bill not proposed by any veterans' organization or by any group of veterans. The Congress of the United States itself worked out a proposition. The veterans could either take it or leave it. They could either accept it or not accept it. Their acceptance did not constitute any contract. I agree entirely with what the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] has said—that this obligation, if it was an obligation, really accrued at the conclusion of the veteran's service, and if Congress at that time had paid a reasonable cash bonus to equalize the difference in the economic situation of a man who had gone into the service and a man who had stayed out of the service, it would have cost the Government very much less in the long run, and would have settled the question at that time.

The Government at that time, however, preferred to proceed to the immediate reduction of taxes, particularly by taking off the excess-profits tax, and did not see fit at that time to pay to the veterans of the World War an obligation which obviously ran to them. I submit that it is unfair at this late date to come in and say that when Congress on its own terms laid down an adjudication of that matter, which the veterans could either accept or not accept, it amounts to a contract.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. HASTINGS. Before the Senator takes his seat I desire to ask him to make some explanation, if he will, of the difference between this bill and the bill vetoed by the President in May last which makes the Senator from Mississippi feel justified in advocating this bill as against leading the fight on the floor of the Senate in support of the President's veto. If that will not embarrass the Senator, I think it might help the Members of the Senate to some extent.

Mr. HARRISON. Nothing ever embarrasses me. I have gotten used to embarrassment, I may say to the Senator from Delaware. I am very glad the Senator asked me the question, because the Senator is so astute, he is so smart, that he knows very well the great differences between the bill that was submitted to the President last year and the one now being considered.

The Senator will recall that the so-called Patman bill was an inflationary measure; and if the Senator will read the President's remarks he will see that one of the strong points made in the President's veto message was related to the inflationary character of that proposal.

The Senator knows that this is a very simple way of paying to these men their adjusted-service compensation, in the form of these bonds. The Senator must know that not all of the men will cash in the bonds; but the good wife will use her good offices to try to influence the husband to hold back, for a rainy day, many of these $50 bonds, in order to provide the family a sustenance, and so forth. The Senator knows that few men can get away from the wiles and the influences of a good wife and the children that will bring about that result, and that that will greatly aid the Government in financing this measure.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. HASTINGS. In the first place, I desire to know whether that is the principal difference between the two bills. Secondly, let me call the attention of the Senator to this fact: I realize that many persons voted against the bill in 1935 because of its inflationary feature; but my clear recollection is that when we sought here to substitute the Vinson bill, which carried with it the ordinary method of financing, as against the Patman bill, the Senator from Mississippi voted for the Patman bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes. I do not recall how the Senator from Delaware voted on that question.

Mr. HASTINGS. So, while many Senators could explain the matter upon that ground, it seemed to me the Senator from Mississippi could not.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to ask the Senator from Delaware how he voted when the issue was between the Patman bill and the Vinson bill.

Mr. HASTINGS. I voted to substitute the Vinson bill for the Patman bill.

Mr. HARRISON. So the Senator certainly will vote for this measure at this time.

Mr. HASTINGS. Not by any means. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. Would the Senator have voted, on the final passage of the bill, for the Vinson bill?

Mr. HASTINGS. I would not; no. I am not talking about whether or not I am embarrassed. I am asking the Senator from Mississippi to explain his position.

Mr. HARRISON. I am not embarrassed.

Mr. HASTINGS. No; I see the Senator is not, but it seems to me he ought to be. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. Well, I am not. I will say to the Senator that no question which has come before Congress during the past few years has given us all so much concern as has the question of the payment of these adjusted-service certificates. I have not believed that they should be paid until the time when they were due; but a great majority of persons, in my opinion—whether because of propaganda or change of opinion in some way or other, I do not know—now believe that the matter should be gotten out of the way.

I have worked hard to try to compose differences here, so that the President and the Senate and the House could all get together and get this question out of the way. I have never believed that the question ought to become a political one. I do not believe today it should become a political one; but I cannot for the life of me see why, at every session of Congress, this question should bob up. It has strength not only in the House but in the Senate and throughout the country; and in the interest of the country and of all concerned, I believe we should get together upon it.

In order to have that done, and get this matter behind us, I introduced at the last session of Congress a compromise bill which, in my opinion, would have received the approval of the President of the United States. I was sorry that the Congress did not at that time enact it. The Committee on Finance recommended it, but we could not secure its passage, and the whole proposal lost out because the President did not accept the bill which was finally passed by the Congress.

I do not know whether or not the President will sign this bill, if it should be presented to him. The President of the United States, in my opinion, has made no statement to anyone about it; but I know that there is a great difference between the bill now being considered by this body and the one which went to the President last time, and which he vetoed. I cannot let the occasion pass without offering my congratulations upon obtaining some reconciliation of this question to the distinguished Senators I see around me, all of whom, with rare exception, have tried to bring about some adjustment of this question.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] have worked in season and out of season with the ex-service organizations and others in order that we might become reconciled. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and I have tramped our way to the White House and into the offices of our colleagues here in order that we might adjust differences on this question and get it behind us. I say to Senators today that in my opinion, whether or not the bill shall be signed by the President, it will become the law, because it is the best possible way for us to get out of the situation, it is in a great measure fair to the ex-service men, and it imposes a lighter and easier burden upon the Treasury.

Mr. HASTINGS, Mr. SHIPSTEAD, and Mr. COUZENS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HARRISON. I will yield to the Senators from Minnesota and Michigan, but first I yield further to the Senator from Delaware. I may not have answered his question.

Mr. HASTINGS. I wanted to inquire of the Senator whether he considers there is any very substantial difference between the pending bill and the bill passed in 1935, except the inflationary feature of it, which he mentioned a while ago.

Mr. HARRISON. The bond feature is the great difference. It is all the difference in the world, because the enactment of the so-called Patman bill would have started the printing presses to work. Its proponents said it was inflationary; others who stood for it said it was inflationary; and I wish to pause to say that the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], even though he believed in his proposal, believes now that the pending bill ought to be passed, because he knows he cannot get the other one passed.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I have just now had opportunity to look at the pending bill. I notice the bonds will be due in 1945.

Mr. HARRISON. The bonds are to be payable at any time after they are issued, and they are to be issued as of June 15, 1936.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Can the Senator tell us what percentage of the outstanding Federal debt will be due within the next 5 or 10 years?

Mr. HARRISON. There are five and a half billion dollars to be refunded within the next 17½ months.

Mr. HASTINGS. Five billion eight hundred million dollars.

Mr. HARRISON. I was speaking in round figures; it may be the figure the Senator states.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. About 50 percent of the outstanding Federal debt, short- and long-term securities, will be due within the next 10 years?

Mr. HARRISON. I think that is quite true.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Did the committee take that into consideration?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I think the committee took everything into consideration, and I may say that while there are other great committees in the Senate, I do not believe there is any committee that is any better, or composed of more conscientious men who look into every side of a question, than the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I agree with what the Senator says about the Committee on Finance; therefore I shall ask him another question: Is it the sense of the Finance Committee that the pending bill is not an inflationary bill?

Mr. HARRISON. It may be indirectly, of course. If $2,000,000,000 of the bonds shall be cashed in, or if a billion or five hundred million of the bonds shall be cashed in, to that extent, of course, it is inflationary.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. All debts are inflationary, indirectly.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I think every time there is a spending of money, it has a tendency toward inflation.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. In the opinion of the Senator, that is a perfectly orthodox doctrine?

Mr. HARRISON. In my opinion, the bill is a very sound bill, worked out in this way.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator said he and the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the distinguished leader on the other side, tramped backward and forward to the White House many times to straighten out differences. Evidently the Senators went to the White House in order to get the President's approval of the bill. I do not ask the Senator to commit himself as to whether he did get the President's approval.

Mr. HARRISON. I stated that I did not know whether the President would approve it or disapprove it.

Mr. COUZENS. I say, the Senators made every effort to get his approval. Of course, in view of the President's statement before the meeting of the joint Houses of Congress, when he said, "We will not retreat", and the statement I heard him over the radio make at the Jackson Day dinner, that "We will not retreat", it seems to me that, taking the President's pronouncements in good faith, he cannot retreat on this bonus question and sign the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. That is the Senator's view, and I know he conscientiously entertains that view. I think the President can very easily sign the bill, and I hope very much that he will sign it. But if he fails to sign the bill, the bill, in my opinion, will become law, notwithstanding his veto.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its reading clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 1016. An act to empower the health officer of the District of Columbia to authorize the opening of graves, and the disinterment and reinterment of dead bodies, in cases where death has been caused by certain contagious diseases;

S. 2013. An act to provide for the issuance of a license to practice the healing art in the District of Columbia to Dr. Pak Chue Chan;

S. 2434. An act for the relief of George W. Hallowell, Jr.; and

S. 2939. An act to provide for the issuance of a license to practice the healing art in the District of Columbia to Dr. Ronald A. Cox.

SECRET TREATIES DURING WORLD WAR

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I regret that it becomes necessary for me to delay for a single moment the continued consideration of the so-called bonus bill, which I am hoping to see enacted into law at the first possible moment. But occurrences of yesterday make it rather necessary that I inflict myself upon the Senate to the extent of remarks which I feel are most emphatically called for.

For a matter of approximately 18 months a special committee has been conducting an inquiry for the Senate into the general munitions question. During these months when the committee has functioned earnestly along lines it believed were authorized by the resolution of the Senate, its field of study has been one in which many pitfalls at one time or another threatened the committee. It has been the surprise of my life that there has not been earlier concentration of effort in the direction of embarrassing or ending the committee's work. A committee cannot turn over such ground as our Munitions Committee has turned without expecting much bitter opposition and criticism. Yet, on the whole, I think we have been exceedingly fortunate in having encountered as little of this as we have.

Gun makers, poison-gas manufacturers, aircraft producers, shipbuilders, munitions salesmen, and powder makers have come and gone. Many of them were with large influence and were within themselves powerful, but their testimony was recorded without serious criticism from any quarter. I am not meaning to say that our committee is not accustomed to objections to our effort, for we are quite that. But as a general thing, there has not been that serious, centered opposition which every member of the committee at its inception contemplated would exist. But on Tuesday of last week the committee commenced hearings involving the files and testimony of the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. Thus early one could sense, and did sense, a hostile spirit in some quarters. These quarters were rather confined to editorial rooms in certain of our daily press. As a general thing, the press was carrying from day to day impartial news reports of the developments before the committee, but the editorial pages were continuously affording a very false picture of the purpose and the intent of the committee in its immediate field of operation. Evidently in the minds of some editorial writers the committee was treading upon sacred ground; and where such loyal forces as the house of Morgan were concerned, mere congressional committees should not undertake to tread or to call it a field for their operation or their questioning. There was naught for the committee or its individual members to do but ignore this very evident hostility through all of last week and the early part of this week. Yet one could not help but feel that this hostility was only the signal for a larger outburst that might prove disquieting and that might threaten the continued work of the committee, which has been striving earnestly to bring its hearings to an end during the first week of February.

Yesterday, while a ponderous voice on the floor of this Chamber was demanding to know where the junior Senator from North Dakota was and why he was not present to feed upon the eloquence of the owner of that voice, I, concerning whom he was inquiring, was presiding at a hearing of the Munitions Committee over in the Senate Office Building. Word came to me there that the Senator from Texas was about to address himself to a subject in which I would certainly be interested. Finding myself alone of committee members at our hearing at the moment and knowing of the views of the junior Senator from Texas upon the general work of our committee by reason of earlier expressions by him on the floor of the Senate, I rather felt that the occasion was hardly one calling for adjournment of the hearings and dismissal of the witnesses who were here from New York at an expense that ought to be terminated as soon as the committee could make it possible. I concluded that if the Senator from Texas had things to say which required answer that opportunity to answer would be afforded on another day. Then came an additional urging to come on to the floor of the Senate. At the same moment my very good friend and colleague upon the Munitions Committee the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] was advised that his presence was needed on the floor of the Senate as well, and knowing that Missouri's senior Senator would be present on the floor, I could well be satisfied that whatever was said requiring explanation or answer would be amply met by him. May I say of him—the Senator from Missouri—at this time, that during these last few days he has had a large hand in the writing of history—history that may not be at once appreciated by America and Americans, but which another day will be basic to any intelligent undertaking looking to the recording of the facts prevalent during some of the most critical days of American history? The Senator from Missouri has contributed so emphatically in this making of history that there must in these hours be great rest and satisfaction in a certain grave where lie the remains of one who dared, back in those history-making hours, courageously uphold the finest traits and traditions which have entered into the making of America's finer historical pages. I have reference to the memory of the distinguished father of Missouri's able and courageous senior Senator.

"Where is the junior Senator from North Dakota; why is he not here?" Well, Mr. President, I do not know, in the light of several statements by my committee colleague, Senator CLARK, on the floor yesterday in answer to the Senator from Texas, why I should be, even at this hour, undertaking any answer to the Senator's argument, unless it be that I am wanting it clear that I am wholly unashamed of such course as has been mine and which appears to have invited the keen displeasure of the goliath statesman from Texas. More than that, I think there are things to be said which ought to be said to the Senate now, and with which the Senate should be thoroughly conversant.

I wish the Members of the Senate had been privileged to be observers in that hearing of the Munitions Committee on yesterday afternoon, at which Mr. Morgan and two of his partners were being heard, when information came that embarrassing speeches and statements were to be made which would probably disrupt and destroy the Munitions Committee.

When the word was flashed about the hearing room, notes began moving around among the witnesses—Mr. Morgan and his partners—notes announcing that there were to be embarrassing statements and embarrassing features which would be very disquieting to the committee. The Senate would have enjoyed, I am sure, the observation of keen and complete satisfaction which encompassed the faces and broadened the breasts of the witnesses. Some on yesterday should have won everlasting gratitude from some people by reason of their courageous course in striving to embarrass the committee. But while that hearing was in progress most eloquent language was being resorted to here in the Senate in a portrayal of one Senator's respect for another. In that eloquence I discern the phrases "coarse, common, insulting"; "puny pygmies"; "infamous." And then, again, I find the Senator from Texas assuming that my proper surrounding would be "some checker-playing, beer-drinking back room of some low house." I have no doubt but what the speech of yesterday containing this language will someday find itself recorded among the famous state papers of the Nation, and I realize that in undertaking to meet the eloquence of the Senator from Texas I am laboring under grave, if not insurmountable, obstacles and handicaps.

But for the moment, at least, I am going to overlook these choice titles and descriptions. Instead, I should like to deal seriously with what I assume were the serious charges and allegations contained in the Senator's long presentation. Aside from his many paragraphs of loud barking, I do find woven into his address the following four points:

First. That the committee was without right to accept any help in its labors from any of the Federal Government relief set-ups.

Second. That the Munitions Committee was wholly lacking in authority in certain recent avenues of investigation which it has pursued.

Third. That it is far too late and futile for anyone to be inquiring into the causes of our last war.

Fourth, and finally, that an unpardonable sin was that which found me saying during the taking of testimony before our committee on Tuesday that President Wilson and Secretary Lansing had falsified in certain information which they had given the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in 1919.

I desire to meet each of these points separately, distinctly and briefly. But before doing that, I wish to say to the Senator from Texas, and any others interested, that I have no apologies to offer for any comment that I have offered or any course that has been pursued by the Munitions Committee under my chairmanship.

At the outset, permit me to say that the munitions committee has pursued no avenue of investigation during its months of labor without first enjoying the approval of a majority of the members of that committee, consisting of three Republicans and four Democrats. There have been no confidences which I, as chairman, have not been glad and eager at all times to share with every member of the committee who was present at meetings or who made inquiry concerning plans of procedure respecting the many studies which the committee was undertaking. Any member of the committee could know from day to day what program and plan was ahead. Indeed, members of the committee have had opportunity to help shape that program and plan.

THE WILSON FALSIFICATION

Now, let me move to a discussion of what seems to have been the immediate cause for yesterday's eruption with its flow, flow, flow of lavas of brilliant gutter English. It would appear that there was uncompromising resentment over my having declared that certain statesmen falsified concerning a very vital matter. The Senator from Texas insists that I had used the word "lied." Let us look to the record for the exact language used and for the base of consideration. At page 12512 of the transcript of Wednesday's hearings before the Munitions Committee we find the Senator from Missouri conducting the examination of witnesses and building the case which the committee was undertaking to build concerning a matter which must be dealt with frankly and honestly if America ever wants to avoid such pitfalls as proved so inviting 20 years ago. In the course of his examination the Senator from Missouri reached a paper which was one of a very few that the State Department had requested the committee not to use, and reaching that paper and refraining, as obviously was our purpose, from offering it for the record, the Senator from Missouri said:

> At this point, Mr. Chairman, I may say that the committee has taken cognizance of information from official sources which has not yet been released for publication, which I am therefore unable to put into the record, which clearly indicates that before he departed from this country Balfour left with Lansing, Secretary of State, a statement which he had made on foreign policy to the British Imperial War Council. This statement referred at length to the terms of peace to which Britain was committed and the secret treaties.

At this juncture I interrupted the Senator from Missouri and said:

> Senator CLARK, the committee, of course, does have, and has had, access to this particular communication to which you have referred. It seems to me that for the sake of the record it ought to be noted here that by reason of that the committee is informed by the highest possible sources that Secretary Lansing and President Wilson were fully apprised by Balfour of the secret treaties to which Great Britain had been committed; and the record that has been made and is yet to be made will all clearly reveal that both the President and the Secretary falsified concerning this matter, and declared upon occasion that they had no knowledge prior to their visit to the peace conference in Paris—

Of these secret treaties.

To have thus spoken marks me, in the language of the Senator from Texas, as one who ought to be practicing in "some checker-playing, beer-drinking back room of some low house."

I hope the Senate may find interest in a further pursuit of this interesting question of what and when President Wilson and Secretary Lansing knew of the so-called secret treaties which were presented as being the surprise stumbling blocks to a good peace at Versailles. I am sure there can thereafter be knowledge that the committee was not the first to establish record that there had been falsification. By chance there were others in that "some low-down house" of which the Senator from Texas speaks in his usual modest, moderate, and measured language.

It will be accepted without question that the Secretary of State is the chief aide to the President in the conduct of the foreign relations of this country, and that when the Secretary of State speaks or acts on a matter of the foreign relations of the United States he does so in the name of the President of the United States.

The record in regard to the secret treaties which I am concerned in presenting before this body today, which testifies to the accuracy of the statement which I made concerning Wilson and Lansing on Wednesday, January 15, at the Munitions Committee hearings, is here set forth:

As early as May 8, 1915—and all this was before our entry into the war—Ambassador Walter H. Page in London called the attention of the Department of State to the following information concerning the bargain which England, France, and Russia were making with Italy in order to get Italy to join the war on their side. From the volume Foreign Relations With the United States, in its 1915 supplement at page 386, a volume published by the Department of State, I quote from the language used by Ambassador Page in this report:

The foreign editor of the Times, a usually well-informed and trustworthy man, who knows all the principal European statesmen, is just returned from a week in France. He tells me in strictest confidence that England, France, and Russia made a bargain with Italy on April 30 agreeing to cede to Italy very large parts of Austrian territory, some of which has a Slavic population, if Italy comes into the war within a month. This was done without consulting Servia and against her wishes. Italy will soon come in if she keeps her agreement, to be followed by Rumania. I have heard unofficial confirmation of this agreement here.

Meaning, of course, in London. Does this make our Ambassador at London a resident or one who ought to be a resident of the "low down house" referred to by the Senator from Texas?

Early in 1917, when Russia as an ally began to crumble and revolution in Russia was in the offing, our Ambassador in Italy, Thomas Nelson Page, wrote to President Wilson, on January 22, 1917, in regard to the secret commitments which the Allies had made to Russia—remember, now, that this was all before our entry into the war. I quote from that letter:

* * * One thing, however, appears reasonably certain, that Russia has recently been on the verge of making some sort of separate accommodation, if not actually a separate peace, and the whole matter of the Dardanelles and Constantinople has come out in consequence of this fact. As my telegram of yesterday stated, Russia seems to be in a fair way of getting from the other allies a hand sufficiently free to give her a very preponderant position as regards not only eastern and southeastern Europe but even the Orient itself. I draw from this the conclusion that it was necessary to make large concessions to Russia, either to secure her continued cooperation or to make it appear worth while to her to face the conditions in which she finds herself and to put forth extraordinary efforts.

The quotation is from the State Department document known as No. 763.

On that same date, January 22, 1917, Ambassador Page, in Italy, wrote directly to Secretary of State Lansing similar information, which he asked Lansing to show to the President.

Understand the picture, Senators. Here was Europe, here was Great Britain, entering into an understanding with her early Allies and chopping up the map of Europe, dividing the spoils that were to accrue immediately following the end of the war. The point I want to make is that the United States entered that war knowing that those spoils had been agreed upon; and yet we are led to believe by the historians that at the Peace Conference in Versailles in 1919 the news that there had been secret treaties, so-called, came as a bombshell to destroy what appeared to be America's splendid chance to write a fair and reasonable and lasting peace. I now quote from the letter of January 22, written by Ambassador Page in Italy to Secretary Lansing:

* * * That when in the autumn of 1914 the conference of the Allies took place in London at the time, I think it was, when England secured the promise from the Allies that no one would make a separate peace, but that all would stand together to the end. Russia presented Poincare's written engagement—that she should have Constantinople and the Straits—and England had to yield—to secure her engagement not to make a separate peace.

This is from the State Department Document No. 763.

Will we classify Thomas Nelson Page as coming from that low-down house which was referred to yesterday by the Senator from Texas?

Prof. Charles Seymour, who has the custody of the House papers and is more familiar than is any other historian with the documents, papers, and diaries of Col. E. M. House, who was President Wilson's unofficial and confidential adviser in foreign relations and his peace emissary to Europe on various occasions during our neutrality period, has written in volume III of The Intimate Papers of Colonel House, at page 40, as follows:

Colonel House knew of the secret treaties. He had told the President of the Treaty of London before Italy entered the war, and Grey had told him of the demands of Rumania, so that he must have guessed the terms upon which she entered the war.

The Intimate Papers of Colonel House, edited by Professor Seymour, have been public for some years—since 1928, I believe—and the information about the secret treaties disclosed in volume III of that collection has been available to the Senator from Texas if he chose to read it. Because they wrote and consented to have published this work, are Mr. House and Mr. Seymour also to be addressed as coming from that "low-down house"?

Immediately after the entrance of the United States into the war Arthur James Balfour, British Foreign Secretary, headed a mission from England to this country to discuss with the administration problems of cooperation in regard to shipping, finance, and so forth, and at that time the secret treaties were fully discussed with Wilson, House, and Lansing. Colonel House recorded the following in his diary concerning his conference with Balfour:

"This led me to ask", House continued, "what treaties were out between the Allies as to the division of spoils after the war. He said they had treaties with one another, and that when Italy came in they made one with her in which they had promised pretty much what she demanded."

Further on:

"* * * Crossing the Bosphorus we came to Anatolia. It is here that the secret treaties between the Allies come in most prominently. They have agreed to give Russia a sphere of influence in Armenia and the northern part. The British take in Mesopotamia (and the region) which is contiguous to Egypt. France and Italy each have their spheres embracing the balance of Anatolia up to the Straits."

House's comment was:

"It is all bad, and I told Balfour so. They are making it a breeding place for future war * * *." (From The Intimate Papers of Colonel House, vol. III, pp. 44–45.)

A very few weeks following our entry into the World War, on the evening of April 30, 1917, Balfour had his conference with Wilson at the White House, at which Colonel House was also present. Colonel House has recorded the following as to that conference:

The ground we covered was exactly the same as Balfour and I had covered in our conference Saturday. (Intimate Papers of Colonel House, Vol. III, p. 48.)

What was that ground? It was a discussion of these so-called secret treaties dividing the spoils among Britain's allies.

Colonel House spoke of the desirability of giving copies of the Allies' treaties to President Wilson. Balfour agreed to do this, which is also revealed in the Intimate Papers of Colonel House, in volume III, at page 49.

Of this conference with Wilson, Balfour has himself written in his Chapters of Autobiography, page 239, as follows:

A social engagement of singular interest and importance that I fulfilled in Washington soon after my arrival was a dinner of four at the White House, the party consisting of the President, Mrs. Wilson, Colonel House, and myself. From this conversation no subject connected with the war was excluded. We were all absorbed in the problem of successful cooperation, and as this necessarily involved ranging over the immense field at our common interests, a singular unanimity brooded over our friendly discussions. I think the question of the secret treaties were raised by the President after we had left the dinner table. There were no secrets between us, then or afterwards, on any of the many subjects that came up for discussion.

So here is another, Lord Balfour, from that "low-down house."

Further, Balfour and Secretary of State Lansing, discussed for 3 hours every phase of the international situation. The Lansing appointment books in the Manuscript Division of the Library of Congress contain the following entry from May 6, 1917:

At Gunston Hall. Mr. Balfour and Sir Eric Drummond motored down for midday dinner. Spent 3 hours in afternoon going over nearly every phase of the international situation, such as Austria, Bulgaria, Russia, Turkey, China, the relations between the Allies, etc.

Lloyd George, who was Prime Minister of England during this period, has written of the Balfour mission to the United States and the discussion of the secret treaties, as follows:

Mention was made of the various secret treaties which had been concluded with Russia and Italy about territorial changes which it would be the allied purpose to effect if successful, and Mr. Balfour described in detail these agreements and offered repeatedly to supply copies of the treaties to the President. * * * He was obviously anxious not to be informed in writing of the details, as he did not wish to be embarrassed by being "affected with notice."

So Lloyd George, too, comes from that "low-down house", does he?

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the Senator mean to say that Lloyd George was over here and conferred with President Wilson, or does he mean that Lloyd George purported to have made the statement second- or third-hand?

Mr. NYE. He stated what is very well confirmed by the record.

Mr. CONNALLY. What did the Senator mean to say?

Mr. NYE. I meant to say that, in addition to Balfour and others recording in their memoirs the fact that the President and Secretary of State did have knowledge of these secret treaties before and during the early days of our participation in the World War, in this case Lloyd George wrote, of course, of his contact with parties who were present at those conferences.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator knows that Balfour was not here until after we entered the war; he knows that Lloyd George was not here at all; and yet he quotes Lloyd George as authority for something the President said at a secret dinner at the White House.

Mr. NYE. What the Senator is saying of this particular exhibit is perhaps quite true, but it takes its place along with other exhibits, and any fair and open mind that can face the facts will have to acknowledge that the United States had knowledge of these secret treaties before our delegates landed at Versailles.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator said that what I said is "perhaps" true. Is it true or is it perhaps true?

Mr. NYE. Is the Senator asking whether Lloyd George was ever over here?

Mr. CONNALLY. I am asking the Senator from North Dakota this question: He said a moment ago that what I had said about what he has been reading was "perhaps" true. Is it "perhaps" true or is it true?

Mr. NYE. If I remember what the Senator said, he made the point that Lloyd George had never been to the United States. I am ready to agree that is true.

Mr. CONNALLY. And had not talked to Mr. Wilson or Mr. Lansing at the White House?

Mr. NYE. I think that is true.

Mr. CONNALLY. It is not "perhaps" true. It is true, is it not?

Mr. NYE. I do not know whether Lloyd George ever had a conference with President Wilson or Secretary Lansing prior to the peace conference at Versailles, and I have not said that he had.

The Munitions Committee has had access to a document which has not been released for publication or for entry in the official record, a document which was transmitted to Secretary of State Lansing on May 18, 1917, by a high British official. This document is available to any Member of the Senate who will ask the State Department for the privilege of seeing it. The document refers at length to the terms of peace and the secret treaties to which Great Britain and her allies were committed, and the document reveals that there were copies of secret treaties in the files of the State Department here in Washington from those early days.

On July 21, 1917, President Wilson wrote this very important letter to Colonel House.

Mr. GORE. What date?

Mr. NYE. July 21, 1917. The letter reads:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, July 21, 1917.

Mr. EDWARD M. HOUSE,
Magnolia, Mass.

MY DEAR HOUSE: Frankly, I see some very grave possibilities of danger in your plans for an interchange of views about peace between the World and the Tageblatt, particularly if Northcliffe and Tardieu are to be made counsellors in the matter. England and France have not the same views with regard to peace that we have by any means. When the war is over we can force them to our way of thinking, because by that time they will, among other things, be financially in our hands; but we cannot force them now, and any attempt to speak for them or to our common mind would bring on disagreements which would inevitably come to the surface in public and rob the whole thing of its effect. I saw all this too plainly in a conversation with Viviani. If there is to be an interchange of views at all, it ought to be between us and the liberals in Germany, with no one else brought in. Even at that, how is the State Department, or any official agency of the Government going to ask that the Tageblatt be allowed to print what the World says without any interference by the censor without its appearing that what is proposed is really an interchange of views between the German liberals and this Government? I do not think it possible to keep the hand of the administration concealed.

It seems to me that these are very real difficulties and disclose some real dangers. Our real peace terms—those upon which we shall undoubtedly insist—are not now acceptable to either France or Italy (leaving Great Britain for the moment out of consideration).

I have delayed writing you about this deeply important matter until I could think it out; and I must say that I have not been able to think myself on safe ground regarding it. You may have entirely satisfactory replies to make to my objections; but I cannot think of them myself. Will you not write me again? I have thought about it enough now, I think, to promise a prompt reply.

I am writing on the Mayflower, on which Mrs. Wilson and I are seeking a day or two of relief from the madness of Washington. A point is reached now and again when I must escape for a little.

With affectionate messages from us all,

Your grateful friend,

WOODROW WILSON.

I invite particular attention to this language in the letter:

Our real peace terms—those upon which we shall undoubtedly insist—are not now acceptable to either France or Italy (leaving Great Britain for the moment out of consideration),

I repeat the record is undeniably clear that there was knowledge of these secret treaties long before our delegates gathered at Versailles.

I have before me confidential notes from the Lansing memoranda and notes which are held in the Congressional Library in Washington under an arrangement which finds the Library a bit concerned lest any public use be made of the documents found there. I am not going to betray that confidence, but I am going to pass the document to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and hope he will pass it on to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and that ultimately it may reach the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] and that he may see a marked section which comes from Lansing's note dated August 7, 1919. After he has read that, if he can declare that Lansing did not falsify, I fail utterly to understand what would need to be done to prove the case.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator has repeated now and here his statement that President Wilson and Secretary Lansing falsified?

Mr. NYE. I do. Without any malice whatsoever, I do repeat what I said.

Mr. CONNALLY. I did not ask about the malice. The Senator now in the Senate, on his responsibility as a Senator, states unequivocally that President Wilson and Secretary Lansing falsified. Is that correct?

Nr. NYE. Respecting the existence of these secret treaties.

Mr. President, compare this record which I have set forth with the testimony of President Wilson and Secretary Lansing at the hearings on the Treaty of Versailles before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee of the United States in August 1919, and let us judge, each one of us for himself, the testimony of Wilson and Lansing. I quote now from the transcript of that session:

Senator BORAH. * * * When did the secret treaties between Great Britain, France, and the other nations of Europe with reference to certain adjustments in Europe first come to your knowledge? Was that after you had reached Paris also?

The PRESIDENT. Yes; the whole series of understandings were disclosed to me for the first time then.

Senator BORAH. Then we had no knowledge of these secret treaties, so far as our Government was concerned, until you reached Paris?

The PRESIDENT. Not unless there was information at the State Department of which I knew nothing.

* * * * * * *

Senator JOHNSON of California. I think you answered to Senator BORAH the question I am about to ask, so pardon me if it is repetitive. It is this: Was the United States Government officially informed, at any time between the rupture of diplomatic relations with Germany and the signing of the armistice, of agreements made by the Allied Governments in regard to the settlement of the war?

The PRESIDENT. No; not so far as I know.

Senator JOHNSON of California. So far as you are aware, was it unofficially informed during that period?

The PRESIDENT. I would be more clear in my answer, Senator, if I knew just what you were referring to.

Senator JOHNSON of California. I am referring to the so-called secret treaties which disposed of territory among the belligerents.

The PRESIDENT. You mean like the Treaty of London?

Senator JOHNSON of California. Yes; like the London pact.

The PRESIDENT. No; no, sir.

Senator JOHNSON of California. These specific treaties, then—the Treaty of London, on the basis of which Italy entered the war; the agreement with Rumania, in August 1916; the various agreements in respect to Asia Minor, and the agreements consummated in the winter of 1917 between France and Russia relative to the frontiers of Germany, and particularly in relation to the Saar Valley and the left bank of the Rhine—none of these did we (and when I say "we" I mean you, Mr. President) have any knowledge of prior to the conference at Paris?

The PRESIDENT. No, sir. I can confidently answer that "no" in regard to myself.

Lansing, Secretary of State, also denied any knowledge of the secret treaties:

Senator JOHNSON of California. Let me ask you one more question while we are on the subject. You recall that Mr. Balfour was here and addressed the Senate at one time?

Secretary LANSING. Yes.

Senator JOHNSON of California. And that Viviani was here and addressed the Senate?

Secretary LANSING. Yes.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Did either of these gentlemen while here communicate to you any secret treaties that had been executed for the disposition of territory after the war?

Secretary LANSING. Neither of them.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Did either of them on any occasion, either when here or at any other time, communicate to the State Department of the United States any information concerning the treaties that disposed of territory in which the Allies were concerned, the disposition of which was to be made by the peace conference?

Secretary LANSING. None.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield gladly. I wish, however, the Senator would defer his question until I conclude my presentation of the matter.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I merely wish to inquire the date of that hearing.

Mr. NYE. The hearing was in August 1919.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Can the Senator state the day of the month?

Mr. NYE. I am afraid I am unprepared to advise the Senator just now as to the exact date. It was in August of 1919, however.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I am very happy to yield to my colleague from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. Did the Senator from North Dakota have occasion to read in the newspapers of this morning what was evidently a release from the State Department—because it appeared in almost identical terms in several different morning newspapers not using the same press services—notice of release or publication by the State Department of a document called The Policy of the United States Toward Maritime Commerce in War, prepared under the direction of Mr. Carlton Savage?

Mr. NYE. I observed the newspaper reports this morning.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator therefore observed that the statement was made in these releases that while the documents put in the record by the Munitions Committee were authentic and accurate they were not complete, and that this document purports to be a more complete résumé of the documents during the war.

Mr. NYE. Yes; I observed that.

Mr. CLARK. Has the Senator had an opportunity of examining that document?

Mr. NYE. I have not; but I have asked that it be carefully examined.

Mr. CLARK. I may say to the Senator that I have had a very brief and cursory opportunity of examining the document; and such references to other official documents as I find are not in the slightest degree contradictory to the documents put in the record by the Munitions Committee in its hearings, but rather are cumulative, and tend to back up the documents put in the record by the Munitions Committee.

I fail, however, to find in that document, which is held out as a more complete set of documents than that presented by the Munitions Committee, any reference to the document of May 18, 1917, the letter of Arthur James Balfour to the Secretary of State of the United States, with enclosures. It does seem to me—and I ask the Senator's opinion about this—that if the State Department now purports to put out a complete documentation of those events, that document should be included in them. It is undoubtedly within the custody of the State Department. The Munitions Committee has had access to it, but has been unable, by reason of the prohibition of the State Department, to put it into the record. The Munitions Committee has brought no pressure to bear on the State Department to release it; but if the State Department is now releasing a document which it holds out to the public as being a complete documentation of those events, it does seem to me that it should include that all-important document.

Mr. NYE. There could not be any complete showing of that entire record of facts without including that particular document.

Coming back to the denial—the repeated denial—that Lansing and Wilson had knowledge of these secret treaties before they got to Versailles, are there those who hoped and expected that history never would catch up with the facts, or that the facts never would catch up with history? Was there expectation that the cover would forever be kept fast over the truth, and that history would go on falsifying the causes of the failure of the great American effort to win a fine, clean, and lasting peace at Versailles?

O Mr. President, I am hardly prepared, in light of this record, to regret having taken, with the committee, cognizance of this certain document, and helped to make note of it in the record, and certainly the occasion is hardly one calling for an apology for having termed this larger evidence proof of falsification.

It has been urged that irresponsible persons—perhaps "pygmies" was the expression—have been turned loose in the confidential files of the State Department. Let me say here that the only person to examine the State Department files was Miss Josephine Burns, of New York City, an instructor at Mount Holyoke College, who was unknown to the committee or to any of its staff before she came with highest recommendations from State Department officials and from the president of her college. Incidentally, she is a Democrat, and her family have been lifelong Democrats in New York. Every document put into the record was released by the Department of State.

Documents upon which the State Department has withheld permission to release have not found their way into the record of our committee except in one instance, when our error was followed by our most abject apology to the Secretary of State.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield right there?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. NYE. I yield for a question.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator says that none of the documents which the State Department requested the committee not to use were used. Is it not true that a document of that kind was submitted to the committee and that the committee did not print it, but that a Senator—either the Senator from North Dakota or the Senator from Missouri, I shall have to get the record to see which—made the statement that the committee had information from "reliable authority", and then, in substance, stated the contents of that document?

Mr. NYE. Yes; that is a statement of the fact.

Mr. CONNALLY. So the committee did use a document which the State Department asked the committee not to use?

Mr. NYE. The committee did take official note of the document.

Mr. CONNALLY. And put it in the record?

Mr. NYE. No.

Mr. CONNALLY. Not textually, but the committee put the substance of it in the record?

Mr. NYE. No; I will not agree with that.

Mr. CONNALLY. What did the committee put in the record?

Mr. NYE. Let the Senator read the record. He has it in his hand. I have read it this morning.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will read it when the Senator shall have concluded his remarks.

Mr. NYE. I hope the Senator will. By the way, has the Senator read the note of Mr. Lansing which I sent to him?

Mr. CONNALLY. I read what the Senator sent to me.

Mr. NYE. Did the Senator read the particular note to which reference was made?

Mr. CONNALLY. I read the one the Senator had marked. I suppose that is the particular one.

Mr. NYE. Very well. Can the Senator read that and feel that Lansing did not falsify before the Foreign Relations Committee?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will ask the Senator this question: These are the private diaries of Mr. Lansing. I understand that in his will he provided that these notes should not be published until 20 years after his death, and that they are now in the custody of some friend. Will the Senator tell me how he got them?

Mr. NYE. Yes; I think I can tell the Senator how we got them. We got them with the consent of the Library, after approval by the trustees of the Lansing estate.

Mr. CONNALLY. Did the Senator know that Lansing left the injunction not to publish them until 20 years after his death?

Mr. NYE. No; I did not know that. I have never been told that. Many of them have been published.

Mr. CONNALLY. They will all be published if the committee can get hold of them. [Laughter in the galleries.]

Mr. NYE. Many of them were published this fall in the volume entitled "War Memoirs of Robert Lansing." The work is particularly notable for the documents of which he had knowledge that do not find place in those war memoirs.

The Senate has been advised by great constitutional authority that the Munitions Committee has been without authority in its more recent studies in the field of war-making influences; and we hear for the first time that the committee had no right to investigate the Morgan institution.

Has the committee authority to delve into the financial ramifications of the munitions industry? I am not a lawyer, but I will dare to explain the steps by which the committee proceeded, in keeping, I am sure, with the resolution under which it operates.

The attorneys for J. P. Morgan & Co. are Davis, Polk & Wardwell. If John W. Davis, who sat with his witnesses virtually constantly throughout these 10 days of hearings, advised his clients to observe the committee's subpenas, we may take it that the most eminent legal opinion is to the effect that the committee has the necessary authority.

J. P. Morgan & Co. did a business of $3,000,000,000 with companies engaged in the manufacture, sale, and exportation of arms and munitions of war. The record shows that the financing of these munitions companies was such an essential part of the general financing of the belligerents that the belligerents had to meet the terms of certain rifle companies or give up hope of financing themselves here.

Our power, it seems to me, is quite clear.

Has the committee power to follow these financial ramifications further than the first parties to them?

I call attention to the power given to the committee, as shown in section (a), page 2, lines 12 and 13, to investigate "the methods used in promoting or effecting the sale of arms, munitions, and other implements of war."

We hold that no promoting or sale can be done without financing. American sales of arms to Bolivia and to other South American countries in recent years have been dependent upon the success of these countries in raising loans in the United States. Our record shows that European munitions manufacturers trying to get contracts from Poland, Greece, and other countries were dependent upon the fact that investors in their native countries were willing to lend money to the purchasing countries to finance these munitions.

During the World War the sales of arms and munitions were early made dependent—strictly dependent—upon American willingness to finance these sales by loans. The record is clear, beyond the shadow of a doubt, on that point.

The next question arises, How does this financing take place? It takes place by permission of our Government. Our Government saw no objection some years ago to loan to a South American country to pay an arms bill to Vickers, of Great Britain. That loan is now in default. Yet it could have been stopped by our Government.

Similarly, during the World War governmental objection to such loans would have prevented an abnormal boom in war supplies. The Government did object to loans, but allowed credits which Morgan witnesses have told us were practically no different from loans. A year after the war started our Government withdrew its formal objection to loans.

Why did it do so? Under the authority to investigate the methods used in promoting the sale of arms and munitions we found that the traffic had grown so great that our neutrality policy collapsed under the weight of that traffic. The testimony of the Secretary of State in a letter to the President is to that effect. Without that change in our policy to openly allow loans for arms and munitions sales the sale could not have been promoted beyond a certain point.

We have so far been clearly within the terms of our resolution. Arms traffic is dependent upon governmental permission for foreign loans.

Are we, then, at that point disqualified from asking what the effect on a government is of the arms traffic? The committee did not feel itself disqualified for this reason: First, there was on the books a law embargoing munitions to Paraguay and Bolivia. Second, there is on the books a treaty governing the control of arms. Third, there is on the books a law leaving it within the discretion of the President to embargo arms at any time after the beginning of a war. These are "existing legislation" upon which the committee has power to report. They are legislation for the regulation of the control and manufacture of and traffic in arms and munitions. The authority is clear to determine and report whether these measures are adequate or not.

How can we find out whether these measures are, or can in their nature, be adequate? There was an embargo voted by Congress against the two nations participating in the Chaco war. Was it adequate? The committee began an investigation. Shortly thereafter the Department of Justice interested itself, and the case is now before a grand jury in the southern district of New York. There was no question raised concerning our power there.

We went to history for guidance. The World War is still with us every day. We suffer from it in every hour of our lives. There was in the fall of 1916 a law on the books permitting the President in his discretion virtually to embargo arms and loans. In his discretion he did not use it, although he had approved the law. The experience there seemed very similar to the present law, which leaves much to the discretion of the Executive. Is it forbidden to attempt to find lessons and guidance in the operation of that law, so similar to the present one? If we find that one of the most idealistic Presidents this Nation ever had was unable to stem a flood of munitions orders, is it improper to report on that fact? Is it beyond our powers to investigate that situation and report on it? The committee thought not. It was no reflection upon Woodrow Wilson. No human being could have, politically, dared to stop the war trade after it had been going 2 years.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOORE in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NYE. I gladly yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Secretary of State Bryan never retracted his position on the question of neutrality and the question of loans as governing the neutrality policy.

Mr. NYE. Not to my knowledge. Never in any instance did he alter the position which he pronounced so clearly while he was Secretary of State upon the question of our neutrality.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. As a matter of fact, he resigned.

Mr. NYE. He resigned because there was not an abiding by the terms of that neutrality policy.

Ours was an investigation not into motives but into mechanisms. If any member of the committee could suggest a better way to examine the probable effects of our present embargo law by our experience with the only other attempt which we left in the discretion of the President, he failed to suggest it to the rest of the committee.

THE SECRET TREATY RECORDS

But a further question still lies. By what authority did we produce the records indicating that the President and the Secretary of State knew of the secret treaties?

There is existing legislation—the neutrality law of 1935—which permits the President to delay an embargo against nations joining a war after the first two participants have done so—in other words, to delay an embargo on the League members in case League sanctions develop into war. There were those on the committee who thought that it might be possible that our joining in sanctions might involve us in war—that existing legislation, which we have the clear power to investigate and report on, or might, because of the looseness of its language, draw us into war.

And into what kind of a war? A war for justice, of course. A war against aggression, of course. But a war to preserve the status quo—a war to further whatever aims the European nations have, in accordance with whatever secret agreements they may have among themselves. There is a possibility that any war which is not of our own origination is somebody else's war. There is a possibility in existing legislation that we might be called upon to fight somebody else's war, not knowing that those other nations had war purposes and peace purposes different from our own. Is it not important to investigate that? Is it not important to report upon that? Is there any question but that it is important for the people of America to know that any war we may get into will confront this Nation with a set of secret war aims framed and fought for by other nations? Once we find that possibility in existing legislation we are authorized to report upon it. It is important and it is legal for us to bring out its importance.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. I should like to ask the Senator whether or not these so-called secret agreements, which he has been mentioning, were in effect at the time of the closing of the war.

Mr. NYE. I hesitate to answer the Senator's question directly, but so far as I know they were all in effect at the close of the war.

Mr. FLETCHER. I follow that with the question whether or not the Versailles Treaty conformed to these alleged secret agreements in the settlement thereby made.

Mr. NYE. Very much; but that is a matter which another member of the committee, and which I understand members of the Foreign Relations Committee, will take up in proper order.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was asking the Senator whether or not the Versailles Treaty specified this apportionment which had been mentioned in the secret agreements, or whether the Versailles Treaty was made without regard to any possible agreements which might have been made before.

Mr. NYE. We have been told time and again how embarrassed our American delegates were, on reaching the conference, to discover the existence of these so-called secret treaties which prevented our delegation from furthering the kind of peace we had been talking about for many, many years.

Mr. FLETCHER. Does the Senator mean to say that there were other secret agreements besides those he has mentioned?

Mr. NYE. Not that I know of. If our Secretary of State, and one of the most idealistic Presidents this Nation has ever had, had known of the secret treaties, and had not immediately informed the American people that our war aims were different from those of the Allies, then we were winning the war and were losing the peace. Is it not important for the American people to know that? Is it not one fact to bring out to show the possible results of existing legislation? Mr. President, I find the course which has been pursued by our committee entirely in harmony not only with the language of the resolution under which we have been operating but in harmony with the highest and greatest interests of the people of the United States.

The whole record on the past war was developed in the course of the committee's study of the connection between financing and munitions. One Morgan witness was constantly stating that the abnormal war trade had no connection with war or with the neutrality policy of the country. He stated it was nothing but submarines. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] interrupted to point out that our desire to ship war goods in abnormal quantities was at the heart of the submarine issue, a fact that none can deny in view of these last few days of history making.

T. E. R. A. HELP

Now, as to the contention that there was something out of order respecting the committee's use of help from the Federal Temporary Emergency Relief Administration. There should be no surprise in the Senate covering the use of this help. The RECORD of last summer contains references to it.

This committee early found the bulk of its investigative work centered in New York and vicinity in the summer of 1934. Committee investigators working out of the committee's offices at 441 Lexington Avenue learned that a shortage of worth-while projects faced the New York State T. E. R. A. Administration, and that the administration would look with favor upon a project to assist this committee in its great clerical, stenographic, and accounting labors. Consequently, after conference with the State authorities, a project was written and approved by State and Federal T. E. R. A. authorities—a nonrelief New York State project, 100 percent reimbursable from Federal funds. There can be no just criticism of the committee for making use of clerical and accounting assistance so offered and afforded.

If the Senator from Texas would criticize this assistance given to the Munitions Committee, let him address himself to the T. E. R. A. and W. P. A. authorities, for the responsibility for the project rests with them. As for myself, I shall never cease appreciating the consideration given by these authorities, nor will I cease being convinced that the projects upon which those helpers worked were projects of the greatest of merit, and I venture to say that no other T. E. R. A. project in all this land can be found on which those who were given employment by reason of it labored as long, as sincerely, and as earnestly as did the people upon this project in which our committee was interested.

This committee had supervision of the project employees, nothing more. It spent less than three-fourths of the funds allocated to it by the works authorities. No individuals were utilized in the project not certified to it by the Works Administration. The committee had clear understanding with the works authorities that only the most trustworthy, the most efficient, and the most capable persons would be used on the project. The members of the project were drawn by the personnel division of the Works Administration from its rolls of applicants and in conjunction with various associations, such as engineering societies, cooperating in New York in the placing of applicants.

It has been charged that this committee hired relief workers. That is not true. The project was a non-relief-works project, and all its costs were to the Works Administration, not to the committee. I am reliably informed that many other similar projects were under way at the time of greater magnitude and at larger cost to assist various State and Federal agencies in pursuing their tasks. This project, which so largely assisted this committee, was regarded by the Federal and State works authorities as one of their most worthy projects, and it may be stated that it was of inestimable help to the committee.

As originally written and approved by the works authorities the project offered the committee the services of 15 accountants, 3 lawyers, 8 engineers, 19 stenographers, 1 messenger, 1 supervising stenographer, a total of 49 persons, and allocated approximately $80,000 to the project. Of this sum, less than $58,000 was spent and at no time did the project utilize the full number of people authorized.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to repeat I have no apologies to offer for any act of mine or the Munitions Committee in the investigation. I take away, I recall not one word of my expression to the effect that President Wilson and Secretary Lansing falsified when testifying in the presence of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in 1919. The record in this respect offers no escape from facts.

If it be the will of a colleague to assert, as he has, that I have impugned the purposes of President Wilson, I can but answer that the record will have to speak for itself and that there is most positive evidence that Secretary Lansing is recorded as having stated purposes which were quite contrary to the purposes he was presumably following as custodian of America's neutrality in 1915 and 1916. I recommend to the Members of the Senate the reading of the War Memoirs of Robert Lansing to see how his thoughts were squaring off with what was his record in those trying hours of endeavored neutrality.

If it is a will to believe that there was malice and political prejudice in my expressed opinion concerning the failure of President Wilson and Secretary Lansing to speak truthfully to the committee of the Senate, which shared with the Executive treaty-making duties, I can only refer those believers to such colleagues as were present at the hearing of Tuesday and to newspapers files which found me publishing editorials in 1916 in support of the man who "kept us out of war."

Perhaps I err in my diligence in pursuing an investigation for which the Senate makes me in part responsible. If we have been too thorough, it is too late to correct it. But it seems to me that when we go in search of pertinent truths we ought not dodge them when we encounter them—we ought not let partisan prejudices blind us to those truths, however embarrassing they may be to a mere political party. And I want to give most emphatic notice that in the 15 remaining days of hearings which the committee plans in completion of its investigation I shall not alter my course of developing the facts which are pertinent to the inquiry. Whatever the degree of threat or intimidation, however slimy may be the language used in criticism of the course pursued, I shall pursue that course and know that I have done that which is right, especially when the course has such positive bearing upon the future well-being of 130,000,000 men, women, and children.

How can men ignore, as some seem to easily do, that only by experience can we build properly against repetition of costly and wrecking experiences? The very able Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] yesterday gave splendid voice to thought in that direction—a voice which I am sure will be repeated before the present debate shall be concluded.

Mr. President, I have spoken of continuation of the munitions investigation. Perhaps there is a will abruptly to end it, a power which most certainly rests with the Senate. The committee has 15 more days of hearings scheduled. The expensive ground work in preparation for those hearings has been completed. It remains but to record the findings in public hearings, close the record, write the final report, and be done—a day and an hour which cannot move upon me too fast. The question arises, however, as to the right of the committee to use documents which are not yet entered in the record through public hearings. The committee possesses these documents and these records. Can the committee use them without offering them in public hearings? If it cannot, of course the committee would be much embarrassed if its work were to be abruptly ended. It would be difficult to present in a record a full and complete picture of the facts upon which the Senate has asked for a report. On the other hand, if it is the committee's privilege and liberty to resort to these documents and these records which have been unearthed by reason of the investigation and to use them as a basis of a report, the question is quite another one.

But why would the Senate stop the inquiry thus abruptly? Because it is so costly?

The Senator from Missouri yesterday declared that the cost of the Munitions Committee inquiry is not so great as the cost of many other inquiries and that the results of the investigation have been worth many times the cost. In this statement I am sure the Senator from Missouri will find agreement on the part of a very large majority of the people of the United States.

The appropriations by the Senate to date for the inquiry have totaled $125,000. It is not true, as declared by the Senator from Texas, that we have pending a request for an additional $50,000 or for any lesser amount. We have been undertaking to measure what our needs would be to enable us to finish our work. We think they will not be more than from seven to, possibly, nine thousand dollars. In a few days the committee can estimate accurately its needs, and will then make request of the Senate for the amount. Naturally, there is a desire on the part of the committee to be able to round out its work and to present its report in a finished manner.

The committee, Mr. President, is quite accustomed to objections; it is quite accustomed to criticism; but 3 days before the committee under section (c) of the enabling resolution began hearings on the findings of the War Policies Commission to take the profits out of war, an announcement was made that another body, not authorized by Congress, had been set up for that purpose. It has held only one meeting. The Munitions Committee, after long hearings, proposed amendments to the so-called McSwain bill, being House bill 5529, and reported it. The bill was approved and reported by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, and is now pending in the Finance Committee. On the day the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] introduced for the committee the two bills to take the excess profits out of naval shipbuilding and to prevent collusion, an attack was made on the committee's chief investigator.

Now, when the investigation is completed and hearings are taking place on the part in the mechanism of war trade played by certain financial houses we again find ourselves subject to attack.

There are companies still to appear before the committee. Some of them are powerful and influential; some of them have friends—influential friends. Is there anything in the testimony of the large steel companies furnishing Army and Navy supplies to disturb anyone; or in the ramifications of the aviation companies; or in the facts about the company which has a monopoly of machine-gun manufacture for the Army; or in the practice of some companies in selling the latest American war inventions to those nations upon this earth that we hear from day to day are most apt to be our foes when we come to another war?

Again, Mr. President, what is it that men fear from the completion of the investigation? What truths are there, what truths can there be that they would have us run away from? Where and what is the power that moves to block, to stop, to embarrass, and to cripple the work that has been undertaken?

Mr. President, not only am I not inclined in the least to fear criticism of the work of the Munitions Committee, but I am proud—and that exceedingly—of having had a hand in a work which, I am sure, will some day be recognized as having been done thoroughly, impartially, and to an objective that will mean much to my sons and my daughters and to the sons and daughters of every other American man and woman.

I cannot close my remarks today without at least one more reference to that colleague on the floor who yesterday took the bit between his teeth and started for Heaven only knows where. I cannot be unmindful of his pretensions and his lack of action to back those pretensions in at least one case.

The facts are that the munitions question has been eating upon the Senator from Texas for many months. A year ago this month members of the Munitions Committee reported verbally on the floor the findings of that committee as a result of its early investigations. We told about the war-profits bill; we told of our hope of accomplishing legislation to control in peacetime as well as in wartime the racketeering game in which munitions makers engage; and on January 14, while I was thus addressing myself to the Senate, the Senator from Texas moved into the debate and said:

> Let me say to the Senator from Missouri that my query was not prompted by any thought of criticism of the committee or anything the committee has done, but merely with the view of getting some legislation relating to the matter. * * *
> Let me suggest to the Senator that it is all very well to make speeches, but, after all, unless we are going to legislate in response to the investigation of this committee, we will have to make another similar investigation 2 or 3 years from now and go over the same ground again.

I have previously said in my remarks that the committee has taken the House McSwain bill, amended its war-profits proposal, reported it to the Senate, and the Senate in return referred it back to the Military Affairs Committee. The Military Affairs Committee, early last summer, reported that bill to the Senate with its favor, and then it was thought advisable to refer it to the Finance Committee of the Senate, where it went and where it still is. The man who was made chairman of the subcommittee to conduct that investigation and who has held but one meeting, and that last August, was none other than the Senator from Texas, who a year ago this month was insisting upon legislation and less talk.

Mr. CONNALLY subsequently said: I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD, at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], the message of President Wilson to the Congress of the United States on April 2, 1917.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUFFY in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES DELIVERED AT A JOINT SESSION OF THE TWO HOUSES OF CONGRESS, APRIL 2, 1917

Gentlemen of the Congress, I have called the Congress into extraordinary session because there are serious, very serious, choices of policy to be made, and made immediately, which it was neither right nor constitutionally permissible that I should assume the responsibility of making.

On the 3d of February last I officially laid before you the extraordinary announcement of the Imperial German Government that on and after the 1st day of February it was its purpose to put aside all restraints of law or of humanity and use its submarines to sink every vessel that sought to approach either the ports of Great Britain and Ireland or the western coasts of Europe or any of the ports controlled by the enemies of Germany within the Mediterranean. That had seemed to be the object of the German submarine warfare earlier in the war, but since April of last year the Imperial Government had somewhat restrained the commanders of its undersea craft in conformity with its promise then given to us that passenger boats should not be sunk and that due warning would be given to all other vessels which its submarines might seek to destroy, when no resistance was offered or escape attempted, and care taken that their crews were given at least a fair chance to save their lives in their open boats. The precautions taken were meager and haphazard enough, as was proved in distressing instance after instance in the progress of the cruel and unmanly business, but a certain degree of restraint was observed. The new policy has swept every restriction aside. Vessels of every kind, whatever their flag, their character, their cargo, their destination, their errand, have been ruthlessly sent to the bottom without warning and without thought of help or mercy for those on board, the vessels of friendly neutrals along with those of belligerents. Even hospital ships and ships carrying relief to the sorely bereaved and stricken people of Belgium, though the latter were provided with safe conduct through the proscribed areas by the German Government itself and were distinguished by unmistakable marks of identity, have been sunk with the same reckless lack of compassion or of principle.

I was for a little while unable to believe that such things would in fact be done by any government that had hitherto subscribed to the humane practices of civilized nations. International law had its origin in the attempt to set up some law which would be respected and observed upon the seas, where no nation had right of dominion and where lay the free highways of the world. By painful stage after stage has that law been built up, with meager enough results, indeed, after all was accomplished that could be accomplished, but always with a clear view, at least, of what the heart and conscience of mankind demanded. This minimum of right the German Government has swept aside under the plea of retaliation and necessity and because it had no weapons which it could use at sea except these which it is impossible to employ as it is employing them without throwing to the winds all scruples of humanity or of respect for the understandings that were supposed to underlie the intercourse of the world. I am not now thinking of the loss of property involved, immense and serious as that is, but only of the wanton and wholesale destruction of the lives of noncombatants, men, women, and children, engaged in pursuits which have always, even in the darkest periods of modern history, been deemed innocent and legitimate. Property can be paid for; the lives of peaceful and innocent people cannot be. The present German submarine warfare against commerce is a warfare against mankind.

It is a war against all nations. American ships have been sunk, American lives taken, in ways which it has stirred us very deeply to learn of, but the ships and people of other neutral and friendly nations have been sunk and overwhelmed in the waters in the same way. There has been no discrimination. The challenge is to all mankind. Each nation must decide for itself how it will meet it. The choice we make for ourselves must be made with a moderation of counsel and a temperateness of judgment befitting our character and our motives as a nation. We must put excited feeling away. Our motive will not be revenge or the victorious assertion of the physical might of the nation, but only the vindication of right, of human right, of which we are only a single champion.

When I addressed the Congress on the 26th of February last I thought that it would suffice to assert our neutral rights with arms, our right to use the seas against unlawful interference, our right to keep our people safe against unlawful violence. But armed neutrality, it now appears, is impracticable. Because submarines are in effect outlaws when used as the German submarines have been used against merchant shipping, it is impossible to defend ships against their attacks as the law of nations has assumed that merchantmen would defend themselves against privateers or cruisers, visible craft giving chase upon the open sea. It is common prudence in such circumstances, grim necessity indeed, to endeavor to destroy them before they have shown their own intention. They must be dealt with upon sight, if dealt with at all. The German Government denies the right of neutrals to use arms at all within the areas of the sea which it has proscribed, even in the defense of rights which no modern publicist has ever before questioned their right to defend. The intimation is conveyed that the armed guards which we have placed on our merchant ships will be treated as beyond the pale of law and subject to be dealt with as pirates would be. Armed neutrality is ineffectual enough at best; in such circumstances and in the face of such pretensions it is worse than ineffectual; it is likely only to produce what it was meant to prevent; it is practically certain to draw us into the war without either the rights or the effectiveness of belligerents. There is one choice we cannot make, we are incapable of making: we will not choose the path of submission and suffer the most sacred rights of our Nation and our people to be ignored or violated. The wrongs against which we now array ourselves are no common wrongs; they cut to the very roots of human life.

With a profound sense of the solemn and even tragical character of the step I am taking and of the grave responsibilities which it involves, but in unhesitating obedience to what I deem my constitutional duty, I advise that the Congress declare the recent course of the Imperial German Government to be in fact nothing less than war against the Government and people of the United States; that it formally accept the status of belligerent which has thus been thrust upon it; and that it take immediate steps not only to put the country in a more thorough state of defense but also to exert all its power and employ all its resources to bring the Government of the German Empire to terms and end the war.

What this will involve is clear. It will involve the utmost practicable cooperation in counsel and action with the governments now at war with Germany, and, as incident to that, the extension to those governments of the most liberal financial credits, in order that our resources may so far as possible be added to theirs. It will involve the organization and mobilization of all the material resources of the country to supply the materials of war and serve the incidental needs of the Nation in the most abundant and yet the most economical and efficient way possible. It will involve the immediate full equipment of the Navy in all respects but particularly in supplying it with the best means of dealing with the enemy's submarines. It will involve the immediate addition to the armed forces of the United States already provided for by law in case of war at least 500,000 men, who should, in my opinion, be chosen upon the principle of universal liability to service, and also the authorization of subsequent additional increments of equal force so soon as they may be needed and can be handled in training. It will involve also, of course, the granting of adequate credits to the Government, sustained, I hope, so far as they can equitably be sustained by the present generation, by well conceived taxation.

I say sustained so far as may be equitable by taxation because it seems to me that it would be most unwise to base the credits which will now be necessary entirely on money borrowed. It is our duty, I most respectfully urge, to protect our people so far as we may against the very serious hardships and evils which would be likely to arise out of the inflation which would be produced by vast loans.

In carrying out the measures by which these things are to be accomplished we should keep constantly in mind the wisdom of interfering as little as possible in our own preparation and in the equipment of our own military forces with the duty—for it will be a very practical duty—of supplying the nations already at war with Germany with the materials which they can obtain only from us or by our assistance. They are in the field and we should help them in every way to be effective there.

I shall take the liberty of suggesting, through the several executive departments of the Government, for the consideration of your committees, measures for the accomplishment of the several objects I have mentioned. I hope that it will be your pleasure to deal with them as having been framed after very careful thought by the branch of the Government upon which the responsibility of conducting the war and safeguarding the Nation will most directly fall.

While we do these things, these deeply momentous things, let us be very clear, and make very clear to all the world what our motives and our objects are. My own thought has not been driven from its habitual and normal course by the unhappy events of the last 2 months, and I do not believe that the thought of the Nation has been altered or clouded by them. I have exactly the same things in mind now that I had in mind when I addressed the Senate on the 22d of January last; the same that I had in mind when I addressed the Congress on the 3d of February and on the 26th of February. Our object now, as then, is to vindicate the principles of peace and justice in the life of the world as against selfish and autocratic power and to set up amongst the really free and self-governed peoples of the world such a concert of purpose and of action as will henceforth insure the observance of those principles. Neutrality is no longer feasible or desirable where the peace of the world is involved and the freedom of its peoples, and the menace to that peace and freedom lies in the existence of autocratic governments backed by organized force which is controlled wholly by their will, not by the will of their people. We have seen the last of neutrality in such circumstances. We are at the beginning of an age in which it will be insisted that the same standards of conduct and of responsibility for wrong done shall be observed among nations and their governments that are observed among the individual citizens of civilized states.

We have no quarrel with the German people. We have no feeling toward them but one of sympathy and friendship. It was not upon their impulse that their Government acted in entering this war. It was not with their previous knowledge or approval. It was a war determined upon as wars used to be determined upon in the old, unhappy days when peoples were nowhere consulted by their rulers and wars were provoked and waged in the interest of dynasties or of little groups of ambitious men who were accustomed to use their fellow men as pawns and tools. Self-governed nations do not fill their neighbor states with spies or set the course of intrigue to bring about some critical posture of affairs which will give them an opportunity to strike and make conquest. Such designs can be successfully worked out only under cover and where no one has the right to ask questions. Cunningly contrived plans of deception or aggression, carried, it may be, from generation to generation, can be worked out and kept from the light only within the privacy of courts or behind the carefully guarded confidences of a narrow and privileged class. They are happily impossible where public opinion commands and insists upon full information concerning all the nation's affairs.

A steadfast concert for peace can never be maintained except by a partnership of democratic nations. No autocratic government could be trusted to keep faith within it or observe its covenants. It must be a league of honor, a partnership of opinion. Intrigue would eat its vitals away; the plottings of inner circles who could plan what they would and render account to no one would be a corruption seated at its very heart. Only free peoples can hold their purpose and their honor steady to a common end and prefer the interests of mankind to any narrow interest of their own.

Does not every American feel that assurance has been added to our hope for the future peace of the world by the wonderful and heartening things that have been happening within the last few weeks in Russia? Russia was known by those who knew it best to have been always in fact democratic at heart, in all the vital habits of her thought, in all the intimate relationships of her people that spoke their natural instinct, their habitual attitude toward life. The autocracy that crowned the summit of her political structure, long as it had stood and terrible as was the reality of its power, was not in fact Russian in origin, character, or purpose; and now it has been shaken off and the great, generous Russian people have been added in all their naive majesty and might to the forces that are fighting for freedom in the world, for justice, and for peace. Here is a fit partner for a league of honor.

One of the things that has served to convince us that the Prussian autocracy was not and could never be our friend is that from the very outset of the present war it has filled our unsuspecting communities and even our offices of government with spies and set criminal intrigues everywhere afoot against our national unity of counsel, our peace within and without, our industries, and our commerce. Indeed it is now evident that its spies were here even before the war began; and it is unhappily not a matter of conjecture but a fact proved in our courts of justice that the intrigues which have more than once come perilously near to disturbing the peace and dislocating the industries of the country have been carried on at the instigation, with the support, and even under the personal direction of official agents of the Imperial Government accredited to the Government of the United States. Even in checking these things and trying to extirpate them we have sought to put the most generous interpretation possible upon them because we knew that their source lay, not in any hostile feeling or purpose of the German people toward us (who were, no doubt as ignorant of them as we ourselves were), but only in the selfish designs of a Government that did what it pleased and told its people nothing. But they have played their part in serving to convince us at last that that Government entertains no real friendship for us and means to act against our peace and security at its convenience. That it means to stir up enemies against us at our very doors the intercepted note to the German Minister at Mexico City is eloquent evidence.

We are accepting this challenge of hostile purpose because we know that in such a government, following such methods, we can never have a friend; and that in the presence of its organized power, always lying in wait to accomplish we know not what purpose, there can be no assured security for the democratic governments of the world. We are now about to accept gage of battle with this natural foe to liberty and shall, if necessary, spend the whole force of the Nation to check and nullify its pretensions and its power. We are glad, now that we see the facts with no veil of false pretense about them, to fight thus for the ultimate peace of the world and for the liberation of its peoples, the German peoples included: for the rights of nations great and small and the privilege of men everywhere to choose their way of life and of obedience. The world must be made safe for democracy. Its peace must be planted upon the tested foundations of political liberty. We have no selfish ends to serve. We desire no conquest, no dominion. We seek no indemnities for ourselves, no material compensation for the sacrifices we shall freely make. We are but one of the champions of the rights of mankind. We shall be satisfied when those rights have been made as secure as the faith and the freedom of nations can make them.

Just because we fight without rancor and without selfish object, seeking nothing for ourselves but what we shall wish to share with all free peoples, we shall, I feel confident, conduct our operations as belligerents without passion and ourselves observe with proud punctilio the principles of right and of fair play we profess to be fighting for.

I have said nothing of the governments allied with the Imperial Government of Germany, because they have not made war upon us or challenged us to defend our right and our honor. The Austro-Hungarian Government has, indeed, avowed its unqualified endorsement and acceptance of the reckless and lawless submarine warfare adopted now without disguise by the Imperial German Government, and it has therefore not been possible for this Government to receive Count Tarnowski, the ambassador recently accredited to this Government by the Imperial and Royal Government of Austria-Hungary; but that Government has not actually engaged in warfare against citizens of the United States on the seas, and I take the liberty, for the present at least, of postponing a discussion of our relations with the authorities at Vienna. We enter this war only where we are clearly forced into it, because there are no other means of defending our rights.

It will be all the easier for us to conduct ourselves as belligerents in a high spirit of right and fairness because we act without animus, not in enmity toward a people or with the desire to bring any injury or disadvantage upon them, but only in armed opposition to an irresponsible government which has thrown aside all considerations of humanity and of right and is running amuck. We are, let me say again, the sincere friends of the German people, and shall desire nothing so much as the early reestablishment of intimate relations of mutual advantage between us. However hard it may be for them, for the time being, to believe that this is spoken from our hearts. We have borne with their present Government through all these bitter months because of that friendship, exercising a patience and forbearance which would otherwise have been impossible. We shall, happily, still have an opportunity to prove that friendship in our daily attitude and actions toward the millions of men and women of German birth and native sympathy who live amongst us and share our life, and we shall be proud to prove it toward all who are in fact loyal to their neighbors and to the Government in the hour of test. They are, most of them, as true and loyal Americans as if they had never known any other fealty or allegiance. They will be prompt to stand with us in rebuking and restraining the few who may be of a different mind and purpose. If there should be disloyalty, it will be dealt with with a firm hand of stern repression; but, if it lifts its head at all, it will lift it only here and there and without countenance except from a lawless and malignant few.

It is a distressing and oppressive duty, gentlemen of the Congress, which I have performed in thus addressing you. There are, it may be, many months of fiery trial and sacrifice ahead of us. It is a fearful thing to lead this great peaceful people into war, into the most terrible and disastrous of all wars, civilization itself seeming to be in the balance. But the right is more precious than peace, and we shall fight for the things which we have always carried nearest our hearts—for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own governments for the rights and liberties of small nations, for a universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free. To such a task we can dedicate our lives and our fortunes, everything that we are and everything that we have, with the pride of those who know that the day has come when America is privileged to spend her blood and her might for the principles that gave her birth and happiness and the peace which she has treasured. God helping her, she can do no other.

Mr. GLASS obtained the floor.

Mr. CONNALLY. I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Ninety-one Senators having answered to their names; there is a quorum present.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, it is with great reluctance that I venture to trespass upon the time of the Senate today, particularly in view of the fact that the real issue before this body is one of so great importance as to closely affect the interests of millions of our fellow citizens. It occurred to me, and the thought was confirmed by suggestions from my colleagues, that, as a more or less intimate friend of the late Woodrow Wilson and as a former member of his official family, it would be pertinent if I should briefly respond to the shocking assault made upon his character and the attempted impeachment of his integrity and his veracity. This I shall do in unmistakable terms and, but for the limitations of the rules of the Senate, in phraseology which I am not accustomed to use.

If it were permissible in the Senate to say that any man who would asperse the integrity and veracity of Woodrow Wilson is a coward, if it were permissible to say that his charge is not only malicious but positively mendacious, that I would be glad to say here and elsewhere to any man, whether he be a United States Senator or not, because the charge would be not only destitute of decency but it would be such a shocking exhibition as never has happened in the 35 years I have served in the Congress of the United States. In that period no President of the United States, however bitter his adversaries, however uncompromising their antagonism, has ever been charged on the floor of the Senate with having deliberately falsified in a matter of importance.

When the question is reduced to its last analysis what do we find is the basis of the charge? When, may I ask, was the Senator from North Dakota transferred from the room to which the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] assigned him to the British Embassy? When did his intimacy with Mr. Balfour become so great as to warrant him in standing here and saying, because Mr. Balfour thought he said something to President Woodrow Wilson, therefore his thought, his supposition, is to be taken as a verity and Woodrow Wilson charged with falsification? I would accept the word of Woodrow Wilson rather than that of Balfour and of Seymour and of the Senator from North Dakota put together. [Laughter.]

What a subtle and mean attempt to have it appear that Woodrow Wilson was compelled by the House of Morgan to drag this Nation into the World War and to sacrifice the lives of our boys! No one who ever associated with Woodrow Wilson, no one who ever had any access to the man's thoughts, would ever have the audacity to suggest that his sympathies were with the great banking interests of this country, and that he took us into the war in order to save the paltry dollars of the Wall Street interests. And yet, Mr. President, those who have noted the newspaper accounts of this investigation have seen question after question asked the plain implication of which was that the house of Morgan influenced Woodrow Wilson to alter his policy of neutrality and to precipitate this country into war. I resent it, as every American citizen who knew Woodrow Wilson would resent it, as an infamous libel, whether suggested or whether directly made.

Woodrow Wilson did not declare war. The Constitution confides that business exclusively to the Congress of the United States. The President came before the Congress and stated his reasons why there should be a declaration, and the Congress responded, and the country responded, with applause and appreciation of the manhood of their President. That approval and that applause were different from the applause in another country that greeted the sinking of the Lusitania; and it now would be appropriate for the Senator from North Dakota to offer, for the consideration of the Senate, a resolution of apology to Germany for our declaration of war.

From time to time it has been suggested in the newspapers that the members of this committee were going to present to the country shocking revelations. It remained until day before yesterday to present anything of a shocking nature; and that was the unspeakable accusation against a dead President—dirt-daubing the sepulcher of Woodrow Wilson.

What has been presented; what of an imperative nature has been disclosed that was not already known; what that is relevant to this discussion and to this investigation?

Every intelligent American citizen knew that the banking interests of this country were loaning large sums of money to the Allies; and why not? We were selling the warring nations our cotton. We were selling them our wheat. We were selling both the Allies and the Central Powers our produce of every description so far as delivery could be made. Why should we not have sold them our credit? It was not a war of our making. For 3 years it was their war. Why should we have shut down our industries? Why should we have refused to the producing farmers of this country the right to sell the products of their farms? And why should we have prevented, if we could have prevented, the banking interests from selling their credit abroad?

Everybody who came in contact with the then President of the United States knows perfectly well that he wanted to be neutral. To some of us he was vastly too neutral, and was bitterly assailed by men of the type of Theodore Roosevelt and others for not taking this country into war 2 years before we entered the war. There were millions of American citizens with boys whose lives would be risked who felt the same way about it. But "there were secret treaties"; and what relationship that has to this matter is beyond my power to determine. What has that to do now with the sale and manufacture and export of munitions?

Suppose there were secret treaties—and there were: Were we to sit idly by and permit German submarines to sink our merchant vessels and other vessels upon which our nationals traveled on the high seas? Whether Wilson knew or did not know—and he did not know—of these secret treaties, was that a justification for brigandage on the high seas? Should he have made it a condition of our entrance into the war that the European nations should abrogate all secret treaties, whether or not he knew of them?

Everybody knows, except the Senator from North Dakota, that Woodrow Wilson came near wrecking his life at Versailles in his protestations against carrying out the terms of certain secret treaties; but, after all, what has that to do with this question? What has that to do with legislation designed to keep this country out of useless war? What has that to do with the manufacture and exportation of munitions of war?

If we let the United States of America segregate itself in all of its trade relations whenever war shall occur, we literally wreck the economic status of this country.

Think of it! Some great European nation or nations manufacturing munitions and exporting their products to the belligerents of Europe or Asia, and the United States isolating itself, pretending to be purer and more humane than any other nation, and denying the right of its own nationals to produce and to sell!

It has been asserted here that the Government had an unrestricted right to refuse to permit the banking interests of this country to sell their credit abroad during the early stages of the World War. I have not had time to examine the statutes on the subject, but to me it seems an incredible assertion. As a matter of practice, the Government of the United States never has done that so far as I know; quite the contrary. In the post-war period, under the three administrations succeeding that of Woodrow Wilson, the Government not only permitted but encouraged the sale of private credits to the enormous extent of $12,000,000,000 in South America alone, and practically put the endorsement of the State Department upon every one of these transactions. Yet now the country is to be "shocked" with the revelation that Mr. Wilson did not put a stop to the sale of private credits to belligerent nations abroad; and, worse than that, as I have indicated, questions propounded to witnesses before this committee carried the plain implication that the interrogators believed that Woodrow Wilson was prevailed upon to take his Nation into war in order to secure the loans of these private banks.

Oh, the miserable demagogy, the miserable and mendacious suggestion, that the house of Morgan altered the neutrality course of Woodrow Wilson. As a matter of fact, the President was appealed to by some influential people to declare war against Great Britain for intercepting our commerce and injuring our trade relations. As a matter of fact, everybody intimate with Mr. Wilson knows that he was excessively impatient with Ambassador Page because of the Ambassador's frequent and incessant partiality to Great Britain. And when an extract is read here from some letter from Ambassador Page in confirmation of the miserable charge that Woodrow Wilson is a liar, I begin to wonder if that was one of the letters from Ambassador Page which Wilson did not read at all. And when extracts are read here from Professor Seymour, who is a romanticist, to insist that Wilson knew what Wilson said he did not know, and serious United States Senators are asked to take that testimony as a confirmation of the outrageous assault upon the integrity and the veracity of the dead President of the United States; that is the most shocking thing that has emanated from this committee.

Mr. President, I admit with some degree, if not of shame, of intense regret, that as a member of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate and as its chairman I voted funds for this exploitation. I will never vote another dollar to anybody or any committee, any one of whose members is so insensible to every consideration of decency as to stand on the Senate floor and bitterly assail two dead men who are honored by this entire Nation. Not another dollar will I vote to that committee.

It may be pardoned to its members to think and to say that they regard their work as of inestimable value. So far as I have been able to appraise it, I think it is $125,000 of the Senate's funds wasted, and given over by at least one member of that committee to the exploitation of himself, to a desperate and constant effort to figure on the front pages of sensational newspapers; but even the sensational newspapers are tired of it.

Then, in the last desperate moments to be figured, he asperses the character and the veracity of Woodrow Wilson, and alleges in evidence that Lord Balfour and Professor Seymour and Colonel House and Lloyd George surmised that Mr. Wilson knew what Mr. Wilson said he did not know.

Oh, I need not take the time of the Senate, or of any group of decent citizens in the United States, to insist that Woodrow Wilson was a great patriot and that his soul shrank from war, and that for a long period of time he was in grave doubt as to which of the belligerents merited greater criticism and profounder sympathy from the American people.

But the Senator from North Dakota has discovered, because, forsooth, there were secret treaties abroad, that Mr. Wilson was rushed into the war to save the credits of the House of Morgan. Did ever argument descend to that depth before in the history of the United States Senate?

Now, Mr. President, lest I should infringe those rules which I always obey, perhaps I should better desist, because what I feel like saying here or anywhere else to the man who thus insults the memory of Woodrow Wilson is something which may not be spoken here, or printed in the newspapers, or uttered by a gentleman. [Applause.]

Mr. GLASS subsequently said: I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD, immediately following the brief speech that I made, a speech delivered by Woodrow Wilson some time before we entered the war, which is so in contrast with the imputations that have been made upon his character that it clearly shows just what type of man he really was, and falsifies the estimates of him that have been made recently.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ADDRESS BY PRESIDENT WOODROW WILSON AT JEFFERSON DAY DINNER, UNDER AUSPICES OF THE COMMON COUNSEL CLUB OF WASHINGTON, AT NEW WILLARD HOTEL, APRIL 13, 1916

Mr. Toastmaster, ladies, and gentlemen, it is a spirit that we assemble to render honor to tonight, and the only way we can render honor to a spirit is by showing that we are ourselves prepared to exemplify it. The immortality of Thomas Jefferson does not lie in any one of his achievements or in the series of his achievements, but in his attitude toward mankind and the conception which he sought to realize in action of the service owed by America to the rest of the world.

One of the things that has seemed to me most to limit the usefulness of the Republican Party has been its provincial spirit, and one of the things which has immortalized the influence of Thomas Jefferson has been that his was the spirit of humanity exemplified upon the field of America. Thomas Jefferson was a great leader of men because he understood and interpreted the spirits of men. Some men can be led by their interest; all men can be led by their affections. Some men can be led by covetousness; all men can be led by the visions of the mind. It is not a circumstance without significance that Jefferson felt, perhaps more than any other American of his time, except Benjamin Franklin, his close kinship with like thinking spirits everywhere else in the civilized world. His comradeship was as intimate with the thinkers of France as with the frontiersmen of America. This rather awkward, rather diffident man carried about with him a sort of type of what all men should wish to be who love liberty and seek to lead their fellow men along those difficult paths of achievement.

The only way we can honor Thomas Jefferson is by illustrating his spirit and following his example. His example was an example of organization and concerted action for the rights of men, first in America and then by America's example everywhere in the world; and the thing that interested Jefferson is the only thing that ought to interest us. No American who has caught the true historic enthusiasm of this great country that we love can be proud of it merely because it has accumulated great material wealth and power. The pride comes when we conceive how that power ought to be used.

As I have listened to the speeches tonight the great feeling has come into my heart that we are better prepared than we ever were before to show how America can lead the way along the paths of light. Take the single matter of the financial statistics, of which we have only recently become precisely informed. The mere increase in the resources of the national banks of this country in the last twelvemonth exceeds the total resources of the Deutscher Reich Bank; and the aggregate resources of the national banks of the United States exceed by three thousand millions the aggregate resources of the Bank of England, the Bank of France, the Bank of Russia, the Reich Bank in Berlin, the Bank of the Netherlands, the Bank of Switzerland, and the Bank of Japan. Under the provincial conceptions of the Republican Party this would have been impossible. Under the world conceptions of those of us who are proud to follow the traditions of Thomas Jefferson it has been realized in fact. The question we have to put to ourselves is this: How are we going to use this power?

There are only two theories of government, my fellow citizens. One is that power should be centered in the control of trustees, who should determine the administration of all economic and political affairs. That is the theory of the Republican Party. A carefully hand-picked body of trustees. The other theory is of government and responsive servants of the great body of citizens, able to understand the common interes's because in direct and sympathetic touch with the common desire and the common need. The peculiarity of those who think in terms of trusteeship is that their thinking always squares with the preferences of the powerful and never squares with the lessons of history.

I was talking one day with a gentleman who was expounding to me the very familiar idea that somebody—I dare say he would have preferred to name the persons—should act as guardians and trustees for the people of the neighboring Republic of Mexico. I said, "I defy you to show a single example in history in which liberty and prosperity were ever handed down from above." Prosperity for the great masses of mankind has never sprung out of the soil of privilege. Prosperity for the great masses of mankind has never been created by the beneficence of privilege. Prosperity and liberty have never come by favor; they have always come by right, and the only competent expounders of right are the men who covet the opportunity to serve the right. When I see the crust even so much as slightly broken over the heads of a population which has always been directed by a board of trustees, I make up my mind that I will thrust not only my arm but my heart in the aperture, and that only by crushing every ounce of power that I can use shall any man ever close that opening up again. Wherever we use our power we must use it with this conception always in mind, that we are using it for the benefit of the persons who are chiefly interested and not for our own benefit.

By such processes and by such processes alone can we illustrate and honor the spirit of Thomas Jefferson. You cannot draw example merely from the deeds of Thomas Jefferson, who presided over a little Nation only just then struggling for recognition among the nations of the world, without material power, without the respect of foreign nations, without the opportunities of wealth, without the experiences of long periods of trial. There is no parallel in the circumstances of the time of Thomas Jefferson with the circumstances of the time in which we live. My pride is that in the 3 years in which we have been privileged to serve this great and trustful people we have devoted ourselves to the constructive execution of the promises we so solemnly made. Mr. GLASS, with the pleasing modesty which has always characterized him, sought to show that his was not the statesmanlike mind that conceived one of the great achievements of the last 3 years. There is not going to be any quarrel as to where the credit belongs. The thing that is going to strike the imagination of the country is that the Democratic party, without picking out the men or discriminating the praise, produced constructive statesmanship such as the Republican Party has not in long generations produced. The Republican Party has spent its time harking back to a single outworn economic error, to which its intellectual armory apparently is limited, while we have gone forward in the spirit of a new age to conceive the methods by which the new necessities of civilization shall be met. We have conceived them in such spirit and in such method that for the first time since the Republican Party and their predecessors destroyed the merchant marine of the United States we have turned the thoughts and the energies and the conquering genius of the businessmen of America to the great field of the business of the world at large. We have struck the trammels of provincialism away from them, and they are beginning to see that great world in which their genius shall henceforth play the part that other nations have hitherto usurped and monopolized.

Frankly, gentlemen, I am not interested in personal ambitions. May I not admit even in this company that I am not enthusiastic over mere party success? I like to see men generations strong take fire of great progressive ideas and, banding themselves together like a body of thoughtful brothers, put their shoulders together and lift some part of the great load that has depressed humanity. This country has not the time, it is not now in the temper, to listen to the violent, to the passionate, to the ambitious. This country demands service which is essentially and fundamentally nonpartisan. Some gentlemen will learn this soon, some will learn it late, but they will learn it so thoroughly that it will be digested. This country demands at this time as it never did before absolutely disinterested and nonpartisan service. I do not now refer merely to foreign affairs, where everybody professes to be nonpartisan; I refer just as much to domestic affairs, for, in saying "nonpartisan", I do not mean merely as between parties and political organizations, but also and more fundamentally as between classes and interests.

One of the things that it has been just as interesting to prove as anything else that we have proved in the last 3 years is that we are not partisan as against any legitimate business interest, no matter how great; that we are not fighting anybody who is doing legitimate business, but that we are fighting for everybody who wants to do legitimate business. We are not partisans as between the rich and the poor, as between the employer and the employee, but if it be possible we are partisans of both and would if we could in our thinking draw them together to see the interests of the country in the same terms and express them in the same concerted purposes. Any man who fights for any class in this country is now fighting against the interest of America and the welfare of the world. We are nonpartisans as between classes, as between interests, as between political ambitions, as between those who desire power and those who have it; for power will never again in America, if I know anything of its temper, long be entrusted to those who use it in their own behoof.

Gentlemen, are you ready for the test? God forbid that we should ever become directly or indirectly embroiled in quarrels not of our own choosing and that do not affect that which we feel responsible to defend; but, if we should ever be drawn in, are you ready to go in only where the interests of America are coincident with the interests of mankind, and to draw out the moment the interest centers in America and is narrowed from the wide circle of humanity? Are you ready for the test? Have you the courage to go in? Have you the courage to come out according as the balance is disturbed or readjusted for the interests of humanity? If you are ready, you have inherited the spirit of Jefferson, who recognized the men in France and the men in Germany who were doing the liberal thinking of their day as just as much citizens of the great world of liberty as he was himself, and who was ready in every conception he had to join hands across the water or across any other barrier with those who held those high conceptions of liberty which had brought the United States into existence. When we lose that sympathy, we lose the titles of our own heritage. So long as we keep it we can go through the world with lifted heads and with the consciousness of those who do not serve themselves except as they conceive that they have purified their hearts for the service of mankind.

These are days that search men's hearts. These are days that discredit selfish speech. These are days that ought to quiet ill-considered counsel. These are solemn days, when all the moral standards of mankind are about to be finally tried out. The responsibility is with us, gentlemen, * * * because the power for the time being is ours to say whether America under our leadership shall hold those eternal balances even or shall let some malign influence depress one balance and lift the other; the responsibility and the time to look around and ask, "Who stands for the old visions of liberty and whose eyes are still open to those spiritual images conceived at our birth?"

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD, immediately after the extract just placed in the RECORD by the Senator from Virginia, an extract from the War Memoirs of Secretary Lansing, at page 23.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Many Americans were deeply incensed at the interference of Great Britain with our sea-borne commerce and with the detentions and seizures by British naval ships of American vessels and cargoes destined to neutral ports. Under the accepted rules of international law these detentions and seizures were illegal and indefensible, as were the lists of contraband issued from time to time by the British Government, which included numerous commodities lacking entirely in the qualities which are usually supposed to impress articles with contraband character. Many more Americans were directly affected by these British practices than were affected by the activities of the German submarines.

Thus, while I was convinced that this country would ultimately become a belligerent because of the peril to the world if autocratic Germany were victor, and while my ideas as to foreign policies were based upon this conviction, I, like some other believers in active support of the cause of the Allies, realized that the sensible thing to do was to defer action until, by a gradual process of education and enlightenment, the American people had been brought to a full understanding of the design of the German Government to become overlord of the world.

* * * The notes that were sent (to Britain) were long and exhaustive treatises which opened up new subjects of discussion rather than closing those in controversy. Short and emphatic notes were dangerous. Everything was submerged in verbosity. It was done with a deliberate purpose.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, after the very admirable and devastating remarks of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], I would not trespass upon the time of the Senate were it not for the fact that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], in the course of his remarks, suggested certain things which to my mind require that I make a brief reply.

The Senator from North Dakota paid the Senator from Texas a great compliment. He termed him the "Goliath from Texas." When I contemplate that implied compliment, I do so with feelings of melancholy, because I realize that Goliath was finally slain, and perhaps the Goliath from Texas will be slain now by the little David from North Dakota with his sling and a single stone.

Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota comes back on the floor of the Senate today to reiterate and reaffirm the statement that Woodrow Wilson and Robert Lansing falsified. I wish to point out in the record here the grounds upon which he makes that statement.

The Senator quotes a statement from Lord Balfour. Lord Balfour does not make the categorical statement that the treaties were ever discussed at the White House dinner between himself, President Wilson, Mr. House, and Mrs. Wilson. He says, "I think the secret treaties were mentioned after the dinner." He "thinks."

The Senator also quotes Lloyd George. Lloyd George was, of course, not present, and whatever Lloyd George may have said was from the recollection of something which perhaps was conveyed to him by Balfour and not his own testimony.

Yet it is testimony like that, which would not be accepted before any justice of the peace in North Dakota, which is accepted by the Senator from North Dakota. He rises here and elects to take the hearsay testimony of Lloyd George and the mere expression of opinion of Mr. Balfour against the solemn statement of Woodrow Wilson and Robert Lansing before a committee of the Senate. He chooses to do that because he wants to do it.

Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota in the course of his remarks here today said that Wilson and Lansing had knowledge of those treaties before we entered the war. I remind the Senate that the dinner at the White House to which Balfour referred and to which Lloyd George referred was a dinner after we had entered the war, and if the information was conveyed to them at that time it could not have been conveyed to them before we entered the war.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. What difference does it make whether it was before or after we entered the war?

Mr. CONNALLY. That is exactly the point I am making.

Mr. GLASS. Before we go to war to defend the lives of our nationals, men, women, and children, must we ask every European power whether it has made a secret treaty with some other European power?

Mr. CONNALLY. I was coming to that very point, let me say to the Senator from Virginia. Whether President Wilson and Secretary Lansing knew about the secret treaties after we got in the war makes no difference. We were in the war. We were an ally with the other allies. The Senator from North Dakota says that as we were one of the allies the President of the United States should have divulged and made public to all the people of the United States these secret treaties, which would not only have embarrassed the cause of the Allies but it would have embarrassed our own cause.

Though the Senator from North Dakota may not know it, there are certain standards of ethics as between nations as well as between individuals, and when we were in the war with the Allies their cause was our cause. Yet the Senator from North Dakota would have had us destroy that cause.

As suggested by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], whether they knew of these secret treaties before we entered the war or after we got into the war, why should it have been our duty or why was it in our interest to divulge them to the enemy, thereby giving strength to his arm and causing weakness to our own? But the Senator from North Dakota seems to think it strange that they did not divulge this information. I quote a newspaper article wherein the Senator from North Dakota says that we had no business in the World War. Here is the language. I shall not read it all:

> Senator NYE pointed out that 20 years ago there was as much sentiment against war as there is today and that the election of 1916 was fought out on the issue of neutrality, but that less than a year after the election the Nation was entering a war which was none of our business.

Of course, one who thought that we had no business in the war, that we had no business to defend American rights, would not quibble about the President or the Secretary of State revealing the secret treaties if they knew them.

Mr. President, of course there were secret treaties. Where was there in all this world a sharper voice of protest against secret treaties than came from the throat of Woodrow Wilson? He denounced them before the world. He denounced them in messages to the Congress. He denounced them at Versailles. As was well suggested by the Senator from Virginia, the great labors, the toil, the hardships of Woodrow Wilson at Paris were largely occasioned by reason of his struggle against carrying into execution the secret treaties made before we entered the war.

Yet in the face of such a record the Senator from North Dakota makes the sort of charge he does. President Wilson did more than any single figure in the world to keep us out of the war so long as the patience of the American people would endure it. In 1916, before we entered the war, who was it that lifted up his voice in an appeal to the warring nations to discuss peace, to try to arrive at some basis for the settlement of the world struggle? It was Woodrow Wilson. I have here before me his message to the warring nations, delivered through our Ambassadors. Yet the Senator from North Dakota would have us believe that Woodrow Wilson was secretly conspiring to drive us into a war when he was wrestling as no man ever wrestled in the history of the world——

Mr. NYE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CONNALLY. Just a moment, Mr. President. Let me continue—when he was wrestling to maintain neutrality and to bring about peace as no man ever wrestled since the diplomatic chapters in the history of the world were written.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. NYE. I desire here and now most emphatically to deny that I today or at any time suggested that Woodrow Wilson was wrestling with or by any other method trying to lead the United States into the war.

Mr. CONNALLY. All right. Let us see.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I should like to reply to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to add to what the Senator from North Dakota has said, on our behalf as well as on behalf of the Munitions Committee, that the record of President Wilson's offer of peace to the Allies, as well as the offer of peace to Germany, was put into the record of the Munitions Committee, together with the very gruff refusal of the Allies to even take under consideration the proposal of the United States.

Mr. CONNALLY. And did Germany reply?

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Why did the Senator mention only the gruff reply of the Allies?

Mr. CLARK. Because Germany was apparently very anxious to enter into such an arrangement, according to the record, but the Allies, much to the chagrin of President Wilson and Colonel House, refused to enter into the proposal. I will say to the Senator that the record has been made as complete as the documents can make it complete.

Mr. CONNALLY. All right. The Senator from Missouri says that the refusal of the Allies to consider peace communications was very displeasing to President Wilson. Very well. Yet when he was disagreeing with the Allies the Senator from North Dakota would have us believe that he was secretly planning to drag us into the war. Here is what the Senator said, according to a newspaper account:

> Who led us into war?

I hold in my hand and I ask to print it in the RECORD following the address of the Senator from North Dakota, the message of President Wilson delivered in person to the joint session of the Houses of Congress on April 2, 1917. He there does lead us into the war, but he does lead us into war as the spokesman of an outraged people. He leads us into war as the President of a Republic whose rights had been violated upon every sea where our flag floated. He did lead us into war. But the Senator from North Dakota does not say that Wilson led us into war. He says—

> The bankers—

Look at the headlines—

> The bankers forced the United States into war, says NYE.

The bankers forced us into the war. In other words the bankers dictated the message of Woodrow Wilson of April 2, 1917. These cold, heartless bankers write his message for him as some people have their speeches written for them here in the Senate.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. NYE. Now, I beg the Senator's indulgence to the extent of asking him to agree with me——

Mr. CONNALLY. I thought the Senator was about to say, "I ask the Senator's pardon."

Mr. NYE. I beg the Senator's indulgence to the extent of agreeing that I had no hand in writing that headline. Will not the Senator read the story on which the headline is based?

Mr. CONNALLY. All right. I shall not read the whole story. The Senator did not write the headline, but he sought the headline. [Laughter.] I do not have what the Senator wrote. None of it appears to have been written except some quotations, and I do not have time now to worry the Senate with all that the Senator from North Dakota has written or said.

Mr. NYE. The facts are, Mr. President, that the article under the headline contains no such language as to war as he has quoted.

Mr. CONNALLY. All right. Let the Senator point out where he asked the newspapers to correct the headline.

Mr. NYE. O Mr. President, if I were going to ask the newspapers to correct headlines of paragraphs every time I saw one that was displeasing to me or every time every one was displeasing was called to my attention, I should have time for absolutely nothing else.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the Senator says that he does not have time to correct headlines and misrepresenting newspaper reports. If he had devoted as much time to keeping his own record straight as he had to besmearing and besmirching the record of Woodrow Wilson there would be more verity in the actions of his committee.

The Senator is talking about headlines, he is talking about war profits. He attacks the Senator from Texas because he says that the Senator from Texas is chairman of a subcommittee of the Committee on Finance which has pending before it a bill to prevent war profits, and he charges the Senator from Texas with having neglected his duty. I have here a transcript of a hearing held before this subcommittee at which the Senator from North Dakota was present, and it was there agreed that we would not pursue that inquiry until the present session of the Congress, as I remember it. I quote:

Senator NYE. Mr. Parker—

Mr. Parker is the expert tax man working with the committee—

we asked Mr. Brown and Mr. Oliphant and had assurances from them that the time between now and January 1 would be ample to whip this legislation into that shape that you and the Treasury Department would like to have it in before action was taken by the committee. Do you think that is possible?

Mr. PARKER. I think so.

And so on. It was then agreed that we would not take action until we got that study, and the Senator from North Dakota was present and agreed to it.

Now, Mr. President, we are talking about war profits. I want to ask the Senator from North Dakota how much profits he has made out of Chautauqua lectures exploiting himself as the chairman of the Munitions Committee?

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I suppose the Senator from Texas is seriously propounding that question. I certainly will not deny that I have been the recipient of honorariums for addresses I have made. I should not be prepared at this time to say how much, but I am prepared to say——

Mr. CONNALLY. Is the Senator's income so large that he does not know how much he has received?

Mr. NYE. O Mr. President, I wish the Senator would permit me to answer his question.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am trying to get an answer. I shall wait upon the Senator.

Mr. NYE. I shall be quite happy to prepare myself to advise the Senator, if he is really anxious to know what income has been mine as a result of speaking engagements. In that connection, I wish to say to the Senator that I have filled many more engagements without pay than I have filled engagements with pay.

Mr. CONNALLY. Just tell us of the ones with pay; we shall leave the others out.

Mr. NYE. Nor have I sought a single engagement anywhere in this country or a single opportunity at which to speak. I will confess there have been many more invitations than I have been able to begin to comply with.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. May I ask the Senator from Texas if it is the custom of Senators who head committees conducting investigations to go abroad throughout the country and discuss the testimony before the investigation is concluded?

Mr. CONNALLY. I have never observed that to be the custom in the Senate.

Mr. GLASS. It seems to me that the question of propriety transcends the question of profit.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall say to the Senator from Virginia that there is an old-fashioned theory that members of committees and Members of the Senate who have before them legislative and other matters are supposed to reserve judgment until they have received the evidence, heard whatever arguments may be made, and obtained whatever information may be conveyed before they go out over the country barnstorming for profit. I shall be very glad to have the report of the Senator from North Dakota, and I am sure that the Internal Revenue Service will also be glad to have that report.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas can be assured that any income that is mine will be known to the Internal Revenue Service.

Mr. CONNALLY. We, too, should like to know it.

Mr. NYE. The Senator will have no difficulty in ascertaining it there if he seeks the opportunity.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the Senator give us assurance that he will put it in the RECORD tomorrow, we will say?

Mr. NYE. Will the Senator from Texas offer at this time to insert his 5-year average of income in the RECORD?

Mr. CONNALLY. I should have no objection whatever to doing so.

Mr. NYE. Would the Senator do it?

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Texas has no private income that he objects to the world knowing about.

Mr. NYE. Nor has the Senator from North Dakota any private income that he objects having the entire world know about.

Mr. CONNALLY. I say, in answer to the Senator's implication, that the Senator from Texas would not be afraid or would he hesitate to put into the RECORD his annual income. It would be embarrassing to the Senator from Texas to have to do it; it would embarrass his creditors much worse than it would him [laughter], but he would not hesitate to do it.

Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota said that on yesterday he could not come here and be present in the Senate when the discussion on this subject was going on because he had before the committee some witnesses from New York, Mr. Morgan and others; that they were on their expenses, and he could not afford to have them incur the expense. Think of Morgan and Lamont not being able to pay another day's expenses! But that grinds on the conscience of the Senator from North Dakota, and he does not want Mr. Morgan and Mr. Lamont to spend 1 day's expenses in order that he may be here in the Senate. Then he goes over to the Federal Relief Administration and gets $80,000 relief funds for the Munitions Committee. Those relief funds——

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator from Texas state that the Munitions Committee, created by the Senate, for whose use large appropriations were made by the Senate, actually secured relief funds for the purpose of carrying on an investigation?

Mr. CONNALLY. My authority is the Senator from North Dakota. He said in the Senate a while ago that they were allotted $80,000 but have only spent $68,000 of the W. P. A.—Works Progress Administration—funds made available for a New York project.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

Mr. NYE. I am not going to permit the Senator from Texas——

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President——

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it is a most astonishing statement to me, and I think to the Senate, that funds which have been appropriated for the relief of persons in distress should be sought by a committee created by the Senate of the United States, and the Senate should be put in the attitude of going on relief. [Laughter.] In the name of conscience, has this country and has the Senate come to a condition when committees representing the Senate will disgrace it in such a manner?

I thought the Senator from Texas must be mistaken when he made the declaration, and that no committee of the Senate and no agency of the Senate would think of asking for funds, appropriated by Congress to feed the hungry and clothe the naked, for the purpose of conducting an investigation under the jurisdiction of the Senate, when the Senate had made large appropriations for that purpose and had not refused any considerable sum for which the committee had asked.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. NYE. The Senator will find, with very little effort, that other committees of the Senate and agencies of the Government have enjoyed the same degree of help and benefit from the so-called relief agencies that the Munitions Committee has enjoyed.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, that only makes it worse; it only adds to the humiliation and disgrace of the Senate of the United States to say that it is a somewhat common practice for the Senate or agencies of the Senate to ask relief funds in order to carry on investigations. I trust we have not descended to that level as yet, and, for my part, I think the Senate ought to express not its disapproval but its condemnation of the practice, no matter by whom indulged in.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I simply desire to say that it seems to me to be entirely uncalled for and unnecessary for the Senator from Arkansas to undertake to tear passion to tatters about the manner in which that money was spent.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am not talking about the "manner" in which the money was spent; I am talking about such a practice on the part of a Senate committee.

Mr. CLARK. I understood the Senator from Texas yielded to me.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well.

Mr. CLARK. If he has yielded to the Senator from Arkansas, I will take my seat and speak in my own time.

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from Missouri; in fact, I shall yield to both Senators at the same time, if I can.

Mr. CLARK. I merely desire to explain that that money, as I understand, was spent for precisely the purpose contemplated by the Works Progress Act. It was to provide employment for "white collar" clerical assistants and provide projects on which they could be employed by the Works Progress Administration. The suggestion was made that there were in the city of New York a large number of "white collar" employees who could be used in clerical work, in copying various documents, and the suggestion was made if the Munitions Committee had work of that sort to do that men might properly be taken from the relief rolls for that purpose. The committee merely acceded to that suggestion.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield further to me?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I merely desire to add to what I have said the declaration that I am astonished that the Senator from Missouri should rise on this floor and defend the practice of putting the United States Senate or its committees on relief.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. We may be "hard up"; we may be in difficult circumstances; but, thank God, we have not as yet come to that pass.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield for just one more remark? Then I will not interrupt him further.

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield briefly.

Mr. CLARK. I dare say that the Senator from Arkansas would much prefer a Works Progress project which would consist in "white collar" employees taking papers off one desk and putting them on another and then taking them off of the second desk and putting them back on the first desk, to have such employees engaged in useful projects in doing work which would otherwise be a matter of expense to the Government in any event.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Missouri has been driven into a declaration which I am sure he does not intend and which I am sure his judgment and conscience will not support. I do not think the Senator from Missouri honestly and in good faith believes that the Senator from Arkansas prefers a waste of public money to its provident use. If, however, the Senator from Missouri intends that implication, if the Senator from Missouri has made his mind up to that conclusion, I can only say that, in my opinion, it reflects on his own judgment rather than on the good faith of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK. I promised the Senator from Texas not to interrupt him further, but I will reply to the Senator from Arkansas in my own time.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. I merely wish to say to the Senator from Texas that, as chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, it is my understanding that the last appropriation that was reported to the Senate for the Munitions Committee would enable the committee to wind up the investigation being conducted by it. I did not know, nor did any other member of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate know, that anyone had an idea of putting the Senate upon relief. When the statement was made to me I was so shocked that I called upon the Director and asked for an explanation of it. I learned from Mr. Hopkins that it had come from the city of New York. The result is that the Senate of the United States is in the position of having its work carried on by funds not only of the United States Government but $23,000 of the amount comes from the State of New York and the city of New York to carry on an investigation for the Senate of the United States.

I can think of nothing worse. I intended, whenever the request should be made by the committee for additional funds, as I was advised a few weeks ago it would be made, to present to the Senate the information I had received as to this "project" of the United States Senate, and ask the Senate whether it was willing to vote further funds for the committee. So far as I am concerned, I am opposed to it. I am opposed for the additional reason that when the Senator from North Dakota last presented a request for funds he had on the statement itemizing the amounts needed an amount which he said would represent the cost of writing the final report. The only reason why I then favored the appropriation was that his statement included an amount for the writing of a final report.

Mr. ROBINSON. What was the amount included for writing the report?

Mr. BYRNES. My recollection is that the Senator from North Dakota had estimated it would take $5,000 to write the final report. I thought it a lot of money, but I think at best it would have been about the most valuable expenditure that could have been made by the committee. Had the final report been written we would not have this work-relief project from New York State with the city of New York and the State of New York helping to pay the expenses of a Senate investigation.

Mr. CONNALLY. The report evidently was going to be written in longhand to have cost that much money. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina, or the Senator from Missouri, or the Senator from Texas, or the Senator from North Dakota, or any other Senator what project it was which was originally contemplated in New York to cost $80,000 to put men to work, and which was abandoned in order that the $80,000 might be turned over to the Munitions Committee?

Mr. CONNALLY. I call on the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] to answer that question if he can.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, as one of the Senators from New York, I am entirely ignorant of any such abuse of funds given for the relief of the poor in my State and city. I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina if he will not be more specific. I want to know how the funds came to be given over for this investigation when we have so many distressed people in my community who need help.

Mr. BYRNES. I do not know who induced the city of New York to ask for the approval of a relief project for the employment of "white collar" workers.

Mr. COPELAND. I do not know, but I am going to find out.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the Senator from South Carolina mean to imply that the Munitions Committee has a secret treaty with New York? [Laughter.]

Mr. BYRNES. Oh, no; I do not mean to imply that at all. I am simply stating the facts.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me that I may ask the Senator from South Carolina a question?

Mr. CONNALLY. I am glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to inquire of the Senator from South Carolina, in view of the statements made by the Senator from North Dakota that other committees and other agencies of the Senate were on relief, whether the Appropriations Committee of the Senate has been placed on relief? [Laughter.]

Mr. BYRNES. No; but I may state to the Senator that I heard that statement made a few moments ago. I had never before heard of any such action by any committee. Because the statement was made I have sent a message to the headquarters of the Federal Emergency Relief to ascertain, because if it is true I am in favor of stopping it now, as I believe other Members of the Senate are. Whatever money must be paid for our investigations should be paid by the Senate itself if we can afford to pay it, and if we cannot we should not undertake the investigation.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly.

Mr. COPELAND. Even at the risk of being charged with falsifying the record, I am not aware of this secret treaty with the city or State of New York, and if there is such a treaty I want to have it terminated right now. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank Senators for their interruptions. They are illuminating and have contributed to the enlightenment of the Senate. In other words, the Senate authorized $125,000 to this committee and not one dime more. The committee then, on its own responsibility, obtained $68,000 from some other source.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. I think it should be said for the sake of accuracy that the resolution does provide that the committee may call upon a department for assistance. That has been a customary provision in other resolutions of a similar nature. It has been intended to permit a committee to call upon the Department of Justice, for instance, to assign lawyers to advise the committee, or to permit other departments to assign clerks in the department for certain duties in connection with the work of the committee; but no one ever dreamed that that power would be construed as authorizing a committee to put a Senate investigation in the category of a relief project in the city of New York.

Mr. CONNALLY. If there be a relief project under the Public Works Administration, under the Executive order the funds must go to people who are on the relief rolls.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Not at this moment. I want to use a little of my own time, and then I shall be glad to yield.

The Senator from North Dakota said they had used "white collar" workers. The Senator from North Dakota referred to some lady who had done work in the Department of State, and that she was a professor from some university or college. Is she on the relief roll? Was there any occasion for taking her from a university or a college under the pretext that she was on the relief roll, and putting her on this W. P. A. project? I should like to know how many people got good jobs out of the so-called W. P. A. fund in that way.

I yield now to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. I wish to ask the Senator from Texas if he has any information that has led him to believe that the money taken from the W. P. A. was not expended in accordance with the rules of the W. P. A.?

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, no.

Mr. CLARK. In other words, the money was expended for relief purposes?

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, I suppose so.

Mr. CLARK. It was expended in the State of New York for relief purposes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes; it brought relief to the Senator from North Dakota and possibly to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. Let me say that it brought no relief to the Senator from Missouri, and so far as I know not one person profited to the extent of a penny who was not taken from the relief rolls.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, no; the plain intimation of the Senator from Texas was nothing of the kind. I assume the relief people carried out the provisions of the law. I do not know, but I assume they did. When I said "relief of the Senator from Missouri" I did not mean financial relief. I meant mental relief, relief of anguish on his part and on the part of the Senator from North Dakota. [Laughter.] A man with a pain loves to be relieved. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, we are discussing the expenditures of this committee. It was developed here in the discussion of the matter that $400 is all that remains in the committee treasury. The Senator from North Dakota rose in the Senate today and, with a boldness unprecedented, announced that his committee has 15 days more of hearings, which, of course, will involve the expenditure of more than $400, and that he is going to proceed with the work of that committee. Is the Senate the master of its own affairs or is the Munitions Committee the master of the Senate? By what right does the Senator from North Dakota say, "Regardless of the fact that the Senate has told us we can spend only $400, we shall create a deficit and we shall come back to the Senate and wring from the pockets of the people all we want. We got $125,000 in the open and we got $68,000 on the side. Now we shall get some more whether the Senate wants us to or not."

Mr. President, I desire to close. I have detained the Senate much longer than I had intended. Something was said by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] about the dead men of importance with whom this committee has been dealing. I wish to state for the RECORD the names of the men who now are dead and whose affairs are being investigated by the Munitions Committee.

First of all is Woodrow Wilson. Then follow Robert Lansing and William Jennings Bryan. They are investigating Mr. Bryan's activities. Everyone knows that, like Woodrow Wilson, though not so great, he was an outstanding apostle of peace.

Dwight Morrow. They are dealing with his records and his reputation.

H. P. Davison, partner of Morgan.

Edwin R. Stettinius.

All these men are dead; and if any more dead men can be found their reputations probably will be before the committee.

Benjamin Strong, Governor of the Federal Reserve Board.

French Ambassador Jusserand.

Jacob H. Schiff, of Kuhn, Loeb & Co.

Senator William J. Stone, of Missouri.

Herman Harjes, a partner of Morgan in Paris.

French Minister of Finance Ribot.

Mr. Bonar Law, of Great Britain.

Sir Cecil Spring-Rice, British Ambassador.

Prime Minister Asquith.

This, Mr. President, is the solemn list of the honored dead whom the Munitions Committee would gladly disinter and reveal to the amused gaze of a coarse and common headline-reading public!

Mr. President, I desire to set down briefly in the RECORD a few excerpts from President Wilson's message to the Congress of the United States, setting forth the causes of our entering the war, if the Senate will bear with me:

On the 3d of February last I officially laid before you the extraordinary announcement of the Imperial German Government that on and after the 1st day of February it was its purpose to put aside all restraints of law or of humanity and use its submarines to sink every vessel that sought to approach either the ports of Great Britain and Ireland or the western coasts of Europe or any of the ports controlled by the enemies of Germany within the Mediterranean.

That was one of the causes that President Wilson said gave us the right to fight. That is one of the causes that the Senator from North Dakota says made the war one which was no concern of ours.

President Wilson further said:

The new policy has swept every restriction aside. Vessels of every kind, whatever their flag, their character, their cargo, their destination, their errand, have been ruthlessly sent to the bottom without warning and without thought of help or mercy for those on board, the vessels of friendly neutrals along with those of belligerents. Even hospital ships—

Oh, that the Senator from North Dakota would give ear! I ask him to lend me his ear. It is all I ever expect the Senator to lend me, but I ask him to lend me his ear. [Laughter.]

Even hospital ships and ships carrying relief to the sorely bereaved and stricken people of Belgium, though the latter were provided with safe conduct through the proscribed areas by the German Government itself and were distinguished by unmistakable marks of identity, have been sunk with the same reckless lack of compassion or of principle.

That was one of the grounds for a war that the Senator from North Dakota says was no concern of ours and which he is industriously seeking to besmear and besmut all over with shame and with infamy.

President Wilson said:

This minimum of right the German Government has swept aside under the plea of retaliation and necessity and because it had no weapons which it could use at sea except these which it is impossible to employ as it is employing them without throwing to the winds all scruples of humanity or of respect for the understandings that were supposed to underlie the intercourse of the world.

Listen to this. Lend me your ears, Committee on Munitions! You are concerned with little children and women who must first feel the pinch, the misery, and the agony of war. What does Wilson say?—

I am not now thinking of the loss of property involved, immense and serious as that is, but only of the wanton and wholesale destruction of the lives of noncombatants—men, women, and children—engaged in pursuits which have always, even in the darkest periods of modern history, been deemed innocent and legitimate. Property can be paid for; the lives of peaceful and innocent people cannot be. The present German submarine warfare against commerce is a warfare against mankind.

Here are the ringing words of Woodrow Wilson, saying that it is not the money for which we fight—that can be compensated—it is not Mr. Morgan for whom we fight, but saying that Germany's course is a warfare upon humanity itself, upon the lives of men and women and defenseless little babes; and yet the Senator from North Dakota, if he knows anything, knowing that message, says that Wilson did not enter the war for these causes, but that the bankers' foot pushed us into the war.

Mr. President, I desire to set down by the side of the speech of the Senator from North Dakota these imperishable words of Woodrow Wilson. Let them illuminate the RECORD alongside of his coarse impeachment of the integrity and the purity of character of Woodrow Wilson and Robert Lansing. He need have no fear what the judgment of history will be, the judgment of our grandchildren and their children's children, when they come to peruse that parallel of the language and the life and the labors and the endeavors of Woodrow Wilson, and then observe the coarse insult offered his memory by the Senator from North Dakota.

I am willing, Mr. President, to lay that responsibility of judgment, not only upon the present generation but upon those who are to come after us.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its reading clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 1277. An act to amend section 24 of the Judicial Code by conferring on district courts additional jurisdiction of bills of interpleader, and of bills in the nature of interpleader;

H. R. 1299. An act giving jurisdiction to the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claim of the Cherokee Fuel Co.;

H. R. 1550. An act for the relief of Douglas B. Espy;

H. R. 4436. An act conferring jurisdiction upon the United States District Court for the Western District of Washington to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claims of Alta Melvin and Tommy Melvin; and

H. R. 4799. An act to provide for the reimbursement of certain officers and enlisted men or former officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps for personal property lost, damaged, or destroyed as a result of the earthquake which occurred at Managua, Nicaragua, on March 31, 1931.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9870) to provide for the immediate payment of World War adjusted-service certificates, for the cancelation of unpaid interest accrued on loans secured by such certificates, and for other purposes.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, now that we have settled the causes of the World War, I trust the Senate may give some attention to the matter of paying some of the expenses incident to that war.

Last summer an agreement was entered into in this body whereby the so-called "bonus" bill should have consideration by the 15th of January. That agreement has now been carried out, or is being carried out; and I wish to congratulate the leader on our side, and likewise the chairman of the Finance Committee, and the committee itself, for having the bill now before the Senate of the United States.

Mr. President, I have been for the payment of our soldiers ever since the war was concluded. As a Member of the House of Representatives, I voted for the payment of this debt to them at that time. I helped pass the original bill over the veto of the President. This, I think, is the fourth time a proposed bonus-payment bill has come before the Senate of the United States. I have supported each of them. When my name is called upon the passage of this bill—and I hope I shall be present—I shall cast my vote in the affirmative; yet before that time comes I shall take whatever time I think is necessary to point out what the bill means. The great chairman of the Finance Committee used 40 minutes in an explanation of the bill, and yet I doubt if strangers know what the bill really means. I doubt if Senators know what the bill really means, and my remarks this afternoon will be addressed to the business judgment of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. President, this bill is the Patman bill reincarnated. It is the same bill as the Patman bill so far as the soldiers are concerned, except that it is a better bill for the soldiers than even the Patman bill was. This bill out-Patmans PATMAN so far as the soldiers are concerned.

The Patman bill provided for the full payment of the adjusted-service certificates, and the bill before us grants full payment. The Patman bill provided that all interest should be refunded and rebated. The pending bill would refund and rebate all interest save in a minor capacity, one little item of no particular significance on the floor of the Senate of the United States. My reason for making that statement is that nothing that is worth less than a billion dollars can have the ear of the Senate of the United States.

The bill grants four and possibly five different, distinct bonuses. I am honored to have the attention of the distinguished senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS]. There is at least one Senator in this body who knows what a million dollars is. There may be others; I do not know. I have drawn on my imagination somewhat, and yet my imagination is not sufficient, I fear, to advise me just what a million dollars is.

Mr. President, according to the viewpoint of the Senator from Michigan, the bill before us carries bonus no. 1, in the sum of about $800,000,000, the difference between what the certificates are worth now and what they would be worth in 1945. That is bonus no. 1, from the standpoint of the Senator from Michigan. I have stood for the payment of that bonus. I am for the payment of that bonus now, so I will disregard this particular bonus, but it might be called "bonus no. 1."

Bonus no. 2 in this bill is a bonus in favor of the well-to-do, fortunate soldiers of the United States, I will call them. The bill grants a bonus and an additional gratuity to such soldiers on our rolls as have not heretofore made loans upon their certificates, a bonus to those who hereafter may not see fit to cancel and collect on their second bonds, which they are soon to receive, if this bill shall become a law. That is bonus no. 2.

The Congress has never committed itself to the payment of that bonus. It will not commit itself to the payment of that bonus until this bill shall be enacted; but with the enactment of the bill a second bonus will be granted to those fortunate soldiers who can afford to carry their bonds from now until 1945.

Four hundred and ninety-five thousand of our soldiers have not borrowed on their certificates. It is to be presumed that those 495,000 will not cash the bonds which are soon to be issued to them. If they do not cash the bonds, beginning on the 15th day of next June, these 495,000 soldiers will have new bonds, drawing 3 percent interest from June 15, 1936, until they see fit to cash them, or until 1946, 10 years hence. There is a commitment in this bill of a new bonus to the fortunate soldiers of the Republic. I want Senators to know, when they vote for this bill, that they are voting for a new tax, a new mortgage, a new bonus to the fortunate soldiers of the United States. That might be termed "bonus number 2."

Bonus number 3 is the bonus to the United States life-insurance company. Under the terms of the bill we owe the United States life-insurance company—I will call it that so that we will understand—the sum of $507,000,000. The bill proposes a bond issue in favor of that department or bureau in the sum of $507,000,000, and on those bonds the taxpayers must pay the rate of 4½ percent. That is bonus number 3.

Then, if the bill shall be enacted, we must raise the money somehow to cash bonds under bonus number 1. We have to sell those bonds to bankers. Those bonds must be issued, and they must be sold to someone who has the money, who will buy them, in order to raise the money to cash bonds under bonus no. 1, the bonds the soldiers get. A little bit later in my discussion I will go into these items in detail, and I should be glad to have questions suggested as I proceed. Perhaps in that way we can get a better understanding of what the bill really means. So there are to be three or four different and special distinct issues of money in the form of bonuses to take care of the payment of this amount.

Mr. President, the bill provides for the raising of $2,237,000,000 of new money, and to pay that new money the taxpayers of the Nation are to be taxed, under the bill, more than $4,000,000,000 in order to raise the amount necessary.

In order that I may place the figures in the RECORD upon which I will draw my conclusions, I will give the following: At the present time, from the latest reports I have, there are soldiers in the country, still alive, to the number of 3,518,191. There are not that many soldiers alive now. The record shows that 80 soldiers are dying daily. The period between now and the 15th of June will cover approximately 150 days. Multiply 150 days by 80, and what do we get as a result? Thousands of soldiers alive at this moment will never see these certificates. Eighty are dying every day. One hundred and fifty days hence ten or twelve thousand of these boys who now know the money is coming to them will not be here themselves when the bonds are delivered on the 15th day of June 1936.

Mr. President, I estimate that there are 500,000 soldiers who will not cash the certificates. They have made no loans to date, and the amount of their certificates is approximately a thousand dollars apiece. If 500,000 soldiers do not cash the certificates, and if each of the soldiers has a certificate worth a thousand dollars, there are $500,000,000 that will not be called for immediately, so we will give these 500,000 soldiers 500,000 bonds, each in the sum of a thousand dollars, on which they draw 3 percent from the 15th day of June until they cash them. Inasmuch as they have not up to the present seen fit to cash their certificates in order to make loans, it is presumed that they will have no occasion to cash the bonds for the next 10 years, and that is the bonus I spoke of a while ago as being bonus no. 2.

It will cost the taxpayers of the United States the sum of $173,000,000 to pay the interest on these new bonds which we are not now obligated to pay. We do not have to pay this sum. A different kind of financing can be suggested and arranged to get rid of the payment of this sum of $173,000,000.

It is estimated by some that there are 250,000 soldiers who have made loans who are not now in financial distress. When they get the new bonds drawing 3 percent they will keep them for 10 years, presumably. That will make a total of 750,000 soldiers who will take the new bonds and hold them and draw 3 percent from the 15th day of this coming June until 10 years hence.

Mr. President, that leaves 2,768,191 soldiers who probably will cash their bonds the moment they get their hands on them, and just as soon as they can get the bonds and find the post office or find the bank that will cash the bonds, they will take the bonds to the post office or take the bonds to the bank and get the money on them.

Mr. President, in addition to the bill granting as many as four separate bonuses, it provides for the issuance of three sets of bonds: First, bonds to each soldier of the Nation, 3,518,191, less those who may die between now and the 15th day of June. Bond issue no. 1 will be of the bonds issued to the soldiers of the Nation who are alive.

It is proposed, if I understand the bill correctly, that these bonds shall be issued in $50 denominations. The average amount due the soldiers is $650, approximately. That means that every soldier will get thirteen $50 bonds. Multiply the number of soldiers with whom we have to deal by the average number of bonds each soldier will receive, 13 bonds to the soldier multiplied by the number of soldiers, and we find that the printing office must print forty-five million $50 bonds to be delivered to the soldiers of the country.

I heard this morning about the printing presses starting to run; that if we paid the bonus in one way, it would open up the printing presses. The moment this bill shall become a law, the printing presses must start and print 45,000,000 $50 bonds. But that is not all. If the bill shall be enacted, before the veterans can even think about getting the bonds, they must fill out application blanks. Such blanks will be printed and furnished the soldier as a sort of identification. The soldier will place on the blank his name and his record, the time of entry into the service, his term of service, and the amount of his certificate, how much he has borrowed on it, and where his certificate may be. It will take more than 3,000,000 of those blanks to serve the soldiers in the first instance.

Then, in the second instance, they will get the 45,000,000 bonds, each one of $50 denomination.

Then, when these bonds are issued to the soldiers, more than two and one-half million of them will immediately take the bonds to the post offices or to the banks to cash them. The bill is not clear where they are going to take the bonds. It mentions post offices. It may mean banks. Over 2,000,000 of the veterans, according to the estimates in the report, will take the bonds, probably before they have had them an hour, if during business hours, over to the post offices to get the money on the bonds. Of course, the post offices will not have the money. There is only about $700,000,000 in circulation in the banks of the Nation. These bonds will necessitate for cashing about a billion and one-half dollars in money It will take about a billion and one-half dollars to cash the bonds of the veterans who want the cash. As I have said, there is only about $700,000,000 in all the banks of America. There is not one-half enough currency and silver, all kinds of money that one can spend, in all the banks of America to cash one-half of the amount of bonds provided for in the bill under consideration.

What is going to happen? Well, the banks will anticipate that, and they will send notice to the Federal Reserve banks and will have a great influx of new money, or the post offices will have a great influx of new money.

Where are they going to get this money? It will come from the printing offices. It will have to come from the printing offices. There is no place else to get it. One may think that it will be obtained from the Federal Reserve banks in the various districts. In my section of the country the banks will send to the Federal Reserve bank in Kansas City for the extra money, and in other districts the banks will send to their Federal Reserve banks for the money, because if the bonds are all delivered on the 15th day of June 1936 there will be something over two and a half million soldiers who as soon as they get their envelopes will open them and take the bonds just as quickly as they can take them to some place where they can get them cashed, for they will want the money.

Printing presses, Mr. President! That is only bond issue no. 1.

After the bonds have been issued and put in the hands of the soldiers they will take the bonds to banks or post offices in order to cash them. Where is the money coming from to cash the bonds? The Treasury Department must go into the open market and issue more bonds and sell those bonds to someone in order to raise the money with which to pay the bonds given the veterans. That means that the Treasury Department will be forced to float a new issue of bonds to the extent of about $2,000,000,000 to be sold somewhere on the market to raise the money with which to cash the bonds of the soldiers after they once get them into their hands. That is bond issue no. 2. Several millions of those bonds will have to be printed.

Bond issue no. 3 represents the bonds which the Treasury Department will have to issue to take care of the life-insurance policies in the United States Government life-insurance fund to the amount of $507,000,000.

The first bond issue represents the bonds to be given to the soldiers, the bonds being actually about 45,000,000 in number, each one of $50 denomination. That is bond issue no. 1.

Bond issue no. 2 represents the bonds the Treasury must issue and sell to get the money to cash the soldier's bonds when he comes to the post office or comes to the bank to get his money. That is bond issue no. 2.

Bond issue no. 3 is the 4½-percent issue, issued by the Treasury to be placed in the hands of the United States life-insurance company to make good the policies of the veterans of the Nation which it now holds.

Then, Mr. President, when these bond issues are all out the Treasury must issue a fourth series of bonds to raise the money to pay the interest on the bonds it has now issued. I desire to see if I can make that clear.

There are at least four bonuses. The first bonus is the bonus we are all voting for, the bonus which the veterans are going to receive and the bonus that I am in favor of paying—a bonus in the sum of $2,237,000,000. That is bonus no. 1. Bonus no. 2——

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I am sure there are on the floor many Senators like myself who are interested in the Senator's reference to the large amount of money to be paid to what the able Senator calls the life-insurance companies. If it does not intrude too much upon his time, will he make a definite explanation of what he meant by that statement?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I understand we have a fund to take care of the veterans who have life-insurance policies. During the war, life-insurance policies were issued to the soldiers. I think they were forced to take out life-insurance policies of $10,000 against the event of death, and if they became totally disabled their policies became due immediately and began to be paid. We paid into that fund a large sum of money.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator means to say, I take it, in order that we may all understand, insurance issued by the Government and not insurance issued by private insurance companies?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I called it United States life insurance.

Mr. LEWIS. Very well.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The first bonus is the soldier's bonus for which we all are going to vote, and which we all want to pay. The second bonus is to the fortunate soldiers who will not cash their bonds but who will commence drawing interest on the bonds from the time they get them until they shall cash them. They can hold them for as long as 10 years. These bonds cannot be called for 10 years. The average amount held by the soldiers who have not made loans is about $1,000. Three percent on a thousand dollars is $30 a year. In 10 years it is $300. If this bill shall pass, the Senate will grant the lucky soldier, the fortunate soldier, the soldier not in need, a bonus of $300 more than the Congress committed itself to pay him in 1925.

I am not against the fortunate soldier, but I am not in favor of paying him a bonus of $30 a year on the bonds which he can keep. Under the present law he must keep his bonds until 1945 to get any money whatever, unless he makes a loan. Under the pending bill the total amount of his certificate becomes due, and when he gets the bonds on June 15, 1936, he can keep the bonds for the amount not due until 1945 under existing law, but by the pending bill made due now, and commence drawing interest on those bonds of $30 a year for 10 years. So Senators who vote for that provision of the bill commit the taxpayers of America to pay that added interest. Many of the soldiers pay taxes now. It will not be long until those soldiers will own a vast amount of the property of the Nation, so they will pay a great portion of the taxes of the Nation.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUFFY in the chair). Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. REYNOLDS. The Senator from Oklahoma has just made a statement in regard to those soldiers whom he referred to as the fortunate ones; that is to say, those soldiers who will receive bonds, and, not being in financial straits, will hold the bonds for the period of 10 years, the duration of the life of the bonds, during which time they will be drawing 3 percent; and at the expiration of the period of 10 years they will have drawn $300 each in interest, which $300 must necessarily be paid by the taxpayers of America. I should like to inquire of the Senator as to the total amount that he anticipates the taxpayers of America will be called upon to pay in interest to the fortunate soldiers?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. My estimate, Mr. President, is $173,000,000.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I should like further to inquire as to the total amount of the principal on which that interest will be paid.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Let me itemize it. I estimate that there will be 500,000 soldiers holding certificates of $1,000 each who will not cash the bonds. That makes $500,000,000, at 3 percent for 10 years. Figuring that 3 percent on $500,000,000, that would be $15,000,000 a year, and for 10 years will be $150,000,000.

Then I estimate that there are 250,000 soldiers who are not now in distress, who have heretofore borrowed on their certificates. The average amount due them is about $525. I figure they will keep their bonds and they will draw 3-percent interest on them. So, taking the interest which will be paid the veterans who have borrowed and are not now in distress, but who will keep the bonds, and the interest which will be paid to the 500,000 veterans who have not borrowed, that makes $173,000,000 which we are committing ourselves to pay in interest—something which, in my judgment, we have no just right to do.

Mr. REYNOLDS. In that connection, Mr. President, I believe that according to the statement of the Senator from Oklahoma, if baby bonds shall be issued and in turn shall be handed to the fortunate soldiers to the extent of $500,000,000, we will find $500,000,000 being held by the fortunate soldiers. As the result thereof, $500,000,000 will not be put into circulation. That is correct; is it not?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is correct.

Mr. REYNOLDS. It is my understanding, Mr. President, that many of us who have argued on the floor of the Senate for the payment of the bonus have insisted upon its payment with a view to putting money into circulation throughout the 3,200 counties of the United States in order to help the Nation in this emergency.

I thank the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. I rise because I understood the Senator really was anxious to have questions asked; but I gathered from his statement that he seemed to feel that the United States Government was going to be put to additional expense to the amount of $30 per year, or 3 percent, by reason of every so-called fortunate soldier who kept his bonds.

It seems to me that is not quite accurate, because a bond will also be issued to the soldier who cashes his bond. To pay him, the Government issues a bond for which it will pay practically 3 percent.

In other words, the Government is going to pay 3 percent to the soldier who keeps his bond; or, if he cashes it, the Government will have to borrow the money from some other place and pay practically the same amount in order to get the money to pay the bond which is cashed.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, let me answer that question by asking the Senator from Colorado a question. Soldier A has a thousand-dollar bond; he has not borrowed on that bond up to date; how long will he have to keep that bond in order to get his $1,000 under the present law?

Mr. ADAMS. Until 1945.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Exactly so. Under this bill, on June 15 this year, he gets a new bond for $1,000, which begins to draw interest on that date, and it cannot be callable for 10 years. Then——

Mr. ADAMS. May I add——

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Wait a moment. In 1945 or 1946 how much will Soldier A receive from the Federal Government?

Mr. ADAMS. He will have received the compounded interest, really, because in his thousand-dollar certificate is included interest to 1945, and then, in addition, he will get interest on the interest and on the principal.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, it cannot be denied that Soldier A in 1945, under the present law, would get his $1,000. If this bill passes, it cannot be denied that that same soldier in 1946 will get not a thousand dollars but will get $1,300. Three hundred dollars' interest on that $1,000 bond is payable by the terms of this bill in the event the bill passes.

Mr. ADAMS. The cost to the Government will not be different——

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Oh, yes, Mr. President.

Mr. ADAMS. Because the Government pays the veteran the interest in one case, and in the other case it pays the man who bought the bond from whom money was raised to pay it.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Under existing law Soldier A has to wait until 1945 to get his $1,000. If this bill passes, the same soldier, lucky man that he is—for he has not had to borrow; he is not in distress—gets a new bond, draws $30 a year interest, amounting in 10 years to $300, and so the Government in 1946 must pay Soldier A—the lucky fellow, fortunate man, I am glad we have them—not $1,000 but $1,300.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The only alternative to that is not to pay the bonus at all.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Oh, no, Mr. President.

Mr. BARKLEY. Because it can only be paid——

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Oh, no.

Mr. BARKLEY. Just a moment. It can only be paid by either borrowing money from somebody on the part of the Government and paying at least that much interest on it, or by printing more money. I do not know of any other way in which it can be done except by taxation and raising it all at once, which, of course, is an impossibility.

If I may reply to a suggestion made by my friend from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] a moment ago, that permission to the more fortunate soldiers who have not borrowed on their bonus certificates to carry their bonds over to 1945, or any other year subsequent to 1937, and to draw interest to that extent does not put money into circulation, let me say that there has never been a bonus bill passed by the Congress that compelled any soldier to cash his certificate; it was only permissive; and the 500,000 soldiers who have not borrowed on their certificates would not be required to cash their certificates even if we should pass a straight-out cash-payment bonus bill to be paid out of the Treasury. They could still continue to hold their certificates and not put that money in circulation. So, it seems to me that there is no difference between offering the inducement of 3 percent interest to those who need not cash their bonus certificates, thereby relieving the Government of that much immediate strain, and continuing the present situation whereby they cannot cash them and thus keep the money out of circulation.

It has never been contemplated that Congress should compel the veterans to cash either their bonus certificates or the bonds which will be issued to them under this bill. I agree with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] that it makes very little difference whether the Government pays 3-percent interest to the ex-service men or pays it to some bonding house or banking house that buys the bonds issued by the Government in order to raise the money with which to provide the cash.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, that is a commitment that the Senate has not yet made; that is a charge upon the taxpayers of America the Senate has not as yet authorized, involving a tax bill in the next 10 years of approximately $173,000,000 that must be raised in order to pay the interest on the bonds of the more fortunate soldiers of the Nation.

Mr. President, while one class of our soldiers are getting benefits that the Congress has not heretofore granted, another class are being deprived of interest, and another class have had the interest refunded.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Assuming the Senator to be correct, that there is a fortunate class who do not need their money now and will hereafter draw interest on the deferred payments, that in no way lessens the benefit to those who do need it under this or any other bill who can cash their certificates immediately at face value.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I agree with the Senator from Kentucky, and I am not complaining about the veterans who may take these bonds and hold them. I would be glad if conditions were such that the entire 3,000,000 of our soldiers could get the bonds bearing 3-percent interest and hold them for 10 years. I am laying the foundation for an amendment which I shall offer later, and I am trying to show to what we are obligating ourselves if this bill passes.

The facts I want to place in the RECORD as the basis for my amendment are something like as follows: There are 3,518,191 soldiers to whom we have to pay the bonus. There are that many soldiers who will receive these bonds, less those who will not be with us when the bonds are to be delivered. However, the figure I have given is the number of veterans, according to the latest estimate I have. In order to pay this debt to these 3,518,191 soldiers, we have these figures from the committee report: It will take $1,836,213,950 in the form of bonds to meet the obligation we are about to vote upon the Government. Then an adjustment will have to be made with the veterans because of the difference between the face value of the bonds and the amounts which may be due them. For example, a soldier has coming to him $1,047. He will get a thousand dollars in bonds and $47 in cash. If he has coming to him $515, he will get $500 in bonds and $15 in cash. In order to provide the amount of currency or cash we must pay these soldiers to make up the difference between the face of the bonds and the amount we owe them, it is estimated we must raise $87,786,050.

Then the Government life-insurance fund has a claim against the soldiers in the total sum of $507,000,000. We must pay that; and that will be done by a third bond issue. Then we must pay the banks that hold certificates and for the interest chargeable against them, an estimated sum of $60,000,000. These four sums make a total we must raise to pay the bonds and the necessary cash of $2,491,000,000. That is what we are going to vote for when we vote for this bill—a total expenditure of $2,491,000,000. Luckily, however, we have in the adjusted-service certificate fund a balance of $254,000,000 already assembled. For 10 years Congress has been appropriating money to be placed in a fund to retire these certificates in 1945. We have appropriated about $112,000,000 a year for 10 years; the fund has exceeded $1,000,000,000; but from that fund we have drawn to make loans to the soldiers according to laws passed heretofore by the Congress. So even with the loans made we still have in that adjusted-service certificate fund a sum of approximately $254,000,000. So we start with that nest egg, so to speak. Of the total required amount, namely, $2,491,000,000, we have on hand $254,000,000. That leaves a total sum of $2,237,000,000 which must be raised in some way in order to meet the obligation we are about now to vote upon the people of the country. So, Mr. President, if this bill passes the taxpayers must raise in some form a total sum for the bonus proper of $2,237,000,000.

Item no. 2: As I have explained heretofore, some of the veterans can get along without cashing their bonds. If they do not cash them, we do not have to raise immediately, the money to pay them. I estimate that 500,000 of the veterans will not cash their bonds. That will save us raising immediately something like $500,000,000. Then I estimate that 250,000 veterans who have heretofore made loans on their certificates, but who are not now in distress, will carry their bonds, drawing 3-percent interest. If that is true, we can add what is due them on an average certificate of about $575, which makes a total of $643,000,000 in bonds which will be carried by what I term the fortunate soldier class. Instead of cashing their bonds now they will keep them to draw 3-percent interest. If my figures are correct that will mean an additional outlay from the Treasury of $19,230,000 a year. In 9 years' time it will mean a total interest charge of $173,600,000 which we are now obligating ourselves in this bill to pay, which the taxpayers are not now at this moment obligated to pay.

Item no. 3 is the interest on the bonds which we must issue to raise the money to cash bond issue no. 1. When the veterans receive their bonds they will go to a bank and cash them. We must issue bonds in order to raise the money to enable the banks to get the funds with which to cash the bonds. According to the figures of the report, it will take $1,836,000,000 of bonds to be sold on the open market to raise the money with which to cash the bonds given to the veterans in the first instance. We have to pay interest on that money.

The bill does not mention any second bond issue. The bill does not even carry an appropriation. There is not a penny provided in this bill for any veteran in the United States. There is an authorization in the bill so that hereafter we may appropriate the money, but the bill itself does not carry a single penny of real money, save out of the adjusted-service-certificate fund, to pay any of the veterans.

To raise the money the Treasury must issue bonds. The money is not provided in the bill. It is implied in the bill that hereafter the Congress will make an appropriation in some appropriation bill of $2,237,000,000. When that appropriation is made the Treasury must finance the appropriation. How will it be financed? The Treasury will issue bonds in the sum of $2,000,000,000 and sell those bonds on the open market or place them in the banks in order to raise the $2,000,000,000 necessary to cash the first bond issue. In the meantime we have to pay interest on the second issue of bonds in the sum of $60,000,000 a year—interest alone to be paid on the bonds which must be issued to raise the money to cash the baby bonds.

Mr. President, I am wondering what the term "baby bond" means? I shall be glad to yield to some member of the committee to define what is meant by the term "baby bond."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I suppose the Senator realizes that is a colloquialism applied to the bond because it is of a small denomination. The term has been applied to bonds heretofore issued in denominations of $50 or $100, which have been referred to as small bonds.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. In this bill there is nothing characterizing the bonds or describing them as baby bonds. That is a phrase which has been coined by the gentlemen of the press. I believe they should be called thrift bonds, and at a later time I hope to explain the reason why I think they should be called thrift bonds instead of baby bonds.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. If that is all the reason we are to be given as to why the bonds are called baby bonds, I will let it go at that. I see nothing in these bonds any different from the bonds which we voted and issued in war time to finance the war.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is true, and the committee is not responsible for any nickname which has been given to any bonds issued by the Treasury.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. It happens in the first instance that 45,000,000 of these bonds in number, totaling $2,237,000,000 in $50 denominations, will be exactly of the nature of the Liberty bonds issued and sold to the people of the country during the World War to finance that terrible conflict. A baby bond, as I understand it, is a bond which started small and the older it got the bigger it got. That is not true of these bonds. That is a misnomer. I do not know why some people choose to call these baby bonds. There is no semblance of a baby about them. When they are born they are full grown.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator know of any bonds issued by the Government that grew in denomination after they were issued?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Yes. A man can go down to the post office and buy a baby bond and pay about $9.75 for a bond which ultimately will pay him $10. That is a baby bond.

Mr. BARKLEY. That simply involves the inclusion of the interest in the bond itself. That is true of all bonds. If we do not collect the interest as it becomes due, then the amount due on the bond at any time thereafter is more than the face of the bond.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I can see one element of babyhood in these bonds. Each bond is for $50. A soldier gets a bond that begins to draw 3-percent interest on the 15th day of next June. The soldier cannot cash that bond before a year passes and draw any interest. If he cashes it at once he gets only the face of the bond. If he keeps the bond for a year and cashes it, he gets the face of the bond plus 3-percent interest, or $51.50. If he keeps the bond for 5 years the interest is added to it from time to time. He cannot collect the interest separately, according to the terms of the bond, but must wait for the interest until he cashes the bond. When he cashes it he gets the full face value plus the accrued interest. He cannot get the interest at the end of 12 months or at the end of 18 months. It is not paid semiannually or annually. I have no objection to that plan. That might be some excuse for calling it a baby bond, because the older it gets the bigger it gets. A bond of $1,000 in 10 years increases to $1,300. A $500 bond in 10 years increases to $650. To that extent perhaps the term "baby bond" is justified.

But that is the second bond issue. We must have a second bond issue, and sell that bond issue to the public in order to raise the money with which to cash bond issue number 1. Is not that true, may I inquire of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS]?

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I think that is true. I fail, however, to see any inducement in the bill for the veteran to retain the thousand-dollar certificate for 10 years because the interest is not compounded. If he has any financial wisdom at all, he will cash his bond and get the $1,000 and invest it, and have his interest compounded and paid semiannually.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. According to my understanding of the bonus bill, if Uncle Sam is back of the bill he ought to be put in the insane asylum until he recuperates. If many of our soldiers, when they get their thousand-dollar bonds, should keep the bonds for 10 years in order to get $300 more, those veterans likewise should be placed in St. Elizabeths. They would have to keep the bonds 10 years in order to get the interest. What is the dollar going to be worth in 10 years? Who knows? The dollar is worth less today than it was worth 3 years ago; and if the present trend should be followed, in 10 years' time, while they will get $1,000 all right, dollars, measured in food and clothing and property, will not be worth what they are worth today. The wise soldier who gets his bond will take it to the bank or the post office and cash it as soon as possible, while the dollar is high, and invest his money in property or in something that will not go down in value as the years go by.

Mr. President, we are going to have to issue $2,000,000,000 in bonds, and sell them, in order to enable the Treasury to raise the money to cash bond issue no. 1. We must pay interest on those bonds—3 percent, perhaps. Three percent interest on $2,000,000,000 of bonds is $60,000,000 a year that the Senate of the United States is about to impose in the form of a mortgage upon the backs of the taxpayers of this country. Sixty million dollars a year of interest on bond issue no. 2 to raise the money to cash the first bond issue that we are going to give to the soldiers. Sixty millions dollars a year in 10 years will amount to $600,000,000. If the bonds run 20 years, it will amount to $1,200,000,000 of interest alone upon the bonds the Government must issue and sell to raise the money to cash the baby bonds in the hands of the soldiers.

If I am mistaken in my analysis of the bill, I trust the committee will call me to account. I know the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] knows what the bill means. He may not see fit to take the floor and explain the bill to us, for reasons best known to himself. He knows what the bill means; and if I misinterpret the bill I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Michigan to put me right, because I do not wish to be wrong.

Then we are proposing to issue under this bill $507,000,000 in bonds bearing 4½-percent interest to pay the life-insurance fund. That is a governmental agency; but why should we tax the people on bonds to the extent of 4½ percent to give the money to a life-insurance company, even though the life-insurance company is a Federal agency? We could pay them the money, $507,000,000, and satisfy the bill. Then the life-insurance company management would take the money and invest it as they saw fit. I should like to have someone explain the occasion for issuing $507,000,000 in bonds drawing 4½ percent—at least 1½ percent more than what might be termed a fair rate now—for the benefit of this fund.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I am glad to yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I will state to the Senator from Oklahoma that the reason is that this fund is invested by the Treasury Department for the purpose of paying off its insurance obligations; and to meet those obligations it is necessary to make an annual return of approximately four and a quarter to four and a half percent. The fund would not pan out in an amount sufficient to pay the insurance policies if it did not have that return for that purpose.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the explanation is that we have a fund that simply has to draw 4½ percent in order to protect the obligations against the fund. It is a Federal fund. It is a public fund. The people are back of it. This fund, as I understand, has to draw 4½ percent in order to protect the policyholders. Is that correct?

Mr. COUZENS. That is my understanding.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is a charge upon the people; and, if that is the case, I presume we might just as well put it in this bill and saddle this tax in the form of bonds upon the people for 10 or 20 or 30 years at 4½ percent, because if that is not done it will come before us in some form of appropriation that will have to be met and paid in some other way. Is that correct? If so, Mr. President, here is what this bill means. Let me call it to your attention again.

The first item we are going to have to pay is the bonus bill for which we have all been fighting, the bonus bill we desire to pay, in the sum of $2,237,000,000. That is the amount which the bill commits the country to pay to the soldiers.

Item no. 2: The bill commits the country and the taxpayers to pay a yearly total of $173,600 in interest to which they are not now committed, to be paid to the fortunate soldiers because they do not have to cash in their certificates. They may carry them for 9 or 10 years yet. That is $173,000,000 more.

Item no. 3: We have to borrow money from the banks, have to issue bonds to raise the money to cash the bonus of possibly $2,000,000,000 and pay 3-percent interest a year upon it, amounting to $60,000,000 a year. In 20 years that will be $1,200,000,000 which we are going to have to raise in the form of interest to be paid on the bonds necessary to raise the money to pay the baby bonds.

Item no. 4: We are going to have to raise 4½-percent interest on $507,000,000, perhaps for 30 years. If that is true, the interest at 4½ percent is over $22,000,000 a year. For 30 years' time the total interest would be $684,000,000. Of course, if these insurance policies run for 30 years, we must keep up the fund. That is going to be a charge upon the people. That computation shows that in 30 years we are going to have to pay, in the form of interest, more than the total bond issue amounts to.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator's mathematics is in error.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I shall be glad to be corrected.

Mr. COUZENS. The certificates run for approximately 9 to 10 years only, and the issuance of bonds is a substitution for the adjusted-compensation certificates; so the Senator should not figure on a 30-year period.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Then I shall modify my figures. The Senator from Michigan says I have no justification for inferring that these insurance bonds will run for 30 years. He says they will run for 9 or 10 years only.

Mr. COUZENS. I wish to correct the Senator in that respect. I did not say the life-insurance policies run for that time. I said the adjusted-compensation certificates, which the bonds are to supplant, run for that time.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is correct. Make the new computation, and it will show that this bill commits the taxpayers of the country to raising, over a period of years, a sum of money approximating $4,000,000,000 to pay a debt of $2,237,000,000. If there is no way to do it except to issue bonds along this line, well and good; but what are the facts?

We have in the Federal Treasury at this moment $10,150,000,000 in gold. We have in the Federal Treasury at this moment silver of a monetary value of one and a half billion dollars. Add those two figures, and they make approximately $12,000,000,000 of gold and silver in Uncle Sam's strongboxes, located in various places in the United States. The fact is that at this moment there is only about $5,600,000,000 of real money in circulation. I can give you the figures exactly at 4 o'clock yesterday afternoon by looking in my brief case; but, for my purposes, the total amount is about $5,600,000,000 of money in circulation against gold and silver with an estimated value of around $12,000,000,000.

Mr. President, we can now issue more than $6,000,000,000 of new currency against our surplus gold and our surplus silver and have more than a dollar of gold or silver back of each dollar of the new currency. I am not advocating that we issue $6,000,000,000 of new currency. I have advocated, and am now advocating, the issuance against the surplus of gold and silver of a sufficient sum of new currency to take care of this debt. If that could be done, we could liquidate this debt for $237,000,000 of money. If we do not follow that policy, we are going to saddle upon the taxpayers of America an additional mortgage in the sum of approximately $2,000,000,000.

What would you think, Senators, of some old relative of yours, perhaps in his dotage, of whom you hoped to be a beneficiary, having millions of dollars of property he could sell and millions of dollars in the bank, and having some debts, if that ancient relative of yours should go down to the banks and begin to borrow money on his notes and pay 3- or 4-percent interest on it in order to pay an obligation? You would conspire with your prospective heirs-to-be to see if you could not get that ancient relative put over in St. Elizabeths Asylum for the Insane; and that is where he ought to be.

With the Nation having in its Treasury $12,000,000,000 of gold and silver, with only five and a half billion dollars issued against it, what would Senators think of a proposal to obligate the people of the United States to pay $4,000,000,000 in bonds in order to retire an obligation of scarcely more than half that amount?

Mr. President, these soldier boys will be taxpayers some of these days. They are going to get their money now all right, but if this bill shall be enacted it will place upon the backs of these future taxpayers and the present soldier taxpayers this obligation. Every time they get a dollar they must pay $2 back in taxes over a period of years. These things are not exactly accurate; they are approximately so. If they are not, I yield to my good friend from Michigan, an acknowledged business man, to point out my error—and I think I could see it—and if I do I shall gladly make correction in my address.

Mr. President, there is no occasion for issuing all these bonds. There is no occasion for granting all these useless bonuses. They have not been asked for. Let me now inquire of the members of the Committee on Finance—who came before the committee and asked for a second bonus in favor of the fortunate soldiers of the Nation in the sum of approximately $300 per soldier? I pause for a reply, and I hear none. The committee proposes now to grant bonuses to 500,000 soldiers, and they have not asked for it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator realizes that the bill now under consideration is a substitute for the bill which passed the House. The Senator from Oklahoma could make the same criticism against the bill which passed the House which he makes against the substitute, because that bill provides that on all the adjusted-service certificates which are not cashed there shall be 3-percent interest paid to the holder for the time during which he defers cashing his certificate.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The Senator from Kentucky is absolutely correct, and I had fully intended to offer an amendment to strike that out, if the House bill should come before the Senate.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say to the Senator, in reply to his question as to whether anyone came before the committee and asked for the so-called second bonus, as he has seen fit to term it, that I do not know that anyone particularly came before the committee and asked for it; but those who represent the ex-service men's organizations advocated the pending bill as a substitute for the House bill. They made no particular request, but the bill was satisfactory to them, and in some respects even more favorable to the ex-service men.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I am not criticizing the Committee on Finance; I am complimenting them, because they have done a good job.

Mr. BARKLEY. In that connection I will say that there was no general hearing. We did not feel that it was necessary, since the whole question of the bonus has been gone into time after time. We did have before the committee, as the Senator will see by the report of the hearings, the officers of the Treasury and of the Veterans' Administration, and we called the representatives of the service men's organizations before the committee and had them make the statements to which I have referred.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I am not criticizing the committee; I am complimenting the committee on their efficiency in carrying out the agreement made in the Senate last year. They have gotten this bill out into the Senate. If we cannot understand the bill, that is no fault of the committee. Forty minutes were consumed by the chairman of the committee in explaining the bill.

Mr. President, the committee held executive hearings. I offered an amendment several days ago and had it referred to the committee. I should like to know whether my amendment was even considered by the committee in executive session. Can someone inform me?

Mr. COUZENS. It was not.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Then I am justified in taking some time here to consider my amendment, since it was not considered by the committee.

I was not advised of the hearings. I saw in the press that some hearings were being held, and I am glad they were held. I had no chance to go before the committee to explain my amendment, and these veterans had no chance to go before the committee and explain their desires. But after the bill was prepared it was such a fine bill for the soldiers that, of course, they endorsed it. This is the most favorable bill, from the standpoint of the soldier, that has ever come before the American Congress in a serious way. They get more benefits out of it. They are going to get them now. They will get the payments in full, and they will get the interest rebated, and those who can afford it can take their new bonds and put them away and draw 3 percent on them as long as they do not need the money. No such bill has ever come before the American Senate since I have been a Member of it.

Of course the soldiers were glad to endorse this bill, so far as the money is concerned. But had these same soldiers' organizations the business acumen of the distinguished Senator from Michigan they would not have approved the bill. I do not think they considered how the money was to be raised. They did not consider the taxes that are to be levied upon themselves in future years to pay the dollars they will get now.

It will be only a few years before these soldiers will own the property of the country. They are going to pay the taxes necessary to raise the money to retire these bonds in 2 or 3 years, so that when they get a dollar now they cannot escape paying their part of the $2 to retire that $1 in the future. They did not understand that. I do not know who did understand it. I have seen no analysis of the bill. The press has not carried a very full analysis of it. There is no analysis in the committee report, and I have read the report carefully. It does not explain the details of the bill.

As I said awhile ago, the bill carries four separate and distinct bonuses, and may carry four separate and distinct bond issues. Does anyone dispute that statement? Bond issue no. 1 is in the shape of 45,000,000 papers like the one I hold in my hand, each bond in the sum of $50. The Government must print 45,000,000 sheets like this, each in the sum of $50, and then distribute these bonds to 3,518,191 soldiers. That is bond issue no. 1.

In order to pay these bonds the Treasury must issue a new series and sell them to the banks or someone else in order to get the money to pay the bonds, because these bonds are never going to stop. The soldiers will, when they get the bonds, go down to the post office or to the bank, hoping they can cash the certificates.

Bond issue no. 3 is the bond issue in favor of the Government life-insurance company, the sum of $507,000,000, at 4½ percent. That is bond issue no. 3.

When they get all these bonds in circulation drawing 3 percent and 4½ percent the Treasury must get out a special issue of bonds in order to raise the money to pay the interest on the bonds which are now proposed to be issued under the terms of the pending bill.

There are to be four bond issues and four bonuses. A peculiar coincidence is, as I look upon the committee report, that I find the names of four distinguished Senators there. The committee report on one of the pages contains an analysis of the bill by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr HARRISON], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER], four distinguished Senators. I presume each Senator in preparing the bill had to have his own bonus and each one had to have his own bond issue, because the bill carries four bonuses and four bond issues, and that gives them a bonus apiece and a bond issue apiece. It is lucky that there were only four Senators' names on the report. If there had been more Senators, there would have been more bonuses and more bond issues in all probability. If it were not so serious, it would be ridiculous.

I am caught in a place where I will have to vote for the bill. I will not like to do so. I am glad the soldiers are to be paid the $2,237,000,000, but when I am compelled to vote a tax upon my people in the sum of $4,000,000,000 in order to pay them the full $2,237,000,000, I am going to cringe, it is going to hurt, and it is all uncalled for. There is not a Senator upon this floor—at least I hope there is not—who, if he had $12,000,000,000 in gold and silver, and had notes out against that sum of only five and one-half billion, so that he could issue notes to the extent of $6,000,000,000 more and have a dollar of gold and silver back of the notes, would issue bonds carrying 3-percent interest to pay that obligation, with all this gold and silver money in the bank. I do not think that any Senator would take it upon himself. He should not do it. Then why should we vote to place such an obligation upon the people of the United States?

Someone says, "It will be inflationary." The newspapers have scared the people of America to within an inch of their lives with the one word "inflation." What is inflation? Mr. President, inflation, according to the dictionary, means an unwarranted and useless and unjustified printing of irredeemable paper money. That is what inflation means. Who is in favor of that kind of inflation? Who is in favor of inflation at all? Senators have never heard me advocate printing money unless we have gold and silver back of it to the full amount.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. Will the Senator please indicate to me from the United States daily Treasury statement who owns this gold?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. It is owned by the Treasury of the United States, which means the people of the United States.

Mr. COUZENS. Will the Senator look at the left column and say what that is there for?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I know what the Senator is talking about. It is allocated actually or theoretically on the basis of the $10,150,000,000 in gold; that is true. The Federal Reserve banks have certificates called gold certificates. From their standpoint they are receipts for gold in the sum of six or seven billion dollars of their money; but the money belongs to the Treasury, and all they have are certificates, which they think sometime they will cash and that they will get that gold back. My friend from Michigan is a young man, and I prophesy he will see the time during his life, and not in the far distant future, when the Federal Reserve banks will cash those certificates and take the gold back to their vaults in their banks in Chicago and Kansas City and Denver and other Federal Reserve cities in the United States. It is not theirs now. It is the property of the United States. All they have is a sort of theoretical and flimsy claim upon the gold, which they hope will be a good claim, a claim which they hope later on will materialize. Does that explain the situation to the Senator from Michigan? There is some more of that money hypothecated in addition to that hypothecated to the Federal Reserve banks. There is money hypothecated totaling five or six billion dollars.

Mr. COUZENS. Seven billion dollars.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The Senator from Michigan is correct. The Congress has allocated $2,000,000,000 of that money, gold, to the stabilization fund. That makes $9,000,000,000 of the gold which, in the opinion of some of our citizens, is theoretically or actually allocated. There we have a total of $9,000,000,000. There is a billion dollars and $150,000,000 additional that no one has any claim on. It is that money I am asking to be set aside in the special fund to guarantee sufficient new currency to pay the soldiers and get rid of the four separate and distinct bond issues.

Mr. President, I desire to take up another feature before I submit my amendment. I have tried by the hour to convince some of my friends that there is a distinction between currency and credit. They tell me there is no distinction. Friends of mine tell me that the banks are full of money, and they cannot understand that the banks are really not full of money, but that the banks are full of credit and full of deposit money. They think credit, deposit money, is the same as gold and silver. Tonight the banks when they close will have, say, approximately $50,000,000,000 of deposit money on their books, but tonight when the banks close, 15,000 of them altogether will not have $300,000,000 of real money in all the vaults of the United States. There will not be $1,000,000,000 of real money in all the banks, money of the kind that one can cash a check for and take his money to the railroad station and buy a ticket to his home. That is the kind of money I mean. When I say money I mean cash. When I say cash I mean greenbacks, currency, or silver. Of course there is no gold in circulation.

There is a difference between cash and credit. I have tried by the hour to make my friends understand the difference. I could not so state it that they could understand. Luckily, however, the Wall Street Journal a few days ago came out with an explanation which I can understand, and I am going to read part of it in the hope that perhaps Senators can understand it, if they care to. The Wall Street Journal of a few days ago in an editorial under the title "Ways to Pay the Bonus" explained the way I have suggested, and I will just read one or two lines. They first speak about credit money and cash money. Then they say:

> The essential thing involved in the issue of more currency is that it increases the supply of price-measuring money units.

When more money is put into circulation, more currency, more gold and silver, so says the Wall Street Journal, that increases the supply of price-measuring money units. It takes money to be placed in circulation to increase the number of price-measuring money units. We may place all the bonds in circulation we care to and we will not increase the price-measuring monetary unit a single atom. In 1930 we had $60,000,000,000 of credit money in banks. However, we had only $4,000,000,000 in actual circulation. The dollar was worth 167 cents measured in terms of commodities. I read further from the Wall Street Journal:

> Therein lies the fundamental difference between currency and bank credit. Both function as media of exchange, but only one kind measures prices.

Does anyone have to have an interpreter to understand that statement of the Wall Street Journal? We may place all the deposits in the banks we care to; we may issue all the bonds the printing press can print, but unless we put actual money in circulation we do not increase the price-measuring unit. Conversely, if we issue a few real dollars in currency and put that money in circulation we increase the number of price-measuring units, and as we increase the amount of price-measuring units dollars come down and prices go up. That is what I have been contending for.

Mr. President, the monetary program of the present administration has brought about all which is good which has come from this administration in the way of economic recovery. Devaluation of gold and the wider use of silver has placed more money in circulation. There is about $300,000,000 more money in circulation than there was 3 years ago. As a result, money is more plentiful and prices are higher. Look at the stock reports. The stock reports show the price of hogs as having gone up. Look at the reports on the price of cotton. Look at the price of wheat. Look at the price of pork. The trend is upward. Why? Because we are placing in circulation a few more price-measuring units. Yet yesterday I received from one of the bureaus in Washington a statement to the effect that the dollar on that date, I think, still had a purchasing power of $1.24. So even though we have cheapened the dollar somewhat the dollar tonight in terms of commodities is worth $1.24. That means that the farmers and the miners and the lumbermen and the fishermen and the dairymen, and all others who produce, must produce $1.24 of commodities on an average in order to get a dollar. That is the reason the Budget has not been balanced.

We cannot balance the Budget with high-valued dollars. It is more nearly balanced now than it was 3 years ago, but it is not balanced yet. It cannot be balanced by the high-valued dollar. That is impossible. The only way the Budget will ever be balanced is by cheapening the dollar, raising prices, and letting the people make more money with which to commence paying taxes. If we cheapen the dollar, there will be more profit in raising cotton, there will be more profit in raising wheat and livestock, and when profits increase the taxpayers will have more money with which to pay their taxes, because they will earn more money on which to pay income taxes.

Take, for example, a corporation. It pays no tax unless it earns an income on which to pay it. If conditions are made such that the corporation will begin making money, then the corporation will return an income tax on the money earned. Let us bring about such conditions that people can earn money, and when they earn money they will pay an income tax. We will never balance our Budget until we get the dollar down so that it will be sufficiently plentiful so the people will make money in this country. That is the reason banks are not making loans. Banks are not making many loans in my part of the country. I do not know about other places. The reports show we have less bank loans now than we had sometime ago. The largest single bank in the United States, the Chase National Bank, has less loans today than it had a year ago. Many banks are in the same condition. With the return of prosperity, banks have less loans in their portfolios today than they had 12 months ago.

Why should not the banks make loans? I am not criticizing the banks. The banks do not lend their own money. They lend other people's money. Unless they have a borrower who can show them that a loan to him will make some money for the bank the bank does not care to lend. Unless we get the farmers and the corporations on a prosperous basis, unless we get the people of America on a prosperous basis, they cannot obtain loans at the banks, and we cannot expect the banks to make loans to them under other circumstances. Our good friend Jesse Jones, head of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, is recommending that the banks make loans, and by implication he criticizes the banks for not making loans; but the banks do not dare to make loans until the borrower convinces the bank that it can not only get the principal back but can make some interest, because it is through the interest that the bank makes its profit.

Mr. President, I shall not take very much more time, but some of these facts I must get into the RECORD. These facts are incontrovertible and thoroughly coincide with a theory which I have been trying to present on the floor of the Senate for many years.

When we have plentiful money money is cheap, property is high. When we have a scarcity of money money is high and property is cheap. I want to place in the RECORD some figures from the United States Department of Agriculture relating to the income from farm production in the United States for 1934. I place these facts in the RECORD for the information of Senators. In 1919 money was plentiful, money was cheap, prices were high. One is a corollary of the other. When money is plentiful and cheap prices are high. When money is scarce and high property is low. Money was plentiful, money was cheap, wheat was selling for $2.50 a bushel, and other farm products in proportion. At that time the farmers of the United States had an income of $16,000,000,000 a year. With plenty of money—cheap money—high prices, the farmers had an income in these United States in the sum of $16,000,000,000.

Then the trend changed. Money was taken out of circulation, money became scarce, money became high, prices became low, and in 3 years' time the farm income had fallen from $16,000,000,000 in 1919 to $9,000,000,000 in 1922. The income of the people of the country diminished 50 percent because in that time one-third of the money of the Nation was taken out of circulation. As money became scarce money became high, and the higher went the dollar the lower went property, so in 1922 the farm income was only $9,000,000,000 less than one-third the income of the agricultural class in 1919. That was due to the sole reason that money was taken out of circulation. We had one-third less money in circulation in 1922 than we had in 1919.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator said money was taken out of circulation. Was the actual currency taken out of circulation, or was it a matter of reduction of credits? The Senator was drawing a distinction awhile ago. I ask merely for information.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. It was money. It was the kind of money the Senator must have in his pocket when he goes to the railroad station to buy a ticket to Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. What was the occasion for taking the money out of circulation?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. April 1, 1921—that is as far back as I have gone—we had in circulation a total of $6,207,000,000 according to the report of the Treasury. Then we began to take money out of circulation. The Senator knows how that is done. The Federal Reserve Board served notice on the banks that they had too many loans. Instead of urging the making of more loans they served notice on the banks to collect the loans outstanding. The banks followed instructions and served notice on their borrowers that they could not extend more credit, but that the borrowers must pay the amounts which they owed, or curtail the indebtedness if they could not pay it in full. In 2 or 3 years' time people had paid loans to the banks to such an extent that the banks were enabled to send back to the Federal Reserve bank what they had borrowed. In 2 years' time the amount of money in circulation had been reduced from $6,200,000,000 to $4,300,000,000. In a little more than 2 years' time we actually lost from circulation actual money in the sum of over $1,800,000,000. One-third of the money was taken out of circulation. Money became scarce, money became high, and prices began to fall. Here is the report of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. ADAMS. Does the Senator have the figures to show how the money supply in that year compared, for instance, with the money supply 1929, 1930, 1932, and 1933?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I do not have all the figures, but I have many of them. I can give some at random. In 1932, when prices were the lowest under Mr. Hoover, we had about the smallest amount of money in circulation we had had for many years. Actual money was not to be had. When the crisis came in the latter part of 1932 the banks saw that they were in a shaky condition, and they began to urge the Federal Reserve Board to put more money into circulation. When the present administration came into office in 1933 the banks had the largest sum of money in their vaults they had ever had, but they were guarding that money with all the zeal they could command. They would not permit it to go into actual circulation. It was out of the Federal Reserve System, it is true, but it was not in circulation where anybody could get it. For practical purposes it might as well have remained in the Federal Reserve banks except for the additional assurance it gave the member banks that in case of a run they could meet it and would have the money with which to pay their depositors.

Mr. President, it is 5 o'clock. I wish formally to offer my amendment. It was offered the other day for the RECORD and was ordered printed, and the original copy was referred to the Finance Committee, but the Finance Committee apparently have never discovered it in their files. Because of that fact I am forced to take a little time to explain it so the members of the Finance Committee, at least, may know what it contains, and that other Members of the Senate may know.

I am not complaining. I know how the committee members are rushed, and I compliment them for having the bill reported. I know the psychology here. I have used a good deal of time on the floor of the Senate. Senators know my views. Any time I take a position the Finance Committee say "that position is not tenable", and they do not give it any consideration. They did that for 4 or 5 years on the money question, and finally we got a bill through that has done about all the good that has been accomplished by this administration. I suggest to those who saw fit to criticize me that my amendment is the only one that has been sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States. The others are all in the graveyard.

Under my amendment we have already made a profit of $2,800,000,000, which is in the Treasury. If the dollar were revalued now, as it could be revalued, 10 percent further, that would be another billion and a half dollars in profits that could be made, and still the dollar would be higher than it will be a few years from now. This is prophecy. I cannot prove it. It is my assertion. Time will tell.

Mr. President, there is a way to pay the bonus without issuing $45,000,000 bonds in the first instance—not $45,000,000 in bonds, but 45,000,000 actual pieces of paper, printed on one side with pink and on the other side with green. Then, if you follow my amendment, it will not be necessary to have bond issue no. 2, in the sum of $2,000,000,000, to raise money to cash the first bond issue. If you will accept my amendment, you will not have to have bond issue no. 3 to the life-insurance fund. You can pay the life-insurance officials in cash, and let them invest the money as they see fit. Then, if you accept my amendment, you will not have to issue any bonds in the future to raise money to pay the interest on these bonds—four bond issues, perhaps. It will get rid of them.

We have the gold and silver. It is not being used. We may issue currency against it. That is not inflation. Nobody contends that that is inflation. If that would be inflation, Mr. President, if my good friends from the West—Colorado, Utah, or Nevada—should strike gold mines in some of the mountains out there, and bring into the market, say, $100,000,000 in gold and have it coined into gold dollars and $2½ pieces and $5 and $10 and $20 gold pieces, and if they saw fit to put those gold pieces in circulation, that would be inflation. Issuing currency against gold and putting the currency in circulation is no more inflation than coining gold or $5 or $20 pieces and putting them in circulation; but the public have been scared. I do not know whether they know the facts or not. I think some of them do not. I know that most of the newspapers do not know. Some of them do. The Wall Street Journal knows; but here is a secret about the matter:

The bondholding class, the big-banker class, are not willing that the public shall know how they can finance their Government. They are not willing that the public shall know that we can issue money against the gold and silver in our Treasury and pay our bills, and that that would not be inflation. They are trying to make it appear that it would be inflation if we should issue paper money against our surplus gold and silver and place that currency in circulation.

But, Mr. President, my amendment does not direct the administration to issue paper money against our surplus silver. It does not even direct the administration to issue paper money against our surplus gold. It gives them the power to do it. If my amendment should be adopted, the Treasury Department could issue new currency against the surplus of about seven hundred millions of our billion and a half of silver. The Treasury Department could issue currency against the billion and a half of surplus gold. They would not have to do it. It is discretionary under the amendment; but there is another provision in the amendment that in the event they do not see fit to issue currency against that surplus gold and silver they can issue bonds—only one issue of bonds. There would be no bonds to go to the soldiers, 45,000,000 in number; there would be no bonds issued to raise money to cash bond issue no. 1; there would be no bonds issued at 4½ percent to go into the life-insurance fund; but the Treasury Department could issue bonds and place them in the 12 Federal Reserve districts, putting enough bonds in Kansas City to pay the soldiers of the Kansas City district, putting enough bonds in New York to pay the soldiers in the New York district, and so throughout the other 10 districts. Instead of selling these bonds to the banks and paying them 3-percent interest, we could put those bonds in the banks on a contract basis.

Mr. Morgenthau said a couple of days ago that he is now borrowing money for three-eighths of 1 percent for a year, even though the terrible amendment passed in 1933 was going to "wreck the credit of the Government." It passed; it has operated; and after 3 years of operation under that terrible amendment offered by myself in collaboration with the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], and others on this floor, the credit of the Government is so good that we can now borrow money for three-eighths of 1 percent a year, and the call rate in New York is only three-fourths of 1 percent.

The Federal Reserve banks are presumed to be agencies of the Government. If not agencies of the Government, they are certainly agencies of the public. My amendment makes these 12 banks agencies of the Federal Government; and the only purpose for which I want the banks to operate is to take the public credit as a machine, run this credit through the machine, and make it available to the Treasury to pay the soldiers the amounts due them.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. So far as the credit of the United States Government is concerned, is it not a fact that at the present time no Government security is selling below par? Some Government bonds are selling as high as 114; and is it not a further fact that as late as 1932 some Government securities were selling as low as 82?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The Senator is exactly right. I think 82 was about the minimum figure. At that time I remember that some of the banks that had Government bonds up as security were being called upon by the Government to put up more bonds to secure deposits, and the Treasury Department made a ruling that inasmuch as these bonds were Federal bonds, they should be held at par as security; but I remember that they were down 15 or 17 points below par.

So, Mr. President, the credit of the Government now is not impaired. This so-called money that we are going to get does not exist, except in imagination. The banks take the bonds of the United States and put them in their portfolios or in their vaults. Then they write on their books a credit of the amount of the bonds, and they serve notice on the Treasury that "you may draw on this bank for that amount of credit." There is no money back of the bonds; but the bank, if it so desires, may take the bonds to the Federal Reserve bank and get dollar for dollar on the bonds.

So, Mr. President, my amendment provides an alternative plan discretionary with the Treasury. First, the Treasury could issue silver certificates if it wished to do so. It would not have to do it. The Treasury could issue gold certificates if it wished to do so. It would not have to do it. It could resort to bonds, print $2,237,000,000 in bonds, put those bonds in the 12 Federal Reserve banks, and the banks would take the bonds and give the Government credit for the amount of the bonds.

Then, instead of paying the banks 3-percent interest, $60,000,000 a year—they would be using the public credit, not their own; they would not have any money; it would be only a credit—instead of paying them 3-percent interest, we could pay them a service charge. It might be as low as three-eighths of 1 percent. That is the service charge on which the Treasury is getting its money at this time. That is not only a service charge but it is interest in addition. The institutions that loan the Government money today at three-eighths of 1 percent have been paying the cost of loaning that money out of the three-eighths of 1 percent, and if there be any profit they get the profit. So it is presumed that the banks can loan money today at three-eighths of 1 percent and get cost first, and a profit second. Otherwise the banks would prefer to keep the money in their vaults and take no chance whatever.

If we can borrow money today at three-eighths of 1 percent for a year, why can we not place these bonds in the Federal Reserve banks, and secure credit against those bonds, and use that credit to pay the soldiers? That is what we are going to pay them with anyway. The only question is a matter of interest.

The present law provides for our appropriating $112,000,000 a year, putting that into a fund, and at the end of 10 years the fund will be enough to pay the face of the certificates. We can let that law stand; we can cut the annual appropriation from $112,000,000 down to $100,000,000, and appropriate $100,000,000 a year for 10 years. That will be a smaller annual appropriation in the next few years than there has been in the past 10 years—$100,000,000 a year. In 20 years that would be twenty hundred million dollars, or two billions, the full amount of the necessary appropriation. We can pay these certificates through this process with an appropriation of $100,000,000 a year, less than the interest we are going to pay on the multitude of bonds that this bill is placing upon the backs of the taxpayers of America.

Somebody may say, "The banks may not accept such a proposition on the basis of a service charge." The administration has the power to issue currency against the silver and against the gold in the Treasury; and with that power in the hands of the administration, the Federal Reserve banks will be glad to get some profit on the bonds in order to make this credit available. We should have to pay a rather heavy service charge the first year, perhaps, because they would have to furnish this twenty hundred million dollars. Subtracting $100,000,000 for the first year leaves nineteen hundred million dollars. In 10 years we should have paid off ten hundred million dollars, and the service charge would be cut in half. At the end of 19 years there would be only $100,000,000 left, and the service charge would be nothing.

This is the cheapest possible plan by which to pay the soldier bonus, and if this plan should be accepted, the taxpayers of the United States would be saved approximately $2,000,000,000 in taxes during the next 10, 15, or 20 years.

Mr. President, I am for the bill, so far as the soldiers are concerned, but I am certainly against the bill so far as the taxpayers are concerned. But having been an advocate of the soldiers' bonus for 10 years in the House and Senate, as I said a while ago, I am caught with this terrifically unjust and unfair and burdensome bill, so far as the payment is concerned, and I may have to vote for it.

We do not have to do this. The United States Senate is supposed to be a Senate of businessmen. That may be a violent presumption, but I will not concede it as yet. I know there are some businessmen here. There may be some Members of the Senate on relief, but they certainly are not all on relief as yet. If I thought the Senate was on relief, I would not take an hour of its time to explain a business proposition, but I am not convinced that any of the Senators are on relief, notwithstanding what has been said here this afternoon. I think the Senate can pass upon this matter from a fairly sane, conservative, business standpoint.

I am surprised to see the large income-tax payers and the large corporation-tax payers in favor of the issuance of more bonds, settling additional mortgages upon their property, necessarily increasing the income taxes upon the corporations and necessarily increasing the income taxes upon the individuals of the Nation. It is not necessary, and it should not be done.

Mr. President, I submit the amendment. I do not know whether the Senate desires to remain in session longer this afternoon. If not, I will not ask that the amendment be read today, but I want it offered, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD at the close of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amendment proposed by Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma to the bill (H. R. 9870) to provide for the immediate payment of World War adjusted-service certificates, for the cancelation of unpaid interest accrued on loans secured by such certificates, and for other purposes, viz: On pages 11 and 12, strike out section 4 and insert the following:

TITLE II—APPROPRIATION AND FINANCING

SECTION 4. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,237,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay the balance due on the adjusted-service certificates as authorized in section 8 of this act.

SEC. 5. In order to supplement the amounts in the adjusted-service certificate fund, which are hereby appropriated and made immediately available to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs for making the payments authorized in this act, the President may, in his discretion, direct the Secretary of the Treasury to use any one or more of the following methods for the purpose of providing funds for making such payments:

(1) The issuance of silver certificates as provided in section 6.

(2) The issuance of United States notes as provided in section 7.

(3) The issuance of bonds of the United States as provided in section 8.

SEC. 6. (a) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to issue additional silver certificates in an amount sufficient to bring the amount of such certificates outstanding up to the full amount of the monetary value of all silver bullion heretofore or hereafter acquired by the United States.

(b) The silver certificates issued pursuant to this section shall be made available to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs in such manner and under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, and the certificates so made available shall be used by the Administrator solely for the purpose of making the payments authorized in this act.

SEC. 7. (a) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to issue United States notes in such denominations as he may prescribe against any free and unpledged gold in the Treasury of the United States to the extent that the President directs that such notes be issued for the purpose of making the payments authorized in this act.

(b) The United States notes issued pursuant to this section shall be made available to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs in the same manner and shall be used for the same purpose as the silver certificates issued pursuant to section 6.

SEC. 8. (a) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to issue from time to time bonds of the United States which shall be delivered to the Federal Reserve banks as hereinafter provided. Such bonds shall be payable on or before 20 years from their respective dates of issue, and shall bear interest at a rate per annum to be agreed upon by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Federal Reserve bank to which such bonds are to be delivered, but such rate shall be based upon a reasonable charge for the services to be performed by such bank in connection with the payments authorized in this act. The total amount of such bonds shall not exceed the total amount of such payment that the President directs to be made by the method provided in this section.

(b) Upon the receipt by the Secretary of the Treasury of a statement from the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs containing an estimate of the amount of such payments to be made in any Federal Reserve district, the Secretary shall deliver to the Federal Reserve bank of such district bonds issued pursuant to subsection (a) of a face amount equal to such estimate. Upon the receipt of any such bonds the Federal Reserve bank shall credit to the account of the United States an amount equal to the face amount of the bonds so received and the Secretary of the Treasury shall notify the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs that such credit has been established and the Secretary shall make such credit available to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe. Thereafter such payments within such Federal Reserve district may be made by the Administrator by check drawn against such account. Such estimates may be revised from time to time, and if the amount of bonds so delivered to any Federal Reserve bank shall exceed the amount of the payments required to be made by the method provided in this section in the Federal Reserve district in which such bank is located, bonds in the amount of such excess shall be returned to the Secretary of the Treasury for cancelation.

(c) For the purposes of this section, each Federal Reserve bank is hereby made a special financial agent of the Government.

(d) Bonds issued for the purposes of this section shall be issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, subject to rules and regulations to be promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury and subject to the limitations of this section.

(e) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year, beginning with the fiscal year ending July 1, 1937, such amounts as will, within a period of 20 years from the date such bonds are issued, be sufficient to provide for the payment of the principal of such bonds and the interest or service charge thereon as provided in this act. All amounts appropriated for the purposes of such payment shall be set aside in a special fund in the Treasury and shall be allocated and prorated immediately among the several Federal Reserve banks on the basis of the amount of such bonds held by such banks. As soon as practicable after the making of any such allocation, the amount in such fund allocated to each such bank shall be used to pay for the bonds held by such bank, and the bonds so paid for shall be retired and canceled under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I feel quite sure that we cannot make any further progress this afternoon, many of the Senators having left the Chamber, and being anxious to dispose of the pending legislation as soon as possible, I submit the following request for unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business today it take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow; and that after the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. tomorrow no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes on the pending bill, or more than once or longer than 30 minutes on any amendment to or motion relating to the bill.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think I may speak for the Republican Members of the Senate. I hope the request will be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting several nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

He also, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported favorably the nomination of Martin E. Kelly, of Montana, to be State engineer inspector for the Public Works Administration in Idaho and Montana.

Mr. PITTMAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported favorably the following nominations:

John Van A. MacMurray, of Maryland, now Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to Turkey, vice Robert P. Skinner;

Arthur Bliss Lane, of New York, now Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Nicaragua, to be Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania, vice John V. A. MacMurray; and Boaz Long, of New Mexico, to be Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Nicaragua, vice Arthur Bliss Lane.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

If there be no further reports of committees, calendar is in order.

NATIONAL EMERGENCY COUNCIL

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Lyle T. Alverson, of New York, to be acting executive director of the National Emergency Council.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask that this nomination go over for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination will be passed over.

RESETTLEMENT ADMINISTRATION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Cal. A. Ward, of Kansas, to be regional director of the Resettlement Administration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

WORKS PROGRESS ADMINISTRATION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of E. A. Pynchon, of Florida, to be State administrator for Florida.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Victor F. Ridder, of New York, to be administrator for the city of New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

PUBLIC WORKS ADMINISTRATION

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Public Works Administration.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that these nominations be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Charles O. Yelverton to be postmaster at Bay Springs, Miss., which had been reported adversely by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, there is an adverse report on this nomination, and I ask that it be not confirmed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the Senate advise and consent to the nomination? [Putting the question.] The noes have it, and the nomination is rejected.

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that the nominations of postmasters for Minnesota, which the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE] has asked go over, be passed over, and that the other nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations will be confirmed en bloc, with the exception of the nominations relating to Minnesota, which will be passed over.

COAST GUARD

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations for promotions in the Coast Guard.

Mr. COPELAND. I ask that these nominations be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

MARINE CORPS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations for promotions in the Marine Corps.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that the nominations for promotions in the Marine Corps be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc. That completes the Calendar.

RECESS

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate, under the order previously entered, took a recess until tomorrow, Saturday, January 18, 1936, at 12 o'clock meridian.

REJECTION

Executive nomination rejected by the Senate January 17 (legislative day of Jan. 16), 1936

POSTMASTER

MISSISSIPPI

Charles O. Yelverton to be postmaster at Bay Springs, in the State of Mississippi.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, JANUARY 17, 1936

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, O loving Father, that we are not alone praying and longing for a better world. We praise Thee that love is a divine power; O let it be destined to fill the whole earth with its kind. While it is loveless in so many places, we entreat Thee to give us patience to labor on. With triumphant faith strengthen us in the spirit of self-forgetfulness that we may spill it over in the lives of others in good works and good cheer, always keeping our lips clean and our hearts pure. Blessed Lord God, may we aspire to a life so simple, so natural, and so brotherly that we shall be able to enter into sympathetic relations with man everywhere. Do Thou equip us for the gladsome and effective discharge of our duties this day. In the name of our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 1299. An act giving jurisdiction to the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claim of the Cherokee Fuel Co.;

H. R. 1550. An act for the relief of Douglas B. Espy;

H. R. 4436. An act conferring jurisdiction upon the United States District Court for the Western District of Washington to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claims of Alta Melvin and Tommy Melvin; and

H. R. 4799. An act to provide for the reimbursement of certain officers and enlisted men or former officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps for personal property lost, damaged, or destroyed as a result of the earthquake which occurred at Managua, Nicaragua, on March 31, 1931.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 4178. An act for the relief of the International Manufacturers' Sales Co. of America, Inc., A. S. Postnikoff, trustee.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 1162. An act to regulate the business of making small loans in the District of Columbia, and to amend an act to regulate the business of loaning money, etc., approved February 4, 1913;

S. 2424. An act to provide for the establishment and maintenance of a central research and experiment station of the Bureau of Mines at Salt Lake City, Utah;

S. 2804. An act to authorize the payment of retired pay to William Mitchell;

S. 2953. An act to provide for the inspection, control, and regulation of steam boilers and unfired pressure vessels in the District of Columbia:

S. 3093. An act to provide funds for cooperation with Sanish School District No. 1, Mountrail County, N. Dak., for extension of public-school buildings to be available for Indian children;

S. 3284. An act to provide for the issuance of a license to practice the healing art in the District of Columbia to Dr. Dexter P. Reynolds; and

S. 3467. An act amending the Shipping Act, 1916, as amended.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns after the consideration of the bill now before the House we adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CATHERINE A. LEICH

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 392

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to Catherine A. Leich, daughter of John W. Leich, late an employee of the House, an amount equal to 6 months' compensation, and an additional amount, not to exceed $250, to defray funeral expenses of the said John W. Leich.

The resolution was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 4 minutes.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what does the gentleman want to talk about?

Mr. RICH. I should like to talk about the enforcement of the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. MONAGHAN. I am constrained to object, Mr. Speaker. The gentleman should get time under general debate.

NEUTRALITY AND ESSENTIAL COMMODITIES

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, during these days, when the attention of the world is being attracted toward the question of neutrality and its consequent embargoes of commodities essential to war, it would be well if we were to examine critically, our own situation in respect to some of those essential commodities, of which we may some day be in dire need. What is going to be the ultimate result of neutrality upon the armament of the world?

Since the fundamental law of human nature is that of self-preservation; it will naturally follow that each nation will exert itself to the utmost to perfect its own internal system of national defense. It is barely possible that neutrality, universally applied, may promote world peace, for a short time; but it will not result in a reduction of national armaments—the opinions, hopes, or promises of pacifists, communists, or exponents of world-wide brotherhood, notwithstanding—but it will certainly result in increasing them. To hope for anything else would only admit an ignorance of human nature—the most unchangeable factor in the world since Genesis.

Each nation will make every effort to become as nearly self-sufficient as possible, because they will realize that a war will interrupt normal trade to such an extent that they will be denied commodities essential to the life of the Nation both industrial and militaristic in time of peace or in time of war. This they will do by developing internal resources, or by storing, or by both. The result of a policy, such as the above, upon commerce and industry in general, will be more far reaching and more serious than we are calculating upon. The puny attempts of man to interfere with the natural economic laws of the world have more often than not been failures and have been followed by dire consequences. It is entirely possible that neutrality may prove to be too high a price for peace.

In these days of modern armaments who can define a munition of war? Certainly the term cannot be limited to lethal weapons alone. Many commodities essential to peacetime needs are just as essential to wartime needs, either converted or not. Then, too, a nation can be reduced commercially as well as by the force of arms. Indeed, the commercial reduction is usually a necessary preliminary to the reduction by force of arms, and is usually accomplished by a blockade, which is nothing more than an embargo. Commercial warfare is quite often carried on in a far more ruthless manner than is lethal warfare and its results are more permanent.

Contrary to popular belief, we are by no means a self-sufficient nation. Far from it. A survey of our national resources shows that we are dependent upon importation of much raw material necessary to our industrial life during time of peace and essential to the very life of the Nation in time of war. Time and space do not permit me to discuss all of these commodities at this time; but I do wish to discuss one of the most important of them—tin.

Tin is a metal which, in the virgin state, is not produced in this Nation. We do have within our borders small deposits of low-grade tin ores; but the extraction of tin from these ores is so expensive as to be prohibitive. Since we have been a Nation we have produced less than 1,500 tons of virgin tin. Our normal requirements are about 67,000 tons a year, or nearly 200 tons per day. From all present indications, it does not appear as if we can ever become self-sufficient in this commodity and must continue to rely upon foreign sources. If for any reason we are ever denied the freedom of the seas, or denied tin because of an embargo, we will be forced to rely upon our domestic sources, or do without. Commercially or economically it is unpleasant to contemplate either of these contingencies. We are precariously situated in respect to this most essential commodity, which contributes so much to our industrial life; because, while producing none, we consume about one-half of the output of the world, but the supply and the price are fixed by a production-control foreign cartel, in which we have no voice.

We obtain our principal supply of virgin tin today from four sources: The Federated Malay States, the Dutch East Indies, Nigeria, and Bolivia; mostly, however, from Malay. Bolivian tin must be obtained from Great Britain, where it is smelted. Great Britain controls 52 percent of the world's tin deposits and has had commercial control over 82 percent. It is believed that Great Britain, alarmed at its own critical position, recently exerted pressure upon the cartel to permit increased-quota mine production. At any event, the needs of those nations controlling supplies would naturally be given preference in a crisis.

As an example of the power of this production-control foreign cartel to fix prices I cite the following: At the end of 1931 the visible warehouse stocks of tin in the United States were 6,254 tons, and the price was 21 cents per pound. By November 1935 these stocks had dropped to 265 tons (about 1½ days' supply), and the price was 53 cents per pound. The price had been boosted by a process of starvation. Only the eastern silver situation prevented the price from going much higher. On January 1, 1932, the total world's visible supply of tin, including stock held in the Straits Settlements, was 58,336 tons. On January 1, 1936, this total was but 15,318 tons, of which 10,205 tons was afloat; 1,023 tons was stocked in the Straits Settlements, and the stock in United States warehouses, available for immediate use, was but 120 tons.

Since adjournment of the last session of Congress the costly and dangerously dependent position of the United States with respect to its supply of tin has been well demonstrated. Some conception of the gravity of the situation can be had from the following excerpts from the American Metal Market, a New York daily publication, and recognized authority on metals statistics:

TENSE SITUATION ON TIN FOR PROMPT AND OCTOBER DELIVERIES

Consumers * * * who have been buying from hand to mouth and who need tin for prompt and early October requirements are in a very uncomfortable position. (Issue Oct. 8, 1935.)

PRESSING DEMANDS AND SCARCITY OF SUPPLIES CAUSE FURTHER SHARP ADVANCE IN TIN PRICES

Very few of the dealers, importers, or, for that matter, producers and smelters * * * have * * * spot stocks. The November position is not at all comfortable. (Issue Oct. 11, 1935.)

ACUTE SCARCITY FORCES SPOT TIN TO YEAR'S PEAK

The tin situation, particularly as it relates to prompt, October and early November deliveries, has become still more acute. There seems to be no prospect of early relief for there is no surplus tin in England or on the Continent that can be obtained for prompt shipment to New York. (Issue Oct. 12, 1935.)

TIN MARKET TAKES ANOTHER JUMP UPWARD

The spot-tin situation both in London and New York seems to be getting more acute every day. (Issue Oct. 15, 1935.)

MARKET STRONG WITH NO RELIEF IN SPOT AND NOVEMBER SITUATION

Buyers have actually got to hunt for even 5- or 10-ton lots. (Issue Nov. 1, 1935.)

STOCKS IN ENGLAND AND UNITED STATES LOWEST ON RECORD—FURTHER INCREASE IN SPOT PREMIUM

Stocks are * * * the lowest they have been at any time during the present century. (Issue Nov. 2, 1935.)

There is no telling from one day to the next what quantities of spot and November tin can be had, and at what prices. (Issue Nov. 9, 1935.)

SHORTAGE ON TIN SUPPLIES AGAIN CAUSES INCREASE IN SPOT PREMIUM

The pinch in spot supplies has again become very acute in the London market. The spot premium has jumped to £21 10s., which is about as bad as anything that we have seen in the past. (Issue Nov. 13, 1935.)

Although so far no mine has been located or developed in this country to produce substantial quantities of tin ore, we have the equivalent of a mine in the refuse material of our large industries making and using tin plate, which refuse is commonly called tin-plate scrap. Years ago, before the present reclaiming industries were developed, this refuse material was always a source of great annoyance to the producers, especially when the plants were located in cities where it was not always easy to find a dumping ground for the refuse which accumulated and had to be removed. Several detinning enterprises were started to accumulate the tin-plate scrap and to separate and recover the tin from the steel base, but most of them went out of business after a short time.

The detinning plants which are operating in this country today are producing annually several thousand tons of tin, as pure as the best tin imported into this country from abroad. Since 1919 reclaimed tin has averaged 27 percent of our consumption, and in 1928 it rose to 48 percent. The quantity of tin produced in this country by this industry is large in proportion to the total tin consumed; it can, in case of emergency, easily be increased when the used tin cans are collected systematically, which latter in ordinary times are rotting away on the city dumps.

The can-making industry, which is the largest producer of this refuse called tin-plate scrap, has always been interested in having the material moved away from its plants. Thirty-five or forty years ago the producer often had to pay to have the material moved, but during the last 25 or 30 years he invariably was able to find a market where he could sell his refuse.

Up to about 4 years ago nearly all the tin-plate scrap produced in this country found its way to domestic detinning plants, although from time to time certain quantities were exported to foreign detinners, especially in times when prices for tin were high, whereas in times of low prices these exports always stopped entirely.

A few years ago the price of tin dropped to very low levels, such as we had not seen since the last decade of the last century, and they fluctuated for a long time below 20 cents per pound. At this price for tin and at the very low prices for steel scrap prevailing at the same time in this country and in other countries, no foreign detinner was in the market for tin-plate scrap in this country; however, the domestic detinners, although they could not possibly handle the material at a profit, continued to buy the refuse material from the can manufacturers. Today, with tin at 46 cents and steel scrap several dollars higher than it was at that time, these prices would appear very low. However, at that time, the cost of recovering the tin and the steel scrap, in many cases, was in excess of the value of the tin and steel scrap recovered.

Afterward, when the international tin pool was formed under the guidance of the large tin producers in British East India, and when, as a result, the tin price in a short time went from 18½ cents per pound to 30 and 40 cents, and then to 50 cents, foreign detinners appeared in the market, especially along the seacoast, and purchased large quantities of tin-plate scrap for export. Most of this exported material was shipped to Japan, some was shipped to China, and some to Italy—all countries of very much lower wage standards than prevail in this country, where common labor earns much more per hour than the same class of labor earns in east Asia per day.

We are primarily interested in keeping a strong detinning industry alive in this country, so that we can produce substantial quantities of tin, if there ever should be a war with a maritime power or powers which could shut off our supply of tin from the Far East and from Bolivia. During the World War, Germany succeeded, through its well developed detinning industry and by having school children, and so forth, collect all old tin cans for the detinning plants, in meeting the most important requirements of the army for tin, although imports of tin were cut off for 4 years. Since the war, exports of tin-plate scrap from Germany are prohibited by law because the last war demonstrated to Germany the importance of its detinning industry. Similar considerations in France and Italy led to similar measures, and today we are the only industrial country, with exception of England, that allows any tin-plate scrap to be exported. England is in an entirely different position. It practically controls the tin industry and the tin market. It has considerable tin deposits in Cornwall, which always are operated when tin prices are high and can, in a pinch, meet the most important demands of the country. Furthermore, England has the advantage of a large smelting industry, which always has considerable quantities of tin and tin ore on hand. The only other large industrial country that has no restriction on the export of tin-plate scrap is Japan, but Japan has an import duty on pig tin without having a duty on tin-bearing material like tin-plate scrap.

It was brought out, before the tin investigating committee, that the main interest of the can manufacturers is to have a steady, uninterrupted outlet for their refuse material. This is much more important than is a difference of a dollar or two per ton in the prices which sometimes existed between material for export and material for domestic detinners. It can be figured that the weight of the tin-plate scrap—that is, the refuse—amounts to about one-tenth of the tin plate used, so that 1 ton of scrap results from 10 tons of tin plate. Ten tons of tin plate, as a rule, have a value of over $1,000, whereas with tin at 50 cents per pound, tin-plate scrap has a value of perhaps twelve to fifteen dollars per ton, which is equal to from 1 to 1½ percent of the cost of the raw material. A difference of even $2 in the price of the scrap would amount to only one-fifth of 1 percent of the value of the raw material.

So far, most of the can manufacturers are either under contract with the domestic detinners or continue to sell their refuse to them because they are interested in keeping the domestic industry going in order to be assured of a steady outlet for their tin-plate scrap. But what will happen if the foreign detinning plants are developed in course of time to the same high standard as that of our domestic plants? If the foreign plants located in countries of very much lower standards of living further increase their purchases of tin-plate scrap, taking away the only raw material of our domestic plants, their costs of operation will continue to rise and the time may come when they will have to shut down. That means not only loss of work for a great many men, not only in the detinning industry but also in the industries supplying this industry with raw materials like chlorine, caustic soda, coal, and so forth, but what is most important to us is that an industry would be destroyed which was found very essential to us in the last war when the oceans were open to us, and would be much more important to us if we ever should be involved in a war with a maritime power that would try to cut off our oversea supply of tin.

That is of paramount importance, and other countries have realized this, as stated before, and therefore have placed embargoes on the exportation of this refuse, which may be so very important in case of war. During the last war, the Navy purchased millions of pounds of tatrachloride of tin from the detinning industry, to be used for smoke screens, and with the great development of airplanes since the last war, we may expect that smoke screens will be used much more in the future.

A few years ago there were seven or eight detinning plants operating in this country; today there are only four. If these plants are kept alive, they easily can be expanded in case of need to handle millions of tons of old tin cans, in addition to the tin-plate clippings they handle at present, but if they shut down and the highly technical and specialized organizations are disbanded, it would take years to develop new plants and form new organizations. Nearly all manufacturing industries in this country are protected against competition from countries of lower living standards by an import duty on their products. The logical way to help and save the detinning industry is by an embargo on its raw material—tin-plate scrap.

THE FEDERAL HOUSING ACT

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein an interview with Capt. W. G. Bingham, associate director of the southern California district of the Federal Housing Administration, on December 18, 1935, over the radio through station KNX in Hollywood, Calif.

Mr. RICH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I could not understood whose address this is.

Mr. KRAMER. It is a radio interview between myself and Capt. W. G. Bingham, associate director of the Federal Housing Administration at Los Angeles, Calif.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio interview, Station KNX, at Hollywood, Calif., 3 p. m., Wednesday, December 18, 1935, between Hon. CHARLES KRAMER, Representative, Thirteenth Congressional District, California, and W. G. Bingham, associate director, southern California district, Federal Housing Administration, Los Angeles:

Mr. BINGHAM. What in your opinion, Congressman KRAMER, was the most important reason for the passing of the National Housing Act by the Seventy-third Congress?

Mr. KRAMER. Well, Captain Bingham, there were many economic reasons why the act was necessary. Which was the most important I am not prepared to say. However, to me it seemed unbelievable that with a home shortage of over a million homes that one of our major industries—the building trades—should be for all practical purposes unemployed.

Mr. BINGHAM. Was it then primarily to revive and rehabilitate the building trades' industries?

Mr. KRAMER. Yes; and at the same time make home ownership available on a safe and sound basis for those who wanted them and must of necessity borrow money to get them. Along with putting men back to work, in order to fill our housing need, the act contemplates the reemployment of money on a safe and profitable basis as well.

Mr. BINGHAM. Do you see, Congressman KRAMER, in the National Housing Act, any attempt to put the Government into business or into competition with private enterprise?

Mr. KRAMER. Absolutely and positively not, Captain Bingham. This is not Government money which is being loaned. It's not tax money either. The Government merely acts as an insuring agent—protecting both the borrower and the lender when the loan is made under the act's regulations. This is private capital and private money that is being loaned by qualified and approved lending institutions, and upon which the F. H. A. puts the stamp of insurance—the absolute guaranty that the loan will be repaid to them.

Mr. BINGHAM. Was there any feeling among the Congressmen that the insurance or guaranty provisions would result in a loss to the Government?

Mr. KRAMER. Not to any great extent. The monthly payment plan of credit extension has proven the best form of obligation with most everything—essential or not. Why should it fail when applied to the purchase of lasting things, such as the average home, its repair, or its equipment? No charge is made to either the borrower or the financial institution for the insurance protection of modernization loans under title I. Whatever loss is made upon them the administration expects to absorb. The last report, I noticed, anticipated a loss of not over one-tenth of 1 percent from title I operations. Title II with the Mutual Mortgage Insurance principle is, of course, self-sustaining—the borrowers pay the cost of insurance, and get back whatever is saved over and above the cost of administration.

Mr. BINGHAM. Do you anticipate, Congressman KRAMER, that the next Congress will extend title I insurance beyond the present limitation of April 1, 1936?

Mr. KRAMER. That, of course, Captain Bingham, will depend upon the showing of title I operations from every State in the Union as well as the demands of the building trades and the manufacturers of heavy machinery and equipment. It was originally anticipated, and I believe the experience of the past 15 months will justify the contention, that banks and financial institutions probably will continue to make modernization and repair advances even without the insurance provisions. They are proving both safe and profitable.

Mr. BINGHAM. Do Government reports, Congressman KRAMER, show that the building trades and the manufacturers of durable goods have benefited by the title I modernization operation?

Mr. KRAMER. Most decidedly so. The income of all the allied building trade industries is "up", and they all give credit to the National Housing Act for a very definite stimulation to their business. Work and employment has been furnished to the artisans normally employed in the construction industry. Sales and distribution agencies have also been able to rehabilitate their business, and in doing so have likewise rehabilitated many white-collar workers. On every hand is ample evidence that this substantial return of purchasing power to the building trades industries is being reflected in improving general business conditions.

Mr. BINGHAM. Tell me, Congressman KRAMER, had the effect of the old mortgage system been as difficult to home owners in the eastern part of the United States as it was in southern California?

Mr. KRAMER. It most certainly had. All of the foreclosures were not held in California by any means. The second mortgage had the same ill effects back there. Home owners in the East were experiencing the same difficulties of securing proper financing for their residential properties as we were here. The state of modernization, the condition of repair, was much worse in the larger eastern metropolitan centers than it was here. Money for mortgage financing had become quite tight.

Mr. BINGHAM. To your knowledge, Congressman KRAMER, were bankers, building and loan men, realtors, and builders consulted in the framing of the act?

Mr. KRAMER. Yes; they were. The act sprang from a recognized need for a sound and practical home-mortgage structure. The men of high caliber engaged in the mortgage-lending business, and those men of high standards in the real-estate or building business were the first to suggest a halt on the old antiquated, home-ownership procedure under which we had been operating. Each party to a home-ownership transaction was willing to give every other party absolute security and protection provided he himself were given security and protection as well. And incidentally, I think, therein lies the strength of the National Housing Act.

Mr. BINGHAM. Do you know, or are you familiar, Congressman KRAMER, with what England has done for her people in regard to housing?

Mr. KRAMER. Yes; to some extent, Captain Bingham. During my recent visit to Europe I was impressed with the amount of new home construction that was going on in England and other foreign countries. I was told that England solved her depression difficulties by the stimulation of housing and construction. They have been building new homes, 50 or 60 times as many as we have in this country. They have also used the mutual-insurance principles. It has proven very successful.

Mr. BINGHAM. What has been your reaction to the results of the F. H. A. work in southern California since you returned from Congress?

Mr. KRAMER. I was thoroughly surprised. I had heard reports that southern California was leading the Nation in both title I and title II activities. The home-town newspapers had told me of the increase in building permits and the revival of construction business. I have been more convinced than ever that the National Housing Act is one of the best pieces of legislation ever passed by any Congress, and am proud to have had a part in it. I am pleased as well that the people of southern California have so adequately taken advantage of the protection and benefits which this act offers to them. Please extend to Mr. F. W. Marlow, district director, F. H. A. and your staff my personal congratulations for a job being exceedingly well done.

Mr. BINGHAM. Thank you, Congressman KRAMER, we appreciate the support that you have given to this measure, and may we all thank you for the pleasure and knowledge offered through this interview to the people of the Pacific coast?

Thank you, station KNX.

REFORM TRAGEDIES

Mr. EATON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including a radio address which I delivered recently.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the permission given me, I wish to insert in the RECORD a radio address delivered by me from the N. B. C. studios in New York over the N. B. C. system, Thursday, October 31, 1935, on the subject Reform Tragedies:

When President Franklin D. Roosevelt took office in March 1933, the stage was set for him to render the American people and the world a public service of importance and distinction unparalleled in our entire peacetime history since the days of George Washington.

For years the United States had stood among the nations an island of prosperity in an ocean of adversity. The tides of world distress had beaten upon our shores almost unheeded until our gigantic financial folly and indifference to dangerous social maladjustments developing everywhere in these United States culminated in the crash of 1929.

In the summer of 1932 there were signs of the beginning of economic recovery by the operation of natural forces resident in our economic system. But reaction followed the election of November and by March of 1933 the whole country was in the grip of a devastating panic.

In the first days of his administration Mr. Roosevelt faced these appalling conditions with such courage and assurance that the Nation hailed him almost as a second Messiah. In Congress, he had the support of a huge Democratic majority. Republican Members of both Houses gave him their backing on the ground that he had received a mandate from the people and it was their duty as good citizens to help him in his announced program of relief and recovery. The issues of that hour transcended, as they do today, all partisan considerations. For even then a great new alinement was taking form between American-minded people on the one side and alien-minded people on the other.

Our economic and social structure was shaken to the foundation. It was clear that unless American-minded people hung together it was only a question of time when we would all be hung separately. No President ever faced a more dangerous or challenging peacetime situation. No President ever seemed so sure of himself and his program. No President in times of national crisis ever had back of him so unanimous and favorable a public opinion.

There were solid grounds for this feeling of public confidence. In his campaign speeches, Mr. Roosevelt had outlined his policies in great detail and had given many solemn pledges of his adherence to sound and tested American principles of action. The people believed that he meant and would do exactly what he said.

On October 19, 1932, at Pittsburgh, Mr. Roosevelt said: "Before any man enters my Cabinet, he must give me a twofold pledge of (1) absolute loyalty to the Democratic platform and especially to its economy pledges, and (2) complete cooperation with me looking to economy and reorganization in his department. I regard reduction in Federal spending as one of the most important issues of this campaign. In my opinion, it is the most direct and effective contribution that government can make to business."

On September 29, 1932, Mr. Roosevelt in a speech at Sioux City made this further solemn covenant with the people of this country: "I shall use this position of high responsibility to discuss up and down the country, in all seasons, at all times, the duty of reducing taxes, of increasing the efficiency of government, of cutting out the underbrush around our governmental structure, of getting the most public service for every dollar paid by taxation. This I pledge you, and nothing I have said in the campaign transcends in importance this covenant with the taxpayers of this country. I accuse the present administration of being the greatest spending administration in peacetimes in all our history—one which has piled bureau on bureau, commission on commission, and has failed to anticipate the dire needs of reduced earning power of the people."

In his speech of acceptance on July 2, 1932, Mr. Roosevelt said: "As an immediate program of action, we must abolish useless offices * * * we must merge, we must consolidate subdivisions of government."

Not only did the people believe implicitly what Candidate Roosevelt told them in his speeches, but they pinned their faith as well to the declarations set forth in the Democratic platform of 1932 upon which Mr. Roosevelt was elected, and which was judged to be one of the sanest and most constructive platforms ever adopted by the Democratic Party.

That platform adopted at Chicago on June 29, 1932, pledged candidate and party alike to "the maintenance of the national credit by a Federal Budget annually balanced on the basis of accurate executive estimates within revenues raised by a system of taxation levied on the principle of ability to pay." It promised "an immediate and drastic reduction of governmental expenditures by abolishing useless commissions and offices, consolidating departments and bureaus, and eliminating extravagance to accomplish a saving of not less than 25 percent in the cost of Federal government." With great unction it condemned the administration then in power for "its refusal to curtail the extravagant expenditures of the Government."

Mr. Roosevelt made the following public declaration with reference to that Democratic platform: "The platform is a promise binding on the party and its candidates. I have accepted the platform without equivocation and without reserve. Let us have the courage to stop borrowing to meet continuing deficits."

In the early days of his administration, President Roosevelt acted in accord with the platform of his party and in accord with his own solemnly reiterated pledges to the people. Backed by the approval of all parties and sections, he grappled with the immediate problem of relief to the millions of unemployed and financially distressed. He took steps which, in his judgment, would restore confidence in banking and business as the basis of a real economic recovery. He developed an ambitious program for the economic rehabilitation of agriculture; and he held in abeyance until better times should return, the problem of neecssary reforms in our economic set-up which had become so sharply outlined against the black background of the depression.

A few short months after his inauguration there developed an ominous change in Mr. Roosevelt's policies, objectives, and methods. The essence of that change was, and is, that Mr. Roosevelt ceased to be a Democrat as defined by the Democratic platform of 1932, and became a New Dealer as defined by Professor Frankfurter and his intellectual soulmates and satellites. The essence of the New Deal program which he then adopted and has since relentlessly followed was, and is, to abandon recovery as our first national objective and to put in its place a weird, wasteful, unworkable, and un-American program, miscalled reform.

That change in the policy and program of Mr. Roosevelt constitutes one of the major personal and political tragedies of our history. Its evil consequences will afflict our people for generations to come.

One of the most abhorrent features of the New Deal program is the fact that it has been foisted upon the American people by indirect, devious, and often unconstitutional methods. The record of the New Deal for 2½ years makes bad reading.

Instead of promised economy, the New Deal administration has increased the public debt by some $10,000,000,000. At this moment it is plunging our Nation into debt at the rate of $10,000,000 a day. It has fastened a millstone of taxation upon the necks of our children and our children's children. It has added 160,000 employees to the pay roll of the Federal Government. It has piled bureau upon bureau and commission upon commission. It has practically wrecked our established civil-service system. Although the New Deal administration has spent $24,000,000,000, we still have 20,000,000 of our people on relief and more than 10,000,000 unemployed.

Gen. Hugh Johnson is authority for the statement that under the New Deal unemployment is not being relieved; not now even being attacked, and the PWA-WPA program is a complete flop.

The wastage of public money by irresponsible bureaucrats and demagogues in their effort to establish European collectivism and kill American individualism is almost beyond belief. The rights of our citizens have been invaded as never before by the Federal Government. For the first time in our history a conscious proletariat has been created in this country, an unfailing symptom of a dangerous and devastating moral decay. The Budget has not been balanced, nor is there any immediate prospect that it will be.

Our currency has been debased. Business is still haunted by uncertainty and fear. Our banks have been loaded with Federal Government obligations until they now hold half of the national debt. Fundamental constitutional duties of Congress have been surrendered to the Executive by his obedient majority. At his demand Congress has handed him nearly $5,000,000,000 of the taxpayers money in one lump to use exactly as he pleases. He has been clothed with authority to force farmers to plant only such quantities and kinds of crops as he, the President, may dictate. He has authority to make criminals of those who disobey his decree and to punish them by fine or imprisonment, or both.

Through a board of his own choosing, Congress has clothed the President with authority to regulate hours of work, rates of wages, quantity of production, and method of distribution in the coal industry. Through another board, appointed by him, the President may now determine employer and employee relations in all industries and business as affecting interstate commerce. Through a Federal Communications Commission he can control radio and other forms of communication. Through the Securities and Federal Power Commissions, he now has a strangle hold on electrical power, light, and gas industries; and, worse still, has the authority to destroy many of these utilities in which the taxpayers have billions invested. He can control the flow of credit and its operations in banking and business throughout the country. He now has the authority to change the tariff and, under this New Deal set-up, foreign nations are placed in a position to dictate what our tariff shall be on commodities which they desire to market here. Through a Federal Coordinator, the Executive now has a grip on the railroads which constitutes a long step toward Government ownership and operation.

This amazing hodgepodge of wasteful, un-American experimentations, exploded alien theories, and embryonic dictatorship which calls itself the New Deal has actually retarded recovery or made it impossible. It has led our distracted people far afield into the bogs and fogs of economic futility and failure. And all this in the name of reform which the Roosevelt administration has substituted for recovery as its prime objective.

This New Deal program of reform breaks up into two or three subsidiary objectives, often artfully camouflaged and sugar-coated, but always persistently and ruthlessly advanced. The first objective is to take American industry and agriculture away from private operation and place it under control of the Federal Government. The second objective is to subject money and credit to Federal control. When these objectives are reached, the next and final step will be to establish here a new social economic and political order in place of that tested American system which has for 150 years been the inspiration and hope of the world.

Until it is rejected by an aroused and informed public opinion, the triumphant advance of this New Deal program of so-called reform is blocked by only one obstacle—that is the Constitution of the United States interpreted by the Supreme Court. Mr. Roosevelt, of course, knows that this obstacle is there and he has given public expression to his annoyance that it should block his New Deal program of reform. His coterie of New Deal advisers and yes men—the Frankfurters, Cohens, Corcorans, Tugwells, Lilienthals, and their ilk—are irked by the functioning of so old-fashioned and outworn an instrument as the Constitution. And they propose to get round the difficulty by pushing through Congress a series of palpably unconstitutional New Deal laws; have them disallowed by the Supreme Court, and then agitate for an amendment to the Constitution taking away from the Supreme Court those functions and powers granted by the Constitution which for long generations have made the Supreme Court the sheet anchor of our liberties and rights as against encroachment by the Executive on the one hand and the legislative branch of the Government on the other.

This audacious scheme will fail as has every other attempt to disturb the deep foundations of our American plan of life. Our American social and economic ills can never be cured by the injection of imported poisons. There is reliable evidence that the American people are beginning to snap out of the hypnosis which has made them in recent years the helpless subjects of alien-minded experimenters. Next year American-minded citizens will unite to elect an American-minded government whose program will be to stop reckless spending, balance our National Budget, cut out the cancerous growth of bureaucracy, maintain a sound currency, establish confidence in business and banking, and restore to each coordinate branch of government its proper constitutional functions.

Then, and not until then, can we summon all our forces of mind and character; educational, political, industrial, agricultural, financial, to a united and a really American-minded attack upon unemployment which is the supreme central problem of modern civilization.

The Russian answer to this problem is communism. The Italian answer is fascism. The German answer is Hitlerism. And in every one of these cases the people have surrendered the last vestige of liberty in the vain hope of thus achieving economic security.

The American answer to this problem must be found in principles of American liberty expressed in intelligent free cooperation of all classes and interests for the common good. The New Deal has not only failed to solve the problem of unemployment, but it has made the problem more difficult and complicated.

The time has come to clean the slate and try a newer New Deal which shall insure to every American his rights and liberties and at the same time open for him full and fair opportunity to earn his own living by productive work, free from the shackles of political or economic despotism.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. STACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute on a much needed appropriation.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, they would not permit me to have 4 minutes, and I shall have to object to this request.

Mr. STACK. This will interest the gentleman, the same as it will everyone else.

Mr. RICH. I do not like to interfere with the gentleman, but that side of the House refused to grant me a similar request.

Mr. STACK. This is for deserving veterans.

Mr. RICH. I cannot help that. My request was for the benefit of the country at large. I am interested in everybody. I object, Mr. Speaker.

GEORGE WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on February 22 next, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McLEAN] may be granted time to read George Washington's Farewell Address.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know why the gentleman cannot get that in under general debate. Last week I tried——

Mr. SNELL. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Last week I tried to get in the RECORD a little article that would take about 3 minutes with respect to the Supreme Court, but Members on the other side of the aisle have refused consistently to let me get that in the RECORD.

Mr. TREADWAY. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded.

Mr. MONAGHAN. I object, Mr. Speaker.

NAVAL HOSPITAL, PHILADELPHIA

Mr. STACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a letter that I got from the Jewish World War Veterans, asking for an appropriation for beds in Philadelphia, so that veterans may be properly hospitalized.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. STACK. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter. I hope the Appropriations Committee of the House will see to it that sufficient funds will be appropriated for this purpose—beds for sick veterans.

JEWISH WAR VETERANS OF THE UNITED STATES

NEW YORK, N. Y., January 16, 1936.

Hon. M. J. STACK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: At the last meeting of Post No. 54 of the Jewish War Veterans, in Philadelphia, a motion was passed urging that you, as Congressman for that district, see that a larger appropriation is made to the Veterans' Administration so that additional beds may be made available for more than 300 veterans who are unable to obtain admission to the naval hospital in Philadelphia.

The Medical Director of the Veterans' Administration states that these beds may be made available if a larger appropriation is granted him.

May we have your consideration of this appeal so that we may give it the publicity it deserves?

Very truly yours,

IVY A. PELZMAN,
National Liaison Officer.

GEORGE WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Speaker may appoint some Member of the House to read George Washington's Farewell Address on February 22.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object for the moment, of course, I shall not object, I was very anxious that the request of the gentleman from New York might be complied with.

Mr. RANKIN. So was I.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I trust that my friend from Montana [Mr. MONAGHAN] will not insist upon his objection. I may state that this is the usual ceremony we have on George Washington's Birthday and we alternate between the two sides in the honor of having the privilege of reading the address.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to explain to the House my reasons for objecting.

The regular order was demanded.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield for that purpose. If the gentleman wants to object, let him do it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the Speaker may be authorized to request some Member of the House to read George Washington's Farewell Address on February 22, next, immediately after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table. Is there objection?

Mr. MONAGHAN. Reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, we are going to have Washington's Farewell Address read on February 22 if Congress is in session, whether gentlemen object or not. [Applause.] I desire to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RANKIN. Would it be in order to move that the Speaker be permitted to appoint someone to read Washington's Farewell Address on February 22 next?

The SPEAKER. It would not be in order if anyone should make the point of order.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Speaker may be authorized to appoint someone to read Washington's Farewell Address on February 22.

Mr. MONAGHAN. I make the point of order that the gentleman's motion is out of order.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken.

FARM SITUATION AS THE RESULT OF THE SUPREME COURT DECISION ON THE A. A. A.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a letter I wrote to the president of the Woodson County Farm Bureau, Yates Center, Kans.

There was no objection.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter written to the Farm Bureau of Woodson County, Kans., discussing the farm situation in relation to the recent Supreme Court decision holding the Agricultural Adjustment Act invalid.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 8, 1936.

Mr. A. G. BEINE,
President Woodson County Farm Bureau,
Yates Center, Kans.

MY DEAR MR. BEINE: I wish to acknowledge receipt of your telegram in behalf of the farm bureau members of Woodson County, in which you urge me to use all my influence and every honorable means to secure such needed legislation at this session of Congress, as will secure for the farmers of the United States parity prices for their products, and in reply thereto, will say that it will be my principal aim to work in behalf of agricultural interests in the future as it has been in the past, and I will be only too happy to comply with your request.

The decision of the Supreme Court invalidating the Agricultural Adjustment Act is considerable of a set-back to the progress being made by the agricultural industry. However, I fear that the result of the decision is even graver than any effect it has on the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as it goes much farther and holds that the Federal Government does not have the constitutional right to in any manner whatsoever control agricultural production, and that any or all contracts so entered into by the farmers with the Government are invalid.

A constitutional amendment may be suggested to meet the situation, but the difficulty arises in that it would take some time for such an amendment to be adopted by the various States, during which time the farmers would be suffering; and then, in addition to this, I fear with the opposition in the East that we would have difficulty in obtaining the adoption of such an amendment by the required number of States.

It is hard to understand how the Federal Government can grant subsidies for other lines of business and give tariff benefits to them and not have the same right to grant similar benefits to the farmer. It is a difficult matter to try and work out at this time, and it seems that the only relief that the farmers have ever received has now been taken away from them.

I conferred with Congressman JONES, of Texas, chairman of the Agricultural Committee, this morning. While no definite legislation has yet been determined on, he expects, together with members of his committee and others of the Congressmen who are interested in the farmers, to attempt to figure out some legislation to fill the breach at this time; and it is hoped that the Federal Government can assume its obligation on the present contracts and make the necessary appropriation. However, there is some question as to whether that can be done under the Supreme Court decision.

I have always been in favor of the bill, known as the cost-of-production bill. However, I fear that it might even have less chance being held constitutional than the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

The price of farm products may not be reduced much in the immediate future, but with the loss of our foreign markets due to competitive foreign tariffs, I fear it will be hard for us to regain the markets we once had and that within 3 or 5 years we are liable to have a large surplus of agricultural products in this country which will consequently reduce the price of farm products to the ruinous point where they were 4 years ago.

However, I know the President, together with the Agricultural Department and the friends of the farmers in Congress, will do everything within their power to try to save the farming situation upon which, in my judgment, the welfare of the rest of this country relies.

With best wishes, I beg to remain,

Yours very truly,

RANDOLPH CARPENTER.

THE JIGSAW PUZZLE

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include a speech made by me over the radio.

There was no objection.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered over the radio on November 14, 1935:

THE JIGSAW PUZZLE

NEW DEAL'S PATERNALISTIC PATTERN IS NOT AMERICAN

The adroit Mr. Farley pretends to see an endorsement of the Roosevelt-Farley partnership in the elections of last week. The simple truth is the Republicans made gains almost everywhere against the biggest political machine, with the most money to spend and the most jobs to hand out this country has ever seen. However that may be, before next November, the people of this country must be aroused to the dangers confronting them. The country can't stand four more years of reckless waste and socialistic experimentation. We ought at least to have as much sense as that flock of geese which alighted on Niagara River a few weeks ago but flew to safer waters before they were swept over the falls.

The performances of this administration are like the queer, shapeless pieces of a jigsaw puzzle. Let us try to put them together and see what the picture would be if it is finished.

The Federal Government is launched on a program of building a half dozen or more gigantic power plants in different parts of the country from the Grand Coulee Canyon in the State of Washington to Passamaquoddy Bay in Maine, to generate and sell electric energy in competition with privately owned plants.

The P. W. A. invites the municipalities of the country to go into the business of retailing electric power and, as an inducement, offers a 40- or 50-percent grant of the cost of building, the necessary facilities, and a loan at low interest rates for the balance.

The Rayburn-Wheeler Act was passed to destroy—not to regulate—large public-utility holding companies. One sure result of this act will be to throw many of the weaker units in these systems into bankruptcy, thus facilitating Government or municipal ownership and operation.

In the Tennessee Valley the Federal Government is now generating and selling power below cost for the purpose of setting up a false yardstick to arouse prejudice against private companies and encourage public ownership.

RAILROADS HINDERED

Federal legislation and regulation has added so much to the cost of running the railroads, while rates are controlled and while the competition of other forms of transportation is encouraged—even subsidized—that over three-quarters of the first-class railroads of the country cannot earn their fixed charges. A number of the President's professors favor federalization of the railroads, and that question must soon be answered.

There are millions of honest, thrifty, self-reliant, and self-respecting people in this country who have invested their savings in the securities of public utilities. There are tens of millions who have insurance policies or retirement benefits or are interested in colleges, hospitals, and other beneficent institutions whose funds are likewise invested in public utilities. They ought to weigh the evidence carefully.

Under the vague and almost unlimited authority given him by emergency appropriation acts passed hurriedly, without debate and under the whip and lash of Executive power, a number of business corporations have been formed and financed by the Government. In this category we already have the Commodity Credit Corporation, with a perpetual charter; the Federal Surplus Relief Corporation, with a perpetual charter; the Public Works Emergency Housing Corporation, with perpetual existence; the Electric Home and Farm Authority, incorporated in Delaware with a 7-year charter; and the Tennessee Valley Associated Cooperative, Inc.

THE COMPETITIVE SIDE

Funds appropriated for emergency relief are diverted to provide capital for Government-owned corporations with perpetual charters to engage in every conceivable form of business. They have unlimited borrowing powers and Government agencies are set up to lend them unlimited funds. The Government is going into big business on its own account. It is doing it through corporations so that the experimenters, with unlimited money belonging to the American taxpayer, can go into competition with him without being responsible for losses, without having to come to Congress for appropriations or authority, without having to submit their accounts to the Comptroller General of the United States for auditing.

It's a pretty raw deal when the intelligent, experienced, practical business men of the country are taxed to support Government corporations competing with them. It's like paying the fee of your executioner.

That isn't half the story. The Federal Government has established lending agencies which hold the notes and mortgages of citizens and institutions amounting to $9,000,000,000. When the old-age insurance fund is in full swing there will be $32,000,000,000 in the United States Treasury, all of which must be invested in Government bonds or bonds of agencies of the Government bearing 3-percent interest.

The Treasury of the United States will also have the reserve funds for unemployment insurance and Federal employees' retirement benefits and the postal savings accounts. It will have over $40,000,000,000 of the savings of the country permanently removed from the channels of private business and enterprise. The only business for which this gigantic sum can be used is business operated by the Government.

Put these jigsaw pieces into the picture.

The Roosevelt Administration is constantly reaching out for more power. It has tightened its grip on railroads, busses and trucks, radio, securities, exchanges, telegraph and telephone companies, banks.

BRIBING STATES

States are being bribed into surrendering their rights and responsibilities by accepting Federal contributions for highways, education, rehabilitation, welfare, and numerous other things on condition that the moneys be expended in accordance with orders from Washington.

The N. R. A. was an attempt to embezzle the police powers of the States to regulate hours, wages, and conditions of labor.

The A. A. A. seeks to control the free action of the farmer by telling him what he can produce and how much he can sell. It started with a few crops and has extended to many. The farmer was paid to violate the instincts of every man who loves old mother earth, to destroy livestock and crops, so there might be a scarcity of food and prices of necessities would go skyrocketing. With the aid of the drought the experimenters were successful. The price of food is high and we are paying it at an increasing rate to foreign farmers because we now haven't enough to go around. We pay for the food we don't grow and we pay for the food we eat. But it isn't this preposterous situation I wish to emphasize. The New Dealers originally attempted to gain control over the farmer's business by paying him to reduce production. They have gone from bribes to penalties. It is coercion now. We have reached the point where a farmer cannot sell a single potato without permission from a man sitting at a desk in Washington. If he sells more than his allowance he must pay a prohibitive tax. If there is a violation, the farmer is a criminal. He may be fined and sent to jail. And so may the housewife who buys an illicit potato and the people who know of any such shocking crime and fail to squeal.

Put that one in the picture.

The President has demanded and obtained powers no former President ever had. We are being governed more and more by rules and regulations which may be changed overnight without notice, but they have the force and effect of penal statutes.

VOTER IN DARK

All of these revolutionary measures were passed as temporary expedients without the knowledge of his majesty, the American voter, without proper discussion and deliberation in Congress, but under gag rules and strong-arm, steam-roller methods which only a ruthless majority can employ, and which only a supine, ring-in-the-nose, rubber-stamp Congress will tolerate. Temporary emergency powers, seized in an emergency, are now being made permanent. Recently the President, in speaking of the A. A. A., said that no one ever intended that the power over agriculture granted by the act should be temporary, and yet the act commences with a declaration that an emergency exists and ends with a section that the law shall cease to be in effect when the President finds the emergency is ended.

Think for a moment of the type of men with whom the President has surrounded himself. Are they the leaders of the Democratic party who inspire public confidence? Were practical, experienced men of affairs selected to manage the biggest business in Christendom? Few of them ever did anything to fit them for their jobs; many of them are not even Democrats, but radicals, socialists, and parlor pinks. The two strongest influences at the White House, according to a general report, are Frankfurter and Tugwell, both professors, both theorists, and both nursing their pet theory of planned economy, which means nothing more nor less than that bureaucrats sitting in Washington should take over the business of managing our individual lives.

TUGWELLIAN GEMS

Mr. Tugwell does more talking and writing than Mr. Frankfurter. I'm going to take the time to give you a few gems of the Tugwellian philosophy:

"Planning will necessarily become a function of federal government; either that or the planning agency will supersede that government, which is why, of course, such a scheme will eventually be assimilated to the state rather than possess some of the powers without its responsibilities. Business will logically be required to disappear. This is not an overstatement for the sake of emphasis, it is literally meant."

Tugwell intends that private business shall disappear.

Again—"We have a century and more of development to undo. And it will require the laying of rough, unruly hands on many a sacred precedent, doubtless calling for an enlarged and nationalized police force for enforcement." Tugwell preaches revolution by force in this passage.

Here is another quotation—

"The difficulty of attaining the experimental habit of mind toward social and economic arrangements arises largely from an emotional attachment to the instruments of social life. An illustration of such feeling is the unreasoning, almost hysterical attachment of certain Americans to the Constitution."

In this quotation the professor makes it clear that he thoroughly disapproves of the form of government, the traditions, the ideals, and the principles to which the United States is dedicated and under which we have outstripped the world.

PRESIDENTIAL CONTEMPT

I have quoted the words of the high priest. In this connection consider some significant statements of the President himself. Surely you remember his contemptuous remark, when the Supreme Court declared the N. R. A. unconstitutional, that the decision took us back to the "horse and buggy" days, and his peremptory order to his party leaders in Congress to pass the Guffey coal bill despite doubts they might have as to its constitutionality, however reasonable.

I ask you to study that incomplete picture closely. You may look with approval on parts of it, but put them all together and then study it.

The paramount issue in the next Presidential campaign will not be the profligate waste of billions of dollars, the foolish costly experiments of the professorial staff, the destruction of the merit system in government, the mounting debt, the high cost of living, the broken promises, or any of the other issues that can be raised. They will be issues, but Americans must decide before it is too late whether we are willing to submit to a despotic paternalistic form of government now being set up in Washington which asserts the right to control the labor, the property, the habits, the activities of the citizens, or whether we will preserve for ourselves and our children a government in which public officials are public servants, and not masters, a government which encourages effort and rewards accomplishment, a government under which the door of opportunity is open to every boy and girl in any legitimate field of useful endeavor, the government which represents the dream of the common man come true.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I got permission the other day to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Townsend plan. I ask that that be extended to be dated on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9863, the independent offices appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. BOLAND in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will resume the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

International exchanges: For the system of international exchanges between the United States and foreign countries, under the direction of the Smithsonian Institution, including necessary employees, and purchase of necessary books and periodicals, and traveling expenses, $44,260.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes and possibly out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I would not presume, as a Representative in Congress from the East Side of New York, to reply seriatim to the very interesting address made by ex-President Hoover last night. I have read it carefully, but any reply would take considerable time.

My main purpose in rising at this time is to supplement some remarks I made the other day in reference to Mr. Hoover's talk about "balancing the Budget." Of course, his speech, boiled down, contains the sole suggestion of aiding the farmer by means of subsidies.

As I recall it, during his term of office, which began on March 4, 1929, several propositions which might be cataloged as "subsidies" to agriculture, which was in dire distress when he took office, were submitted to him, but he showed no concern about it.

The other day I said on the floor that the deficit during the last 2 years of Mr. Hoover's administration amounted to $5,000,000,000, which was almost exactly equivalent to every dollar which we have spent to this moment on relief. At the suggestion of several Members I have secured the exact figures as to the deficit during Mr. Hoover's administration, although he continues to talk about "balancing the Budget" as though he had balanced the Budget during his last 3 years. The answer is he did not.

In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1931, the deficit under Mr. Hoover's administration was $902,716,845. In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, the deficit under Mr. Hoover's administration was $3,153,097,507.

Up to March 3, 1933, when Mr. Hoover's term of office expired, the deficit to that date, or about 8 months during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, was $2,163,760,084.

The total deficit therefore during the last 2 years and 8 months of Mr. Hoover's administration was $6,219,574,436, or about $1,200,000,000 more than this administration has spent on relief to this date.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. CARPENTER. I listened to Mr. Hoover's speech on the radio last night, and the theme of that speech, as I gathered it, was, Let the farmer wait.

Mr. O'CONNOR. In reply to the gentleman from Kansas, I might say that the distinguished ex-President again announced his laissez faire doctrine when he said:

There is at least one hopeful aspect of these war causes of the farmers' difficulties. They do not last forever. Many of our measures can be of emergency character. Recovery will cure many difficulties.

He still sticks to that same old laissez faire doctrine of "letting nature takes its course"—the twin sister of "rugged individualism."

Mr. FITZPATRICK. It is a just-around-the-corner wait.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Well, there was not any corner left at the end of Mr. Hoover's administration.

The Clerk read as follows:

TARIFF COMMISSION

For salaries and expenses of the Tariff Commission, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, purchase and exchange of labor-saving devices, the purchase of professional and scientific books, law books, books of reference, gloves and other protective equipment for photostat and other machine operators, rent in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, subscriptions to newspapers and periodicals, and contract stenographic reporting services, as authorized by sections 330 to 341 of the Tariff Act of 1930, approved June 17, 1930 (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 19, secs. 1330–1341), $941,000, together with $4,000 of the unexpended balance of the appropriation for this purpose for the fiscal year 1935, of which amount not to exceed $2,500 may be expended for expenses, except membership fees, of attendance at meetings concerned with subjects under investigation by the Commission; and not to exceed $7,500 for allowances for living quarters, including heat, fuel, and light, as authorized by the act approved June 26, 1930 (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 5, sec. 118a), but not to exceed $1,700 for any one person: Provided, That the Commission may procure supplies and services without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 5) when the aggregate amount involved does not exceed $50: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used to pay the salary of any member of the Tariff Commission who shall hereafter participate in any proceedings under sections 336, 337, and 336 of the Tariff Act of 1930, wherein he or any member of his family has any special, direct, and pecuniary interest, or in which he has acted as attorney or special representative.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CULKIN: Page 34, line 6, after the figures "1341)", strike out "$941,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$763,000."

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment strikes from the appropriation for the Tariff Commission $178,000, which, on page 16 of the report, is shown to be appropriated for the use and purposes of the reciprocal trade agreements. Congress has made fatal delegations of power in the past several years but none more fatal, in my judgment, than the delegation of power to make these so-called trade agreements. The President, disregarding his campaign pledges to leave agricultural tariffs in status quo, delegated to Secretary Hull, an avowed, unashamed free-trader, the right to make these trade agreements, and he, in turn, delegated this power to Francis B. Sayre, a free-trade professor. Under this power 10 treaties have been made. Most of them are injurious to American industry. All of them are destructive of agriculture, and especially destructive of the interests of the dairymen. There are 4,000,000 dairymen in America who will speak in thunder tones this fall on election day. They with their dependents constitute a group numbering 16,000,000 people. Under this administration the unhappy condition of the dairyman has been ignored. Dairy products were included in the A. A. A. legislation. Secretary Wallace first proceeded to ignore their condition and then attempted to destroy what solidarity they had gained through cooperative groups. I have said that 10 trade treaties had been made. Those 10 trade treaties apply to all the rest of the World except Germany. Professor Sayre, to whom this power has been delegated, was known to the President of the United States when his appointment was confirmed, to be an avowed free-trader. Professor Sayre made these trade agreements with Canada and The Netherlands, which will ultimately destroy the dairymen. You gentlemen here who have had longer service than I remember that in the Tariff Act of 1913, the Underwood Act, agricultural interests were in the main left open to the world. Then in 1922 under Republican auspices the Fordney-McCumber Act was passed, which gave some measure of protection to agricultural interests. In 1930, under the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act those tariffs were increased, and those were the tariffs that the President in his preelection speeches promised would be left untouched. Today under this Canadian treaty the duty is cut below the level of the Fordney-McCumber Act, which was inadequate, more particularly on the item of cheese. Canada is also given a quota on cream.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULKIN. May I say to the Members of the House that in Canada, where living costs are hardly more than half of what they are in the United States, already 6,000,000 pounds of Cheddar cheese, which is the American type of cheese, has been purchased? It is estimated that twenty or thirty million pounds of this cheese will annually be brought into America. This will destroy the price structure not only of American cheese but of butter, cream, and of fluid milk. The price of these various products are interdependent. All this is in definite violation of the pledge which the President made to the people in his campaign for election.

I desire to bring these facts before this committee at this time. I desire to urge upon the Members of the House on either side of the aisle to register their disapproval of this procedure; to register their disapproval of the violated pledges of the distinguished President of the United States and the destructive internationalism of the men who represent him in the office of the Secretary of State.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield? I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. CULKIN. I yield, if the gentleman agrees with me.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. What is the difference in the price of dairy products now as compared to what it was before the agreement was made?

Mr. CULKIN. Does the gentleman mean the retail price?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The retail price of dairy products now compared with that previous to the time the agreement was made.

Mr. CULKIN. I will say that prices have a shifting base, but at the present time it is inadequate to give the dairymen of the United States a decent living. The dairymen are not a vocal group, as the gentleman knows. They have not made a track to the Treasury. Today their farms are being sold for taxes and they are not getting a living wage. They have been definitely betrayed by this trade-agreement procedure, and Secretary Wallace, who is their technical adviser, the man who is supposed to rally their support when their interests are threatened, is himself an avowed internationalist and approves of these trade agreements. I infer from his acts that he is more concerned about the welfare of the farmer in The Netherlands and in Switzerland and elsewhere, if you please, than he is in the welfare of the American dairyman. I repeat that if the Congress does not act now this vast army of producers, who represent the highest type of farmer, men who are sound Americans, who educate their worth-while child and make a substantial contribution to this civilization, will speak in thunder tones on election day. So I suggest to the Members of the House who are present that they join in my motion to strike this item from this appropriation bill before American industry and the American farmer is further betrayed by these international economists.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I said I would agree with the gentleman providing it had the effect he has said it would. It has not had that effect, because it has increased prices greater than they were previous to the agreement.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN] has expired.

Mr. CULKIN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to proceed for 1 additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CULKIN. These agreements are just going into effect, so the statement of the gentleman has no bearing on the situation. Moreover, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZPATRICK] loses sight of the fact, and I want to impress it on him, that the prosperity of America and the prosperity of his constituents who work in the shops depends in large part upon the prosperity and buying power of these dairymen. When that is reduced, his constituents will walk the streets.

Mr. Chairman, I ask that this amendment prevail, not on the ground of politics but on the ground of sound nationalism and in the interest of the dairymen who are now in difficult straits. [Applause.]

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN].

The Appropriations Committee, of course, is the servant of the House, and does not feel that it has the prerogative or function of determining the policy of the House. This is a question of policy which does not properly come before our committee. It is a question upon which the House has already acted. We feel it our proper function, in carrying out the wishes of the House, to provide what we believe to be a fair and reasonable appropriation for carrying out the expressed will of the House, which we have done in this particular instance. It seems to me that the proper course for the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN] to follow, to attain the purpose which he seeks, is not by an amendment to this appropriation bill but by attempting to repeal the reciprocal trade agreement law itself.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORAN. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. TREADWAY. Would the gentleman be kind enough to inform the House what evidence was submitted to the Committee on Appropriations as to the manner and for what purpose $178,000 would be expended by the Tariff Commission in this investigation? How do you reach the figure of $178,000? I am not questioning the statement about keeping to the policy; but what has been done in the past year, for instance, with $382,752, and what will be done with $178,000 next year?

Mr. MORAN. The gentleman is fully aware of the fact that the Tariff Commission must collect reciprocal trade information. The gentleman is familiar with the organization and its membership. I know from the gentleman's standing on the Ways and Means Committee that he is fully informed of the various trade-agreement hearings that were held before the committee on reciprocal trade information and knows of the voluminous reports required of the Tariff Commission. The gentleman also knows that the Tariff Commission, in connection with these reciprocal trade agreements, does not make recommendations of any sort. It simply compiles all the facts and figures as requested. The gentleman also knows the Tariff Commission has placed upon it the huge burden of compiling all of the oral and written testimony that is submitted at those hearings. The gentleman knows also that in connection with these hearings, before the reciprocal trade agreement is even advertised for hearing, voluminous reports are called for in connection with the existing trade facts, such as production, consumption, percentage of importations, and all that sort of thing.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MORAN. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. And the gentleman should know, should he not, that this total of $956,000 is within the Budget estimate approved by the President? Is that not true?

Mr. MORAN. That is true.

Mr. LAMBETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORAN. I yield.

Mr. LAMBETH. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN], who offered the amendment, stated that this policy had been fatal to agriculture, if I correctly quote him.

Let me ask the gentleman from Maine if he thinks this is fatal to American agriculture: During the first 12 months of the trade agreement with Cuba exports of lard increased 97.9 percent, and exports of potatoes, in which the gentleman from Maine, as well as my colleague from North Carolina are interested, increased 274 percent. Is this fatal to American agriculture?

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORAN. Gladly.

Mr. CULKIN. I do not know how the gentleman will answer the categorical questions of the last speaker.

Mr. MORAN. Let me first answer the questions of the gentleman from North Carolina, and then I shall be pleased to yield to the gentleman from New York.

The trade agreement with Cuba, particularly in the case of the seasonal trade between Cuba and our country on potatoes, has developed a marked increase of our export trade, and in lard also. One thing that I think, in all fairness, should be said about agreements of this kind is that we should look at the policy in a nonpartisan and purely impartial manner. No one can really judge how these treaties are going to work out until we have had experience under them. A year from now we will know better how they operate on American trade than we do now, and if later, in the light of facts developed by such actual experience, we wish to change our policy, we can do so. Until and unless we do, the appropriation should be made to carry out the law.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Maine may have 2 additional minutes that I may ask him some questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman from Maine knows, of course, that the vegetable growers who have millions of dollars invested in large and small farms in the State of Florida have protested in thunderous tones against turning over the vegetable market to Cuba. Does the gentleman know that?

Mr. MORAN. I am, of course, informed that there have been complaints. There have been complaints from many sections of our country in connection with various parts of our reciprocal trade agreements.

Mr. CULKIN. Is the gentleman familiar with the seasonable vegetables which formerly came into the metropolitan markets, which market used to be enjoyed by Florida? Does the gentleman realize that these markets have now been usurped largely by vegetables grown in Cuba? Is not that the claim, the definite claim? Has not the gentleman heard from these people, heard their protests; has it not come over his desk since this Cuban trade agreement was made?

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORAN. I yield.

Mr. BUCK. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that, despite his claim and despite the importations of Cuban tomatoes and other vegetables, the winter vegetable market in New York and other eastern seaboard cities was higher last winter and continues to be higher than it ever was before or during the administration preceding this?

Mr. CULKIN. California is defending Florida!

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, this is a matter in which the people of my section of the State of New York are very vitally interested. The meal ticket of northern New York is the products of the dairy farms. These are things we depend on for our real livelihood.

The dairy farmer has been especially hit under these various control programs, the A. A. A., and so forth, because it has raised the price of the feed that he necessarily must buy for his livestock to produce milk, cream, and other dairy products, anywhere from 10 percent to 20 percent, not to say anything about the other increases they have had to pay for essentials of life, on account of the New Deal legislation. They do not see, and I do not see, any special benefit they have ever received from these laws.

I remember very well the condition that existed when we passed the Emergency Tariff Act in 1921 and 1922. If I remember, that tariff adjustment came about entirely to take care of agricultural interests. Before the passage of the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill the imports of milk, cream, and butter from other countries were coming into this country in larger quantities, and these imports materially affected our home market prices, but the raise of duty in this bill has practically shut out these imports, and the dairy farmer has received the benefit; and I can see no reason why at this time we should take off any part of that tariff which is so essential to these people and give the benefit to the Canadian farmers.

My friend from New York asked if the price of butter and dairy products had been affected by these reciprocal agreements. Let me say to him that this is the time of year when there is a natural rise in the price of butter, cheese, and milk, coming about from the fact that production is very low and cost of production is exceptionally high.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. How does it compare with the price a year ago?

Mr. SNELL. Wait a minute until I get through and answer your question, or do you want to both ask it and answer it?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I do not suppose I do.

Mr. SNELL. Then wait until I get through. At this time of the year production of milk and cream in Canada is just as low as it is in northern New York. The great importations will come later in the year when they have surpluses and we also have an oversupply here at home, and that will materially affect our market. But there is no surplus now to come in, unless it might be of cheese, and that would have a material effect on prices at the present time. But later in the season if they send large quantities of cream into this country, as is allowed under this treaty, it will seriously affect the dairy farmer, and he is not in condition at this time to stand the shock of lower prices. Why is this administration so much more interested in the market for the Canadian farmer than it is in preserving the home market for our own farmers?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. How does the price of butter compare now with a year ago?

Mr. SNELL. I could not tell the gentleman, but the last time I looked at the butter market it was one-half cent per pound under a year ago.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Is it not higher today than it was a year ago?

Mr. SNELL. I think not. The statement is made by those on the other side that all agricultural products are higher. Some of them are and I want to keep them at least at the present price, and ultimate effect of these reciprocal agreements on agricultural products cannot fail to lower them.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. When the gentleman says it is seasonal, can it be a seasonal question?

Mr. SNELL. If the gentleman knew anything about the butter, cheese, and egg market, he would know it is a seasonal proposition, and prices vary with the season of the year. In the spring and summer we produce more milk and cream, and in fall and winter less. Production affects market price.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. But it is higher today than a year ago.

Mr. SNELL. I am just informed that today butter is one-half cent per pound less than 1 year ago. However, prices are generally higher at this time of the year.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. But under the gentleman's theory, prices should be lower.

Mr. SNELL. Well, it is hard to make a man understand something with which he has never had any experience.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I have been paying for these things and that is a great experience as far as the consumer is concerned.

Mr. SNELL. If anyone wants to discuss the question with me who knows something about it, I will discuss it, but I do not want to discuss longer this situation with one who does not have any knowledge about the problems of the production of milk and has only the consumer's point of view. I am talking from the standpoint of the producer of milk, who needs more rather than less protection.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I know something about it all right.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Regardless of the controversy about the present price of dairy products, as a matter of legislative policy, does the gentleman think it proper for the House of Representatives to absolutely strike out an appropriation to effectuate an existing law and policy, thereby indirectly seeking to legislate? Does not the gentleman concede that the proper way to take the matter up is not by seeking through this left-handed method to emasculate the appropriation, but rather through an effort by the Members of the House to repeal the law?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] has asked a perfectly fair question and I will answer it. I admit that in the usual way and under the ordinary procedure it should be done by way of legislation. I will not argue with the gentleman on that proposition. But always when these authorizations are made, we are met with the statement on the floor by the people who are proposing the authorization that this is simply an authorization, and if Congress does not want to appropriate, it can pass upon that question when the appropriation is asked for. You are now asking for an appropriation to carry out an act that is destructive to the dairy interests of the country, and we who are specially interested in the dairy farmer are asking you not to do it. I think that is perfectly proper at this time. This is so vital to our people that I do not want to vote money for those people who are making these reciprocal-tariff agreements which are so vitally affecting the dairy farmers of northern New York.

Mr. WOODRUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WOODRUM. Does the gentleman realize the fact that if the motion offered by the gentleman from New York should prevail it would not accomplish all the gentleman seeks to accomplish?

Mr. SNELL. I cannot answer that question.

Mr. WOODRUM. Just a moment and I think the gentleman can answer it. The gentleman by his motion merely reduces the total amount of the bill, which just cripples the whole work of the Tariff Commission and does not in any respect place a limitation on them by which they could not do reciprocal-trade work.

Mr. SNELL. I take it from what the gentleman says that he agrees that my premise is right, and that I am arguing the question along correct principles, but am powerless under the present conditions.

Mr. WOODRUM. I say that if the gentleman's motion should prevail it would not accomplish the purpose sought.

Mr. SNELL. But the gentleman admits that the purpose is right?

Mr. WOODRUM. No; I do not admit anything of the kind.

Mr. SNELL. I know this is very important to our people, and I think it should be brought to the attention of the farmers that we are simply trying to protect the dairy interests of the country.

Mr. WHITE. The gentleman mentioned the fact that dairying is the meal ticket of the people of northern New York. Is it not a fact that the big distributing and processing interests of New York have profited exorbitantly at the expense of the dairy interests?

Mr. SNELL. That may account for some of it, but that is not the main trouble. The co-ops handle a large part of our milk.

Mr. TABER. If the gentleman will yield to me, the dairymen in northern New York are thoroughly organized into a dairymen's league, a cooperative organization?

Mr. SNELL. A large number of them are.

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro-forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I certainly would not undertake to discuss with the distinguished minority leader, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] the dairy situation. It so happens that I have involuntarily fallen into the dairy business within the last 2 years and sometime off the floor of the House I should like to have some observations from the gentleman with respect to the best manner of breeding cattle, and so forth. The controversy evoked by the other distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN], who offered the motion to reduce this appropriation, causes me to do something which I rarely do here, and this is, take the floor of the House in order to make a few observations.

In the first place, I have given some thought to this subject, although I am not an expert and never will be. In the second place, I sincerely believe in the policies of this administration relative to reciprocal-trade agreements. In this connection I wonder if I might trespass upon the time of the Members of the House to quote briefly from a statement which I gave to the press at the time of the adjournment of Congress in 1934, soon after this act became a law. It will be recalled that that memorable session of Congress enacted many far-reaching measures affecting the lives of our people. The statement I made to the press at that time is as follows:

> One of the most constructive achievements of this administration is the act providing for reciprocal-trade agreements. It is the only practical means of restoring the once golden argosy of our foreign trade. When international commerce is reestablished on a fair and mutually profitable basis, we shall be able to trade our surplus products, including cotton and tobacco, with those of other nations instead of having to continue present measures of restricting production.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMBETH. I will yield to the gentleman later if I have time.

Mr. Chairman, the very people who have opposed the policy of this administration in its attempt to control production, particularly of agricultural products, in order to keep them in line with the demand so that tremendous surpluses would not pile up are the people who oppose this attempt by one of the greatest statesmen in the world, the present Secretary of State, to reopen our foreign markets so that we may produce and sell more of our products.

This is the fundamental inconsistency in the attitude of my friends of the minority.

Furthermore, about the only remedy the Republican Party has ever offered for any of our economic ills has been to raise the tariff, and when we first got into the depression and your then President, Mr. Hoover, called you here in extra session, you began what? You began to revise the tariff for the benefit of agriculture. You tried to put agriculture on an equal basis with industry, and when you got through with it you had passed the iniquitous Hawley-Smoot tariff bill, and President Hoover signed it over the protests of a thousand of the best economists in this country, who were not motivated by any political or partisan reasons in their protests.

Speaking not as a partisan Democrat at all, in my opinion, when the history of this period has been written it will be said that that one act contributed more to prolonging and deepening the depression then settling over our country and the world than any other act of government.

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

Mr. CULKIN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order. The gentleman from New York had about 15 minutes.

Mr. LAMBETH. I am going to yield to the gentleman if he will permit me to make my statement and get further time.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAMBETH. Now let me discuss the larger aspects of this question. I am a member of your Committee on Foreign Affairs. We have been very seriously considering for the past 2 weeks a most important piece of legislation—the proposed neutrality bill—which will probably be on the floor of this House during the coming week. This is an attempt to keep our country from becoming involved in war, because all of us fear that a great war is all but inevitable within the near future. We cannot pass a neutrality act which will be an absolute guaranty of peace. It is not within the ingenuity of man to legislate so that we can be assured we shall not become involved in a foreign war.

I think the best way to prevent war is to attempt to get rid of the causes of war, and the three countries that are threatening to disrupt the peace of the world—and two of them are now disrupting the peace of the world, namely, Italy and Japan—have a very small supply of raw materials and practically none of the fundamental raw materials. Italy has no oil, no coal, and no cotton. On the other hand, the United States, Great Britain, and Russia control three-fourths of the fundamental raw materials of the world.

It is my humble opinion that if the restrictions on trade between nations could be removed, this would be an important step, and the Honorable Cordell Hull is today doing more in this direction than any other man in the world. You can call him an "internationalist", you can call him a "free trader", but he is a reasonable man. He does not believe in free trade, and the gentleman from New York knows that as well as I do.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LAMBETH. Let me complete my statement. I am going to yield. I am not afraid to yield to the gentleman for his question, but I am trying to get over a thought here and I am not trying to evoke a controversy. I do not believe I misquoted the gentleman. If I did, I shall yield to him to correct any misstatement I may have made.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman did misquote me. I said he is an economic internationalist.

Mr. LAMBETH. All right; but do not take up any more of my time.

Mr. Hull believes it is wise to uphold our standards of living, but unwise to cut off all imports, and between these two policies there is a great gulf. On one side is the hog combine of special interests, which wrote the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill, and on the other side is sanity, a free movement of goods, greater employment, and consideration of the consumer. There is a difference between tariff policies which protect industry and labor against unreasonably low-cost production—example, cheap Japanese textiles—and a policy which stifles trade between nations and breeds monopoly.

Now, I believe if these countries could trade their products for ours; if commerce between nations moved freely, self-sufficiency would be unnecessary and the present tension in the world would be eased. Having initiated the tariff policy of the world which culminated in the monumental folly of the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act of 1930, it is fitting that the United States take the lead in bringing the world back to sanity of trade.

During the period from 1925 to 1929 the world system of distribution was broken down by tariff barriers, the international debts, and the maldistribution of gold. Currency manipulation soon followed, and nations have been fighting not with guns and soldiers but with depreciated currencies and tariffs in deadly warfare.

At the risk of repetition, let me briefly review the result that was brought about by an unreasonable tariff policy. The excuse for the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act, was the farmer needed higher tariff protection. As discussion got under way, logrolling began, with the result that there was pushed through Congress the highest tariff of our history. Other nations quickly and justly retaliated until world trade in comparison with what it had been was virtually stopped. International trade dropped from $68,000,000,000 in 1929 to $24,100,000,000 in 1932; by 1932 the number of unemployed in the world who had been engaged in occupations connected with foreign trade had reached 27,000,000; in the United States foreign trade dropped from $10,000,000,000 in 1929 to $2,500,000,000 in 1932. Coming to my own State, we find that in 1929 North Carolina exported goods to foreign countries valued at $99,500,000; in 1932, $32,948,000, a decrease of 66.9 percent. North Carolina exports of cotton dropped 88 percent and of leaf tobacco 63.2 percent in that period. These are our two most important exports. Per family the value of North Carolina exports dropped from $125.60 to $41.60. Is it any wonder that more families had to go on relief? It is true that much of the period I mention was during the depression, but it is equally true that much of the depression was caused by tariff policies.

The following table shows the North Carolina exports before and after the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act was enacted:

Exports from North Carolina

[1] Increase.

Our tariff policies of a hundred years are being reversed and for the first time America is assuming the role of liberal leader in the matter of revising tariffs downward. Heretofore we have always led the world in carrying tariffs upward. The reason for this is that the United States has ceased to be a debtor nation and has become a creditor nation, and the more intelligent thought of the country realizes that a creditor nation must import or else inevitably lose its foreign markets for surplus products. Also, there are certain raw materials which we cannot produce. Among these are silk, rubber, tea, coffee, and tin. Furthermore, a century ago we were protecting infant industries, but infants have now grown to giants and giants are not noted for using their power for the best interests of the general public. In line with the policy of reducing tariffs we have already concluded trade agreements with Cuba, Brazil, Haiti, Belgium, Sweden, Colombia, Honduras, Netherlands, Switzerland, and, most important of all, Canada. The treaty with Brazil became effective January 1, 1936. We are now carrying forward negotiations with other countries, notably France, Spain, and the Central American countries, toward the reduction of tariffs. The trade with the countries with which we have concluded negotiations and with which negotiations are under way represents 42 percent of our volume of foreign trade. Our trade with all the countries with which we have completed trade agreements is increasing.

Our first trade agreement was with Cuba, and this has been in effect long enough to show the definite trend of trade. Since August 24, 1934, when this agreement was signed, our exports to Cuba have increased from $32,238,848 to $51,470,108, or an increase of $19,231,260, or 60 percent.

To give some specific examples, our export of lard to Cuba has increased 97.9 percent; potatoes, 274.1 percent; automobiles, 287.7 percent; radios, 141.1 percent; lumber, 35.4 percent.

This means that people have been put to work to produce goods shipped to Cuba, and if our trade agreement stands, as we have every reasonable right to suppose, they are permanently given work. This is the kind of reemployment that is needed to foster private initiative and give business a permanent stimulus. If our trade agreements already entered into and to be entered into with other nations are only partly as successful as that with Cuba, millions of our unemployed will be given work and we will be well on the road to a sound and permanent recovery.

That is the way out. Not by panaceas, not by economic quackery or political demagoguery, will recovery be brought about. The best index to recovery is not the stock market but the reemployment in normal work of men and women who are able and willing to work. Progress must come in an orderly manner. It must be constructive and sound and bring us safely into the port of a more peaceful and happy and prosperous world. We cannot prosper unless the world is prospering. Too much was expected of the N. R. A. It failed because it was looked upon as a panacea. Much within it was good, and much that it stood for will eventually be adopted. But this must be remembered: Human nature and institutions cannot be changed overnight.

International trade means more friendly relations. Between us and Canada we have built tariff walls which have made for unfriendly relations between the two countries. In discussing the trade agreement with Canada, let us bear in mind that we are Canada's second largest customer and Canada is our second largest customer, but exports from Canada to the United States dropped from $503,000,000 in 1929 to $232,000,000 in 1934, or 54 percent. Exports from the United States to Canada dropped from $899,000,000 in 1929 to $302,000,000 in 1934, a decrease of 66 percent.

The figures which I have just given are based on products which are duty-free as well as those which are affected by tariffs. If we segregate the products the sale of which was drastically affected by the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act, we find the percentage of decline to be much greater. For instance, our exports of wheat dropped from $27,308,190 to $15,758, structural iron and steel from $11,997,187 to $345,391, radio apparatus from $10,784,156 to $994,635, textile machinery from $4,993,457 to $1,673,069, industrial-machinery parts from $16,385,085 to $1,479,421, wheel tractors from $13,808,340 to $119,221. I might give further examples, but this is sufficient to show the evils of unreasonable tariffs.

Let us also bear in mind that imports from Canada on the articles on which duties have been reduced were in 1929, before the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act, 95 percent of the total imports of these commodities from all countries combined. This being true, we may have no fear that increased trade with Canada will result in decreased trade with other nations of the world.

The most important Canadian concessions to the United States provide for direct duty reductions on items named in what is known as schedule I of the agreement. The grant to the United States on all other commodities of the lowest rates now or heretofore paid by any non-British country in place of the higher general rates is commonly known as the most-favored-nation rate. Of greatest importance to the United States is the guaranty of relief by Canada with respect to the Canadian system of arbitrary valuations heretofore applied on many commodities. By arbitrary valuations, Canada raised the valuation on many American products to the point that their admittance into Canada was impossible, as no market could be found after inflated duties had been paid. The South was especially hard-hit by this system. Of particular interest to my own State of North Carolina is the reduction of Canadian tariffs on furniture by 40 percent.

Before 1930 the United States shipped to Canada furniture in the value of $4,667,000. This has fallen to $471,000, or a 90-percent decrease. Of like interest to this State is the reduction of the tariff on cotton yarns by 25 percent. I am informed that already cotton and furniture manufacturers are receiving inquiries as to the possibility of filling Canadian orders.

I might continue to name specific items which will be benefited by the Canadian trade agreement, but as time does not permit, I will not do so and will only add that American agriculture will likewise be benefited. The Canadian trade agreement has been attacked as being unfair to agricultural interests, but such, as a matter of fact, is not the case. The duty on wheat has been lowered from 30 to 12 cents a bushel. Cotton remains on the free list. The duty on our most important agricultural trade with Canada, consisting of fresh vegetables and fruits, has been greatly reduced. This is expected to benefit the vegetable and fruit producers of the Northeast States; and it will vitally affect the market of Florida fruit in that duties have been greatly decreased on all citrus fruits; oranges will be admitted duty free; the market of North Carolina peaches and berries will be benefited.

It is true that the duties on cattle entering this country from Canada have been lowered; but when we take into consideration the negligible quantity that is allowed to enter at lower rates under the quota basis, this is of very small consequence.

If we take more Canadian goods, they will buy more finished goods from us, and especially textiles. Because of prohibitory tariffs American manufacturers have gone into Canada and built their mills. American capital has gone over there and thrown American labor at home out of work.

On our side of the agreement we bind ourselves to continue free entry into this country of those products which were entering this country duty-free before the trade agreement, notably pulpwood, wood pulp, and newsprint paper. We reduce duties, but for specified quantities, on cattle, seed potatoes, and lumber and timber of Douglas fir and western hemlock. Also we reduce by half the rates on other lumber. Undoubtedly, the reduction of tariff rates on lumber will receive more criticism than any other part of the trade agreement, but when we consider the fact that previous to 1930, when the lumber business of the United States was at its best, there was no duty on lumber, we realize that this criticism is unjustified. Even with reduced duties Douglas fir and western hemlock are allowed to enter this country only in the amount of 5 percent of our total consumption of softwood lumber in the United States, or about 250,000,000 feet. Both countries have made concessions as is necessary when any agreement is reached. Both countries will be benefited. Much more could be said about the Canadian agreement, but I do not think it wise to go too far into technicalities.

If we do not hold these foreign markets, we have not yet seen the beginning of regimentation. The question is clear-cut. Shall we produce for the world market or shall we produce for purely domestic consumption? The inevitable sequence is further regimentation and restrictions, higher unit costs and prices, lower consumption, more unemployment, less purchasing power, twenty millions on the dole instead of ten, lower standard of living, social decay and political disintegration, dictatorship.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I think this matter has been fairly debated, and I should like to proceed with the consideration of the bill. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment do now close.

Mr. TREADWAY and Mr. WOODRUFF rose.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, time has been taken on this amendment——

Mr. WOODRUM. The time has been equally divided and the gentleman from Massachusetts has spoken in general debate on it.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto do now close.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SNELL) there were—ayes 75, noes 54.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. SNELL and Mr. WOODRUM.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were 83 ayes and 69 noes.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TABER) there were 52 ayes and 89 noes.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. WOODRUM and Mr. CULKIN.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were 67 ayes and 100 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 33, line 20, strike out the paragraph down to and including line 2, page 35.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this motion because I feel that the House should understand exactly what this situation is and what the effect of this kind of operation would be.

The Tariff Commission was originally organized in order that after careful hearing and investigation tariffs might be adjusted up or down from the provisions of the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill. Many such hearings have been had where both parties interested have had opportunity to be heard.

After the passage of the reciprocal tariff act the Tariff Commission ceased to function intelligently. All that was done was in executive session on reciprocal agreements where the people affected were given no opportunity to be heard. Tariffs were put through affecting industry and farming without the least opportunity for those affected being heard.

Just in that way industry was destroyed. Just in that way the tariff reciprocal agreement with Canada, which opens the way for every other country in the world, except Germany, was put through, taking a crack at the dairy industry, the wheat farmer, and the cattle farmer, and the bean grower.

Now, it has been suggested that the market price of butter is better in New York than it was a year ago.

Just so the American people may know the truth of the situation, I have the quotations in front of me. The market price of butter at the present time is 33⅛ cents. A year ago it was 33⅝ cents, or half a cent more. It is going down day by day as a result of those operations, and unless this reciprocal tariff performance is dropped, the cheese, the butter, and the milk market will collapse when the spring milk flow comes in. With normal conditions in this country in May 1935 the price of butter dropped to 23 cents. We must not permit this sort of thing to go on. No longer are hearings held by the Tariff Commission. Its function has become practically useless, because they do nothing to protect the interest of the manufacturers and farmers of the country, and we might as well wipe out the whole thing. When an institution is functioning only for the purpose of destroying American industries and American farmers, it ought to stop functioning.

I hope this amendment will be adopted, and that a stop will be put to those organizations which are trying to destroy instead of build up American industry and farming.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, I should like to have 5 minutes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I want also to be heard.

Mr. WOODRUM. Then I ask unanimous consent that debate close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Much has been said here this morning in regard to butter. My district consists of 14 agricultural counties. Nearly every farm in my district has at least two or three dairy cows. The question of butter and a proper price for this product of American dairies is one that has been close to me all of the years of my service here. Year after year I have seen those dairy farmers in my district drop down the economic scale until year after year their dairies have been in the red, not due to the fact that those dairies have been improperly conducted but due to conditions over which they had no control.

Something has been said about the price of butter a year ago and the price of butter today. It is only a year ago that the price of butter in this country became such that the American farmer could see his way to a small bit of profit from his dairy herd. The price of this commodity traveled upward until about a year ago, when it reached a point where there was some hope that the American dairy farmer could get out of the red, at least, and perhaps find himself on a semiprosperous basis. What happened? He did not remain in that condition long, and it was because of the fact that during the month of January a year ago more butter was imported into this country than had been imported into the country for the 4 preceding years. Why was that? It was because the price of butter in the American market had become such that the foreign producers could produce the butter, ship it to this country, pay the 14-cents-a-pound duty on it, and still sell it at a profit in competition with the American farmer.

During the 3 years preceding 1935 at no time in no one of those years were there more than half a million pounds of butter imported into this country. During the first two and a half months of 1935 more than 23,000,000 pounds of butter were imported in competition with the American farmer. That is not a great amount of butter when you consider the butter consumed by the people of this country, but it was enough to drive down the price of that product until the American farmer could no more see even a fair hope of profit for his product.

What is happening now? The price of butter has again gone up to the point where the American farmer can see some hope for his dairy activities. Already there is an avalanche of butter on its way to this country. Four thousand five hundred boxes of butter have been sent here from the Argentine, and there are many, many other thousand boxes on the way here from other butter-producing countries. I prophesy it will not be a matter of weeks before the price of American butter will be driven to the point where the farmer can no longer realize a price that will give him the cost of production.

It has been disclosed in debate that the Canadian Reciprocal Trade Agreement Treaty reduced the tariff on dairy products. It perhaps would not be so serious a matter if reductions on these products were confined to the Canadian people, because there would be a limit to the amount that could be imported from that country. It seems, however, that the more vital question involved in this program of reciprocal-trade agreements has been entirely overlooked. During such of the debate as I have heard there has been no reference to the fact that any reductions in tariffs we give to any one nation is automatically granted to 38 other nations of the world with whom we have the most-favored-nation treaties, and who give us no preferential treatment whatsoever in the way of reduction of tariffs on our importations into those countries. In other words, we reduce the tariff on certain dairy products of Canada, who makes certain reductions in the tariffs we must pay on importing our products into that country, and immediately, without further action of any kind whatsoever, those reductions in the tariff on dairy products are extended to New Zealand, to Australia, to Argentina, to the Scandinavian countries, and to every other nation in the world producing dairy products for export. They give us nothing in return, and as a result every time a trade-agreement treaty is put into effect by the President of the United States, it constitutes not simply a reduction of tariffs to a single country but it does constitute a general reduction in the tariffs on all products incorporated in that agreement.

Our Democratic friends have talked long and loud about what they were pleased to term the "iniquities" of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act. They must concede, at least, that the bill had as its object reserving the American market for the American producer, whether that American producer lived on a farm or in the cities and towns of this country. Incorporated in that act was what is known as the flexible clause, under which the President of the United States is authorized to raise or lower the tariff on any given commodity when, after an investigation by the Tariff Commission, he finds that such increase or decrease will bring about a customs duty amounting to the difference in cost of production here and abroad.

Surely President Roosevelt is thoroughly familiar with this clause in the Republican tariff act. Surely he knew that a year ago, when foreign butter began flooding this country and ruining the market for the American farmer. He must have known that he could remedy the situation very quickly by exercising the authority given him under the last tariff act and increasing the tariff on butter.

I think everyone within the sound of my voice will agree that, had this been done, the American dairy farmer would during the last year have been able to maintain a price which would have enabled him to at least secure the cost of producing this very necessary American food product, instead of finding himself again in the position where he is compelled to sell his butter at a price much below that figure. We may expect to see history repeat itself again, as I have heretofore pointed out. Those farmers who are able to sell their butter at the present price are exceedingly lucky, because I assure you, Mr. Chairman, that the present price will directly be reduced because of the importations of foreign butter now on the way here.

The Democratic Party has had control of this House since the election of 1930; they have had control of every committee of the House during this period. There has been no time when they did not have the power to bring forth from the Ways and Means Committee a tariff bill incorporating rates which would put an end to the "atrocities" in the Smoot-Hawley tariff law. From time to time this question has been debated in the House. We Republicans have challenged our Democratic friends to bring forth such a bill to let the people of the United States know just where they stand on this question of the tariff; to let the folks back home know just wherein they believe the American market should be reserved to the American producer, insofar as the American producer could supply that market. Of course, they have made no such attempt. There was no attempt on their part to amend the tariff laws; and, so far as I have been able to learn, there has never been one Democratic Member of this House who has arisen in his place on the floor and pointed out where the tariff on any one single article in the Smoot-Hawley Act was too high. Why was not this done? Why was it that our Democratic friends were not willing to place themselves on record on a matter as vital as this to the welfare of the people of the United States?

Reference has been made repeatedly by our friends on the other side of this Chamber to what they call our opposition to the importation of anything of foreign growth or manufacture. Surely they have not overlooked the fact that always, under Republican tariff acts, the free list, under which any nation in the world may import any article so listed without the payment of one penny's duty, has been a most extensive list. Mr. Chairman, during the last 10 years there has been brought into this country a much larger percentage of goods on the free list than ever before. Goods on the free list for which no duty whatsoever has been collected have constituted from 63 to 67 percent of all importations. That does not sound to me, Mr. Chairman, as though we were not willing to permit any foreign goods to come into this country; that does not sound to me, Mr. Chairman, as though we were unwilling to do any business whatsoever with foreign people. Surely, if we give to foreign nations a free market for hundreds of millions—yes; and at times billions—a year for their products without payment of any duty whatever, we feel that we have indicated to them and to the world in general that we believe in the spirit of the "good neighbor"; but we do not believe in the spirit of the "good neighbor" to the extent that we not only give to them a free market for everything they produce which we do not produce but a free market also to them for the things which we do produce.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, we believe that the American farmer, the American workingman, and the American manufacturer is entitled to have the American market to himself so long as he is willing to deliver the products of his labor and his investment to the American people at a fair profit.

Wrapped up in every package brought into this country is hours and days of human labor. Everything we buy, regardless of what it may be, represents in some degree the result of human toil and human employment—wages, opportunities for men to supply the necessities of life for themselves and their families. Why is it, Mr. Chairman, that in times like these, with 13,600,000 persons in this country still unemployed, that we continue to drop our tariff walls and import into this country foreign products in competition with the American products which, when they appear on the shelves of American stores and are disposed of to our people, rob the American workingman and the American farmer of their right to produce those things for his fellow citizens?

Just why is it that this is done, Mr. Chairman? Why is it that we persist in a policy of reducing American production in all lines of industry, including the agricultural industry, denying to our own people the right to produce those things, and then, by such methods as I am discussing, invite into this market commodities of like character?

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the time is not far distant when the courts will have an opportunity to pass upon the validity of this iniquitous Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act. Section 8 of the Constitution states:

> The Congress shall have the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises.

The court of last resort in this country has, within the past few months, ruled as invalid a number of legislative enactments of the New Deal. In view of their decisions and others in years gone by it is perfectly clear that this trade-agreement act does greater violence, both in letter and spirit, to the Constitution of the United States than any other act recently declared invalid by the Court. I prophesy, Mr. Chairman, that the next election will produce a most emphatic answer to the New Deal majority and that the American people will in no uncertain way register their demand for an immediate return to fundamental Americanism.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a portion of a table showing the imports into this country for the last 10 years. I call the attention of the House to these figures and suggest to our Democratic friends that in the future in discussing this matter they, at least in part, cling to the facts.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The table is as follows:

Total imports, free and dutiable

	Free	Dutiable	Percent free
1926	$2,853,411,000	$1,577,477,000	64.4
1927	2,621,873,000	1,562,869,000	62.7
1928	2,616,239,000	1,475,205,000	63.9
1929	2,843,354,000	1,556,007,000	64.6
1930	2,051,210,000	1,009,798,000	67.0
1931	1,381,435,000	709,199,000	66.1
1932	879,043,000	443,731,000	66.4
1933	903,547,000	520,466,000	63.0

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, there is no occasion for any misunderstanding of the issue presented to the House for consideration. It is the age-old tariff question that has long been considered here. All of these distinguished gentlemen on the minority side of the House, if they were Members of Congress at the time the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill was enacted, worked and voted for that measure. They have a great deal to say about the prices now being received by the farmers of this country. It is a matter of common knowledge, known to everybody who has taken the time to consider the matter at all, that after the passage of the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill the prices received by the farmers of America continued to go down. They steadily declined. It has only been under this administration and under the policies of the present Chief Executive of this Nation that the prices of the farmers of this country have begun to rise. [Applause.]

The purpose of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York is to strike out the entire appropriation for the Tariff Commission. The gentleman argues that this Commission has ceased to fill any useful purpose in this country. In that he is grossly in error. It is performing every function today that it has ever performed, and in addition to that is performing the additional very vital and essential function of making the investigations and reports necessary under the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act. Those of us on this side of the aisle well remember the long, hard fight we had in this House to secure the passage of the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act, and I venture the assertion that when the pages of history are written they will reflect that more real good has come to American agriculture and the masses of the people of this Nation through the operation of that measure than most any measure that has thus far been enacted. [Applause.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I am sorry I do not have time. I hope the gentleman will excuse me.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the only purpose here is to do something by indirection that these gentlemen well know they could not even approach doing directly. The purpose of this amendment is to repeal the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act and to remove the appropriation so as to cripple the functions that are being exercised under that measure. Certainly we are not deceived by this insidious effort to so cripple the machinery and agencies created under this administration as to destroy the effect of the trade-agreement act. Of course, it would take a long time to analyze all of those agreements and negotiations that have been conducted by this administration, but the fact stands out in bold relief that in every one of those negotiations every American interest that is in any sense affected has the full right and opportunity to be heard. Those agreements are considered on the basis of the welfare and interest of the whole American people. Of course, this amendment, which seeks to eliminate all appropriation for the Tariff Commission, should be voted down and defeated. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the statement made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LAMBETH], who I wish might address the House more frequently, as he is certainly an eloquent speaker, when he stated that this reciprocal-tariff arrangement completely changed the tariff policy of this country. We agree to that. The reciprocal-tariff procedure does completely change the tariff policy of this country, in that it is destroying the interests of the American people—farmers, workingmen, and manufacturers alike. That is not the Republican attitude toward the tariff.

The Republican Party, through the protective tariff, has enabled the industries of this country to be built up to their present state of efficiency, and it has given the farmer the richest home market, the workingman the highest wages, and our people the highest standard of living of any country on earth.

The reciprocal-tariff program, however, does just the reverse. Its purpose is to tear down, not to build up, and its natural effect will be to dilute our own strength with the world's weakness. Therefore I hope that the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] to do away with this useless Board, which is now helping to carry forward the reciprocal-tariff program, will be agreed to.

Now, what were the original functions of the Tariff Commission? They were to furnish scientific information to the President to enable him to carry out the mandate of Congress that tariff duties should be maintained at such a level as would always equalize foreign and domestic production costs, and thereby protect American agriculture, industry, and labor from unfair and destructive foreign competition. What is their function now? To provide information to a star-chamber board which is "stacked" to destroy the protective tariff. The administration has abandoned the difference-in-cost-of-production yardstick, and duties are now being lowered indiscriminately to please the foreign countries who want to ship their goods into our rich market.

Why change the policy? Or if you Democrats want to change it, why do you not come in here with a tariff bill and play the game fair and square? Vote out the so-called iniquitous Smoot-Hawley rates, if you see fit. You have never shown one of them that was iniquitous, but you keep on saying that you want to change them. Why do you not do it in a man fashion and come here and debate this question, rather than to proceed by this secret star-chamber procedure under the policy now adopted by this administration?

Now, let me call the attention of my friend from North Carolina, Mr. LAMBETH, to another detail. The gentleman says this star-chamber procedure, setting up a reciprocal tariff, has increased exportations from this country. It has increased exports from this country, yes; but the increased imports have been four times as much as the increased exports. In the case of Cuba they have been five times as much.

I quoted the figures the other day and I will repeat them here. According to the Department of Commerce figures released on January 10, our total exports in the 11 months ending November 1935 increased $96,000,000 over the same period last year. You Democrats will point to that with great pride, and the State Department will publish the information throughout the country as showing the great benefits to be derived from the reciprocal-tariff program. But wait! Let us see what the import figures show. Again quoting from the Department of Commerce, our imports in the 11-month period ending November 1935 increased $338,000,000 over the same period last year. Thus, we suffered a net loss of $242,000,000.

We have been hearing a lot about how the concessions which we make to foreign countries will be offset by increased sales to them, but the figures do not show it. They prove what I have always contended, that the reciprocal tariff would provide a one-way street into our rich domestic market.

I referred to the Cuban trade agreement the other day, and showed that in the first year of its operation our producers had to surrender an additional $103,000,000 of the domestic market in order to gain an additional $21,000,000 in the Cuban market. I might call attention, also, to the results under the Belgian agreement, which became effective last May. As a result of the first 6 months' operation of this agreement our exports to Belgium showed an increase over the previous 6 months of $1,500,000, but our imports from Belgium increased by $4,700,000, showing a 3 to 1 net loss to our own producers.

Since our concessions under the trade agreements negotiated with particular countries are extended generally to imports from all countries, Germany alone being excepted, it stands to reason that a large part of our large increase in foreign importations is due to this policy of horizontal tariff reductions. At the same time, our relatively small increase in exports demonstrates conclusively that on the whole we lose more than we gain by tariff reciprocity.

It is said that since we are a creditor Nation we must allow increased imports so that foreign countries may pay us what they owe, but I have never understood that our concessions to these foreign countries have been conditioned upon their paying anything on the war debt. That is merely a convenient excuse, not a reason, for putting into effect the free-trade theories of the Secretary of State.

This reciprocal tariff is not only injurious to the farming interests of the country, the dairy interests, which have been so ably defended on this floor, but it is likewise destructive of every industry of the country. You do not need any better evidence of this situation than the statement issued last week by Mr. Peek. I have referred to it once on this floor, and it is worthy of requoting. Mr. Peek said:

The farmer is taking the rap.

He further said:

I do not feel that general tariff reduction is an appropriate policy at a time when 10,000,000 or more are out of work and we are trying to restore domestic economic balance.

There is testimony that is worth while, from a successful man, who endeavored to stomach the policies of the Democratic administration and found it gurgled up in his throat, and he could not stand for it any more than Lew Douglas could. There are a couple of men, if you want to follow good advice rather than that of college professors, whom you could well tie up to. But those men are thrown out in the discard.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina referred to tobacco. He is interested in tobacco. I want to say that I am also interested in tobacco, as we produce a great deal up in the Connecticut Valley. Under the trade treaty with the Netherlands the President reduced the duty on wrapper tobacco by one-third. The principal imports of wrapper tobacco come from Sumatra, which, as you know, is one of the Netherland East Indies. This Sumatra tobacco is produced by forced and indentured labor, as was testified before the Ways and Means Committee a few years ago. My tobacco farmers pay American wages, but they have to compete with this product of slave labor. The tariff which was imposed on wrapper tobacco under the 1930 law enabled them to stay in business, but the reduction in duty made by the President may have the effect of wiping them out and giving the foreigners the whole market for wrapper tobacco in this country.

For one man to have the power to wipe out our industries at will is neither in keeping with the American tradition nor in the interest of our people. While the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York will not prevent the continuance of this policy, it will be a step in that direction, and I am, therefore, in favor of it.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, may I be recognized for 1 minute?

Mr. WOODRUM. All the time has been allocated.

Mr. GIFFORD. Twenty minutes was allotted for debate on this amendment.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts 1 minute of my own time.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I shall try not to take even a minute. We hear from the President of the United States so much about the devaluation of the dollar being the reason why agricultural prices have advanced, and we do know that cotton went immediately from 6 cents to 11 cents a pound because of it. Is it possible now that all credit is to be taken because of the reciprocal-tariff measures? Are you not going to talk about the results attained by the devaluation of the dollar, or do we want to forget about it? Is not devaluation really the reason for advanced prices?

Mr. WOODRUM. Is that what the gentleman wanted a minute of my time to talk about! [Laughter.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for 4 minutes.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to talk about the devaluation of the dollar.

Mr. GIFFORD. I hope the gentleman will.

Mr. WOODRUM. No; at the present moment I am interested in this appropriation bill and not the state of the Union.

Mr. Chairman, I think we understand pretty well just what the situation is. As has been very well said by the gentleman from Tennessee, there is the age-old traditional controversy between the two parties on the question of the tariff, and it comes up today in the consideration of this appropriation item. Our friends are very violently and outrageously complaining against reciprocal trade agreements. Now, I voted for the Reciprocal Trade Act, and I would vote for it again; but I do not wish to argue the merits or demerits of that. Let us look for a moment at the question which my friend from New York has apparently seriously made. I thought he was making the motion to get a chance to speak for 5 minutes longer.

Mr. TABER. Oh, no; the motion was serious.

Mr. WOODRUM. All right. What would he do? He undertakes to destroy a whole commission which has served not only the Nation but his own party, and which his own party, if and when they come into power again, would want to use.

Mr. TREADWAY. Next year.

Mr. WOODRUM. Well, certainly, the gentleman could not be sincere in wanting to destroy the Tariff Commission and dismember and disband this group of highly trained experts. I doubt if he does, because, if his party is so soon to be called into power, I think they will want it; but let us look a little further into the Tariff Commission. The furnishing of information for reciprocal-trade agreements is but a small part of the duties of this great Commission. As these gentlemen very well know, this Commission does not make reciprocal-trade agreements. The Tariff Commission has nothing to do with them, and nobody knows better than the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, a member of the Ways and Means Committee, that if you wiped out the Tariff Commission you would not wipe out the right to make reciprocal-trade agreements. They are not made by the Tariff Commission. The only thing the gentleman would do if he succeeded in his motion—and I cannot believe he is serious—if he succeeded in his motion he would destroy the Tariff Commission, would wipe it out. Would he destroy the President? Would he take away from the President the right to have the expert evidence and findings of the Tariff Commission in his consideration of reciprocal-trade agreements? If the Tariff Commission were wiped out entirely and all its funds taken away, the Reciprocal Trade Act would still remain upon the statute books, and the administration and the executive branch of the Government would continue to operate and continue to exercise the functions we have given them by organic law passed in this House.

We listened to these gentlemen in very eloquent protestation for several days, as I recall it, both in this body and in the other body, then passed the act.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the membership of the House will permit this appropriation bill to go to final enactment. We have all had our say.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes; if I have any time left.

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman recalls, of course, the famous statement of the Tariff Commission that the President could get a statement on either side he desired?

Mr. WOODRUM. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask that the motion of the gentleman from New York be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD at this point and to include therein a very brief letter I received yesterday from the Tariff Commission bearing on the remarks I made yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. In my remarks of yesterday, I stated that the subcommittee in charge of this bill had attempted to investigate the charge that Japanese swordfish had been landed both on the Pacific and Atlantic coasts at transportation rates serving to reduce the protection afforded by law by 50 percent and more, but that questioning at the hearings and inquiry since then had both failed to obtain a satisfactory response in this connection from the Commission.

On my return to my office, I found the following letter which had just been left for me by special messenger:

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION,
Washington, January 16, 1936.

Hon. RICHARD B. WIGGLESWORTH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. WIGGLESWORTH: I have your letter of January 11 asking information as to the part transportation rates on frozen swordfish play in cutting the tariff protection on that product. We have telephoned your office several times about this investigation, which is more or less on the verge of a public announcement. We have been hesitant, therefore, to give out information concerning the details in advance of the public announcement.

However, in view of your interest in the transportation feature, I can say that our detailed study of costs indicates that the transportation and other charges of Japanese swordfish from Japan to Boston, which is the most important domestic market, is between 1.5 and 1.75 cents as compared with the unit value of Japanese swordfish entered in the Massachusetts customs district in 1934 of about 8.25 cents. As soon as the report on swordfish is issued by the Commission I shall be glad to see that a copy is forwarded to you.

You ask also for any evidence which the Commission may possess of instances of false classification by means of which the entry of commodities is effected on a basis that in effect conceals a violation of existing requirements. You have, I think, from the hearings before the Appropriations Committee, our comments on the methods by which certain importers in the United States dealing in pottery resorted to evasive practices. The Commission is not advised at the present time of other instances of false classification similar to that followed in the imported pottery trade. We, however, are not the recipients of such complaints regularly; the function of dealing with the improper declaration of merchandise belongs to the Customs Service, and I am sure they will be glad to advise you.

Very truly yours,

ROBERT L. O'BRIEN,
Chairman.

The Committee will note the statement by the chairman of the Commission to the effect that transportation and other charges of Japanese swordfish from Japan to Boston, which is the most important domestic market, is between 1.5 and 1.75 cents. If I am correctly advised, this statement confirms substantially the charge which has been made. I hope that appropriate steps will be promptly taken to deal with the situation.

The Clerk read as follows:

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

Administration, medical, hospital, and domiciliary services: For all salaries and expenses of the Veterans' Administration, including the expenses of maintenance and operation of medical, hospital, and domiciliary services of the Veterans' Administration, in carrying out the duties, powers, and functions devolving upon it pursuant to the authority contained in the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to consolidate and coordinate governmental activities affecting war veterans", approved July 3, 1930 (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 38, secs. 11–11f), and any and all laws for which the Veterans' Administration is now or may hereafter be charged with administering, $86,500,000 together with $7,000,000 of the unexpended balance of the appropriation for this purpose for the fiscal year 1935: Provided, That not to exceed $3,500 of this amount shall be available for expenses, except membership fees, of employees, detailed by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to attend meetings of associations for the promotion of medical science and annual national conventions of organized war veterans: Provided further, That this appropriation shall be available also for personal services and rentals in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, including traveling expenses; examination of estimates of appropriations in the field, including actual expenses of subsistence or per diem allowance in lieu thereof; for expenses incurred in packing, crating, drayage, and transportation of household effects and other property, not exceeding in any one case 5,000 pounds, of employees when transferred from one official station to another for permanent duty and when specifically authorized by the Administrator; furnishing and laundering of such wearing apparel as may be prescribed for employees in the performance of their official duties; purchase and exchange of law books, books of reference, periodicals, and newspapers; for passenger-carrying and other motor vehicles, including purchase, maintenance, repair, and operation of same, including not more than two passenger automobiles for general administrative use of the central office in the District of Columbia; and notwithstanding any provisions of law to the contrary, the Administrator is authorized to utilize Government-owned automotive equipment in transporting children of Veterans' Administration employees located at isolated stations to and from school under such limitations as he may by regulation prescribe; and notwithstanding any provisions of law to the contrary, the Administrator is authorized to expend not to exceed $2,000 of this appropriation for actuarial services pertaining to the Government life-insurance fund, to be obtained by contract, without obtaining competition, at such rates of compensation as he may determine to be reasonable; for allotment and transfer to the Public Health Service, the War, Navy, and Interior Departments, for disbursement by them under the various headings of their applicable appropriations, of such amounts as are necessary for the care and treatment of beneficiaries of the Veterans' Administration, including minor repairs and improvements of existing facilities under their jurisdiction necessary to such care and treatment; for expenses incidental to the maintenance and operation of farms; for recreational articles and facilities at institutions maintained by the Veterans' Administration; for administrative expenses incidental to securing employment for war veterans; for funeral, burial, and other expenses incidental thereto for beneficiaries of the Veterans' Administration accruing during the year for which this appropriation is made or prior fiscal years: Provided further, That the appropriations herein made for the care and maintenance of veterans in hospitals or homes under the jurisdiction of the Veterans' Administration shall be available for the purchase of tobacco to be furnished, subject to such regulations as the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall prescribe, to veterans receiving hospital treatment or domiciliary care in Veterans' Administration hospitals or homes: Provided further, That this appropriation shall be available for continuing aid to State or Territorial homes for the support of disabled volunteer soldiers and sailors, in conformity with the act approved August 27, 1888 (U. S. C., title 24, sec. 134), as amended, for those veterans eligible for admission to the Veterans' Administration facilities for domiciliary care.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, my colleague the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH] yesterday placed in the RECORD a letter which he sent to Chairman Prall, of the Federal Communications Commission, and the answer he received from Mr. Prall to that letter.

Question no. 1, which the gentleman from Massachusetts propounded to Mr. Prall in his letter, was:

How many of the high-powered clear-channel radio stations (bout 40 in number, I believe) are owned or operated by those independent of and not affiliated with any of the three major networks?

Chairman Prall in answer said:

Five high-powered clear-channel radio stations are owned or operated by those independent of and not affiliated with any of the three major networks.

I have looked up this matter, and from accurate information which I have received, it appears that out of these 40 high-powered clear-channel radio stations, 21 are owned, operated, or affiliated with the National Broadcasting Co.; 14 are owned, operated, or affiliated with the Columbia Broadcasting Co.; and 3 of these stations are owned, operated by or affiliated with the Mutual Broadcasting Co. These are the three big chains, and there is a great question as to the remaining two stations being independent. Mr. Prall said there were five independent stations having this high power, clear channel. My information is that there are not over two, one at Albuquerque, N. Mex., and one at Los Angeles, Calif., and it is a question as to whether these two are independent. So here is another example of inaccurate information given by the Communication Commission to a member of the Appropriations Committee of this House.

Two years ago the Congress of the United States passed a resolution telling the Radio Commission to make an investigation with reference to the question of allocating 25 percent of all radio time to education, religion, labor, farmers, veterans, and other nonprofit enterprises and calling for a report as to what recommendation the Commission would make on this subject. About 4 weeks ago, after 2 years, the Radio Commission picked 40 men to investigate this question. These 40 men were supposed to be educators. These are the men who are to make an unbiased study of the question as to what should be done about allocating time on the radio to education, labor, religion, veterans, farmers, and other non-profit-making enterprises. Of these 40, please notice, 18 of the men picked by the Radio Commission either own or operate commercial radio stations; 7 are affiliated with people who run the stations; 2 of the 40 belong to the Communications Commission; leaving 13 educators out of the 40 to whom the general public is supposed to look for relief on this question of allocating time. This is another example of the deceit practiced by that Commission on the Congress of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, first of all, they flouted the request of 16 Members of this House who asked for a hearing on the obscene matter which was broadcast in the Mexican Government program over the National Radio Broadcasting Co. network. Now, they are trying to deceive the Congress again in their answer to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH] with reference to the questions which he has propounded.

I bring this to the attention of my colleagues of the House at this time to show the absolute need of a thorough investigation according to the resolution which I offered requesting a full and thorough investigation of this Commission. In this morning's paper I note that four members of the Commission have rebelled against the action of Chairman Prall and his answers to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH]. Evidently right in the Commission they know things are not right. That Commission should be haled before a special congressional committee of this House. Let us look into the matter of who owns the radio of the United States. Let us look into the matter of who controls it. Let us look into why the National Broadcasting Co. must be whitewashed for broadcasting obscene matter while small stations are penalized for minor infractions. Let us get to the bottom of this matter. If there is nothing wrong, we will so report. If there is something wrong—and I believe there is plenty wrong—we will rectify it. I sincerely trust that the Rules Committee will grant me the hearing which I have asked for today; that they will report out my resolution—House Resolution 394—and that this House will pass that resolution so that we may clean up a very bad situation which I feel exists in this Federal Communications Commission. The American people want to know all the facts. They are entitled to know the facts; so let us have speedy action on this resolution.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, in the four previous sessions of Congress there has been a provision in the independent offices appropriation bill for a small appropriation to take care of patients having Buerger's disease at Soap Lake, Wash. It was stricken out of this bill during an executive session of the committee at the request of General Hines. I did not know anything about this until just a few days ago, when it was too late to appear before the committee, as the hearings had closed. So Senator SCHWELLENBACH, the junior Senator from the State of Washington, and myself went down to the Veterans' Bureau and talked with General Hines and the medical director, Mr. Griffith. They contended that there was nothing to show that the patients were receiving any benefits from the treatment at Soap Lake. Senator SCHWELLENBACH and myself took issue with that statement. With all due respect to these two gentlemen, they live in Washington, D. C., while Senator SCHWELLENBACH and myself live out there. We have been there and we have seen with our own eyes, and seeing is believing.

Mr. Chairman, we know that the effects from the treatment there at Soap Lake are beneficial; that the disease known as Buerger's disease is arrested by treatment at Soap Lake; and therefore we would like to have the appropriation made. In talking to General Hines, he stated, as did the medical director, that they still had an open mind. They asked what we would suggest doing. I suggested that Dr. Bogard, who has had charge of these patients at Soap Lake, be called to Washington. They agreed to call Dr. Bogard here and have a full hearing and a full investigation. They have sent for him, and under those circumstances I agreed not to present an amendment to this appropriation bill at this time. However, I want to place before the Members here some material, if I may be permitted to do so in the 5 minutes which I have at my disposal, so that they may know just what this Buerger's disease means.

This proposed provision for a continuation of an appropriation is in keeping with Senate Joint Memorial No. 8 of the Washington State Senate passed unanimously on January 29, 1935, petitioning the President and the Congress of the United States to provide adequate facilities at Soap Lake for the care of all veterans afflicted with Buerger's disease.

It is in keeping also with the action of the Washington State American Legion convention and the National American Legion Convention at Miami.

It is possible that some Members of this House have not come in contact with those who are suffering from Buerger's disease. For the benefit of such Members, let me say that Buerger's disease is a gangrenous affliction of the extremities. A couple of years ago there were some 700 veterans suffering from this disease. I am informed that the number is not now so large. This decrease in the number of sufferers is due, not to the fact of a remarkable number of cures but rather of a great number of deaths.

The disease affects the extremities. It begins in the fingers and toes. The ordinary type of treatment is amputation—a joint or two at a time. Then there comes, if the patient is fortunate, a temporary arrestment with subsequent infection and further amputations. One Buerger's patient with whom I am personally acquainted has had 19 anesthetics, with from 1 to 5 amputations each time. Both legs have been amputated a little at a time, until now they are off well up to the knees. He has not a whole finger on either hand—they have been amputated a joint at a time. This veteran spent some $8,000—all that he had—in an attempt to find relief from his affliction.

He found this relief in the waters of Soap Lake. The stumps of his legs and his fingers are healed, and he no longer suffers the agonies which the disease brings with it. Other veterans and many nonveterans have had similar experiences.

One veteran told me that when he was sent to Soap Lake from one of the Veterans' Administration facilities his feet were in such a state of decay that the dogs followed him wherever he went because of the odor of the decaying flesh. Then he pulled off his socks and showed me the fine, healthy scar tissue which had resulted in only a few months of treatment in Soap Lake.

It is a significant fact that with one possible exception every veteran who has been treated there has improved in proportion to the length of the treatment.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Mr. Chairman, the Veterans' Administration has said in the past that chemical analysis of the water at Soap Lake shows no healing properties for this disease which cannot be obtained in other places. They attribute the success in combating the disease there to change of environment and diet. Perhaps they are right, but if the environment at Soap Lake brings results which are not achieved any place else, that is the proper place for the veterans to be sent for the treatment of this disease. I do not know what it is in the water of Soap Lake that brings relief to these sufferers, but I should like to take the Members of this House there with me to witness the arrestment of the disease which has brought relief to all the veterans who have gone there. I am not a doctor; I cannot diagnose these cases. I cannot prescribe cures for them. I can only see the results that have been achieved. Dr. Bogard, who has been in charge of the work at Soap Lake for the Veterans' Administration, told me a year and a half ago that when he went there to take charge he was frankly skeptical and did not believe that any great amount of good would be accomplished. But he said that after supervising the treatment of those veterans for several months and watching the progress which they made he was convinced that there was something there that accomplished the desired results.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to include as a part of my remarks a letter written to me, together with a statement with reference to what has been accomplished at Soap Lake. This letter and statement is by one of the patients at Soap Lake.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

The letter and statement is as follows:

SOAP LAKE, WASH., January 10, 1934.

Hon. KNUTE HILL,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In answer to your telegram, sent to Will L. Williamson, am answering it, as "Bill" is working at the dam as reemployment man. "Bill", as you may know, has been cut off the Government pay roll for something or other and has to get out and try to make a living the best way that he can. And believe me, if "Bill" didn't have so much of what makes bugs stick on windshields, he would be just out of luck. It is a dirty shame, a man with the loss of both legs and six fingers, due to service, has to go out into the world against keen competition.

Enclosed find pictures that I think will explain themselves. And you have met all the men described in the letter, so you know that the conditions that I spoke about are the truth. You talked to each of them personally.

Kresser, the one with both legs and nine fingers off, you met and talked to after his last amputation. He is now very nearly healed up, getting lots of rest, free from that terrible pain.

Several have come here on their own hook and have received wonderful results and are going to stay here for a while as they have shown such a marked improvement that they refuse to go to a hospital and try the treatments that have been offered to them.

I hope that you will be able to get some wonderful results in your fight for a treatment station being located here.

Thanking you, and hope that you will let me know the results, I remain,

Yours very truly,

EARL MCKAY.

HISTORY OF BUERGER'S DISEASE AT SOAP LAKE, WASH.

Buerger's disease (thrombo angiitis obliterans) is the spasmodic contraction of the nerves governing the arteries. This contraction gradually closes the blood vessels, thus shutting off the blood supply to the extremities. After lengthy periods the blood is cut off completely and a fibrous growth appears in the artery. Gangrene sets in in the affected parts, the flesh sloughs off, leaving the bone and live nerves exposed, and causing the sufferer terrific pain at all times. Orthodox methods of treatment offer but temporary relief, and that by continuous amputation of the affected parts. Then the natural mineral-water treatment was discovered at Soap Lake. Brief histories of individual cases treated there follow:

ANDREW E. M'CAY

Diagnosed as Buerger's disease in 1921. Toes, feet, both legs and left arm, hand, and three fingers highly discolored. Faced amputation of all diseased members. Went to Soap Lake in December 1921 as a last resort. Daily baths and drinking the water from the lake was the only treatment. By June 1922 the diseased tissue had sloughed off and granulations appeared. Eleven months later, in May 1923, all the wounds had healed perfectly without any amputations except the removal of the honeycombed bone from the first joint of the left great toe. In the past 10 years Mr. McKay has enjoyed perfect health without a return of the disease in any form.

CARL A. TURNER

Diagnosed as Buerger's disease in 1928. Suffered the amputation of the left leg below the knee in March 1929 at the veterans' hospital in Walla Walla. Was confined there for a period of 16 months, as the wound would not heal and became highly gangrenous. Went to Soap Lake in July 1930 with the stump black with gangrene and the bone protruding an inch or more. Within a year the diseased tissue had sloughed off, new tissue had formed covering the bone, and healing perfectly. Has had no return of the disease in any form.

WILLIAM L. WILLIAMSON

Diagnosed as Buerger's disease in 1920—service-connected disability. Suffered 26 amputations, resulting in the loss of both legs below the knees and 6 fingers during the period from April 1921 until February 1929. Went to Soap Lake in October 1930 with both stumps affected and all fingers, as well as finger stumps. Was given 2 weeks to live by Veterans' Administration doctors. Condition cleared up within 1 year of Soap Lake treatments. Has enjoyed perfect health the past 2 years without a return of the disease in any way.

The above three cases pioneered these Soap Lake treatments with wonderful results, and because of these results concentrated their efforts in having the Government recognize the Soap Lake treatments as a means of bringing relief to all veterans suffering from Buerger's disease.

On December 3, 1932, the Veterans' Administration sent nine cases, gathered from three Veterans' Administration hospitals, to Soap Lake to test the waters as a relief for Buerger's disease. These cases varied from the first stages to severe anatomical and ulcerated stages of Buerger's disease. Brief histories of these cases follow:

OLIVER C. REITER

Anatomical loss of one arm above the wrist and one leg at the hip. Other hand affected with three fingers ulcerated to the bone. This condition cleared up, the fingers healing, and he was free from pain within 8 months. His condition generally and materially improved.

LOUIS KRESSER

Anatomical loss of both legs below the knees and five fingers. Other fingers and thumbs affected. The decayed bones had to be removed from three fingers. The wounds nearly completely healed within 8 months. Later he was called to Denver for presumptive-case examination, and two fingers broke out and he had to have them cut off. At present they are very nearly healed and the veteran is free from pain. There is a very small area that is draining.

"TONY" ZALER

Anatomical loss of one leg at the hip. Limbs were badly ulcerated. Completely healed when transferred to Denver.

FARISH L. DYER

Badly ulcerated condition in left great toe. Hands and other foot in the first stages. Condition cleared up materially and the ulcerated toe entirely healed when discharged.

THEODORE KEARIS

Anatomical loss of one leg below the knee, one finger, and great toe on other foot. Both hands affected. Condition cleared up so that man now enjoys life and is living in Soap Lake in preference to being in some hospital where the outcome is future amputations.

ALFRED FOUSHA

Early stages of Buerger's disease with two ulcerations on two toes. Entirely healed and stayed at Soap Lake until ordered discharged by Veterans' Administration.

EMERY NEIL

Case long standing; left limb shrunken and useless but had not reached the ulceration period. Affected limb took on new life, and a strong pulse developed where none could be found before Soap Lake treatment.

ROBERT SCHAAB

Legs and feet and hands affected. Had not reached the ulceration period. Condition improved, but was there too short a time to get good results, due to the fact that he was discharged.

CHARLES W. PATTERSON

Early stages of Buerger's disease in feet and hands. Condition substantially improved. Discharged at his own request after 8 months' treatment.

The above-named nine veterans were under the personal supervision of a Veterans' Administration doctor, Dr. Edward Bogard. See his reports for vertification.

Respectfully submitted.

ANDREW E. MCKAY.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTE HILL. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KVALE. The statement which the gentleman has just read probably makes my question unnecessary, but I had hoped that he would point out the vital necessity of doing something to curb this creeping, crawling horror, to which he referred. It is one of the most vicious diseases known to mankind. If the doctor which the gentleman has in mind has some helpful means of combatting this diseases I surely hope the doctor may have the facilities furnished him to go forward and develop his research along that line.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. I hold no brief for Soap Lake. I have no personal interest in it whatever, but I do have an interest in what the gentleman stated in connection with this terrible disease and in trying to do something for these men. We have gone on record here as being in favor of spending $2,000,000,000 for adjusted compensation, and I am in favor of it, but I believe we should also take care of these men who are dying by inches if there is any possible way of doing so. This matter will be taken up in the Senate in the proper manner after Dr. Bogard comes here.

Mr. THOMASON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTE HILL. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. THOMASON. Does the gentleman propose to offer an amendment to the pending bill?

Mr. KNUTE HILL. No. I am withholding that in view of the fact that Dr. Bogard is coming here and a full hearing will be had.

Mr. THOMASON. What does the gentleman have in mind so far as the appropriations to meet this situation are concerned?

Mr. KNUTE HILL. I am having this matter inserted in the RECORD so that the Members may read about the things that have been going on at Soap Lake and the treatment and arrestment of the disease at that place.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, before that is done I want to proceed for a short speech on the proposed Townsend plan, and I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. WOODRUM. We are going to have some roll calls and I hope the gentleman will permit us to proceed. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the request for the present.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend and to proceed out of order and to insert some data and excerpts in my remarks.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, is this going to be a political speech?

Mr. BLANTON. No; not the kind my friend would object to.

Mr. RICH. No politics in it?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I intend to discuss some Townsend plan incidents.

Mr. RICH. Well, go ahead.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, our able and distinguished young colleague and friend from Montana, Mr. MONAGHAN, is one of the leaders on this floor for Dr. Townsend and the Townsend plan. When he delivered his Townsend plan speech here Wednesday, Dr. Townsend honored him by sitting in the gallery and listening to him intently. The gentleman from Montana [Mr. MONAGHAN] is a national authority on the Townsend plan, hence what he says about it is reliable and important.

RUIN TO INDEPENDENT BUSINESS

Our able colleague from Wisconsin, Mr. BOILEAU, on Wednesday of last week make his unanswerable argument against the Townsend plan, and stated:

> I want to predict that the use of a 2-percent transaction tax as a means of raising the money to pay this pension will ruin each and every small businessman in this country.

And he concluded his speech by saying:

> The few advocates of the Townsend plan in this body have never defended its principal provisions upon this floor, and I say with a firm conviction that there is not a man in this House who can or will attempt to defend the transactions tax embodied in this plan upon the floor of the House. [Applause.]

MOST DANGEROUS ADMISSIONS

My good friend from Montana, Mr. MONAGHAN, immediately took the floor in an attempt to reply to the Boileau challenge, but he did not even pretend to defend the transactions tax. The following colloquy occurred, and I quote from page 181 of the RECORD for Wednesday, January 8, 1936:

> Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
> Mr. MONAGHAN. Yes.
> Mr. BLANTON. Does the 2-percent sales or transaction tax the gentleman and Dr. Townsend propose in this Townsend measure apply to all commodities, or are the necessities of life excluded?
> Mr. MONAGHAN. As I understand it, I may say to the gentleman from Texas that the transactions tax applies to all commodities; in fact, to all transactions.
> Mr. BLANTON. It applies to all commodities?
> Mr. MONAGHAN. The transactions tax covers every transaction of whatever nature that might occur in the commercial or business world.
> Mr. BLANTON. Then the 2-percent transactions tax would cover the purchase of every bottle of milk and every loaf of bread?
> Mr. MONAGHAN. That is correct.

Vital statistics disclose that a majority of the people of the United States never reach the age of 60 years. Hence, even if such plan were constitutional, and clearly it is not, they are proposing to put a 2-cent tax on every bottle of milk bought for babies, and 2 cents tax on every loaf of bread that every poor person in America may buy to keep from starving. And this tax is to be placed upon all of the 120,000,000 people of the United States to benefit only those who have reached the age of 60 years, notwithstanding a majority of the people thus taxed will never in life benefit from it themselves, because a majority of the people will die before they reach the age of 60 years.

THE SOLAR-PLEXUS ADMISSION

But the following colloquy last Wednesday week, page 181, puts Brother MONAGHAN out of court:

> Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?
> Mr. MONAGHAN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.
> Mr. BLANTON. Under the Constitution the Congress has no power whatever to tax all the people for the benefit of a certain class. Nowhere in the Constitution is there power given to Congress to tax all the people in order to pay a gratuity to any particular class.
> Mr. MONAGHAN. I believe the gentleman has stated the proposition correctly.

Where does that admission leave Dr. Townsend? It puts him outside of the Constitution. For it will not be denied that the Townsend plan proposes to tax all of the people a 2-cent tax on every bottle of milk they buy, and a 2-cent tax on every loaf of bread they buy, and a 2-cent tax on every transaction of every kind, nature, and description, to pay a gratuity to a particular class, to wit: Only to those who reach 60 years of age, when, as heretofore stated, a majority of the people of the United States never reach the age of 60 years, and could never receive such gratuity themselves.

IN DAYS OF OLD, WHEN KNIGHTS WERE BOLD

Every day since Wednesday of last week, when the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU] issued his challenge "that there is not a man in this House who can or will defend the transactions tax embodied in this Townsend plan", we have been watching for some knight of the Townsends to take up the gauntlet and to make the defense thus challenged. Practically a week passed in silence. Knight MONAGHAN failed to make proper answer. We all began to wonder. What other Townsend knight would appear on the lists? Naturally we expected the lot to fall on our new colleague from Michigan, Mr. MAIN, who, it is said, came here on the platform, "If you will elect me to Congress I will go there and pass the Townsend bill for you."

So very naturally, when our distinguished friend from Michigan [Mr. MAIN] took the floor last Tuesday we expected him to defend the Townsend plan, but he then stood on this floor for 20 minutes in his maiden speech and never even mentioned the Townsend plan. He never even referred to the Townsend plan. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a few minutes, after I finish my remarks.

And I happened to remember he comes from the most rock-ribbed Republican district in the United States, the Third District of Michigan, which for 40 years has never had a Democrat here in Congress. It has elected Republicans always for 40 years. It has a normal Republican vote of 45,000—45,000 normal Republican votes—and yet when our distinguished Townsendite was elected as a Republican against a Democrat he could muster only 25,000 votes. Twenty thousand Republicans laid down on him and would not vote. [Laughter and applause.] There were 20,000 votes missing in the Republican Party that he could not muster. Our good friend from Michigan [Mr. MAIN], being a Republican, would have been elected from that Republican Third District of Michigan if Dr. Townsend had never been born.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the great Townsend leader on this floor, my able and distinguished friend from Montana. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MONAGHAN. I thank the gentleman, and I reciprocate the compliment.

Mr. BLANTON. Please be brief, because my time is fleeting, and the gentleman from Virginia has been most gracious in allowing me to interrupt his bill.

Mr. MONAGHAN. And I want to thank the gentleman for calling me a knight as well, and I wish to say that I have not defended the sales tax in any speech on this floor; I have condemned it. There is a vast difference between a sales tax and a transaction tax, the one proposed in the revised McGroarty bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry I cannot yield further. I would gladly yield to the gentleman, but I have not the time to yield further.

The gentleman's entire speeches here have been in favor of a transaction tax on every bottle of milk and on every loaf of bread. Here is what my friend admitted from this floor here on Wednesday, January 8, 1936:

Mr. BLANTON. Does the 2-percent sales or transaction tax the gentleman and Dr. Townsend propose in this Townsend measure apply to all commodities, or are the necessities of life excluded?

Mr. MONAGHAN. As I understand it, I may say to the gentleman from Texas that the transaction tax applies to all commodities; in fact, to all transactions.

Mr. BLANTON. It applies to all commodities?

Mr. MONAGHAN. The transactions tax covers every transaction of whatever nature that might occur in the commercial or business world.

Mr. BLANTON. Then the 2-percent transactions tax would cover the purchase of every bottle of milk and every loaf of bread?

Mr. MONAGHAN. That is correct.

I want to discuss a little further the maiden speech of our newly elected Congressman from Michigan [Mr. MAIN], whom the newspapers asserted was elected to Congress on the sole issue that he was a disciple of Dr. Townsend and would pass the Townsend plan if elected.

Yet not one word about the Townsend plan did our new colleague from Michigan [Mr. MAIN] utter. Apparently nothing concerning the Townsend plan was in his mind. He seemed to have left his Townsend speeches in Michigan. He used up every moment of his 20 minutes in a crude sophomoric attack on President Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Last Sunday's Washington Post stated: "Townsend leaders claim credit for the election of VERNER MAIN, of Michigan, on a Townsend platform." But the oath he took when becoming a Congressman seems to have made an impression on him, for, after introducing himself and saying he was glad to be here, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAIN] had the following to say about President Roosevelt's message to Congress:

I am depressed at the reflection that on the very day I took the oath of office "to support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic", a very distinguished gentleman, who had likewise taken an oath of office of equal or more serious import, saw fit to interpret the functions of his office in a manner tending, although perhaps not calculated, to demean and belittle the high office of which he is the present incumbent.

And before he concluded his maiden speech, wherein from its start to finish he did not mention the Townsend plan, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAIN] said:

Even the President of the United States cannot deceive the people time without number.

When has President Roosevelt ever deceived the people? His whole heart and soul is wrapped up in the people's welfare. The only promising utterance in the speech of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAIN] was his assertion:

For my part, I am interested, first, in the state of the Union; and my responsibility is to see what I can do at this time to protect, preserve, and promote the general welfare of the Nation.

And he concluded his speech by saying:

Let us, I say, have a government of laws, and not of men.

And that is what we have got, a government of laws, with a Constitution that protects the rights of the people. When Congress passes a law not authorized by the people's Constitution, the people's Supreme Court sets that unconstitutional law aside and annuls it. And when the great Townsend leader from Montana [Mr. MONAGHAN] admitted that under the Townsend plan every bottle of milk and every loaf of bread and everything else that all of the people of the United States bought or transacted would be taxed to pay this $200 per month to every person 60 years old or over in this particular class, and this Townsend leader further admitted that the Constitution does not authorize Congress to tax all of the people to pay one particular class, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAIN] remembered the oath he took on the opening day of Congress, and this must have been why he could not find it in his heart to speak for the Townsend plan that is not authorized by the Constitution.

ALL CONGRESSMEN FAVOR OLD-AGE PENSIONS

Every Member of this Congress is in favor of old-age pensions. Every Member of this Congress has deep sympathy for the aged without proper incomes. Every Member of this Congress will do everything possible for the needy aged, which our Constitution authorizes, and which our Supreme Court will uphold.

NO TRUE FRIEND WILL DECEIVE

It would be absolutely futile to pass the Townsend Plan when every good lawyer in the United States knows that it would be unconstitutional, and that it would be annulled and set aside by the Supreme Court, and that under it not one dollar would ever be paid to any aged person in the United States. They would all be disappointed. They would be expecting something that would not be forthcoming. They would all then say that Congress had handed them a gold brick. They would say that we had misled them. They would say that we had fooled them. They would say that we had trifled with them. They would say that we had taken their votes and support under false pretenses. They would then turn against the Congressmen who had given them a worthless law that gave them nothing, but which had cost their Government a lot of expense in passing it and in forcing the matter to be brought before the Supreme Court to be declared unconstitutional.

THE MAIDEN SPEECH OF ANOTHER CONGRESSMAN

Let me cite my friend from Michigan [Mr. MAIN] to the maiden speech of another one of our splendid youngster Members of this House, Hon. CHARLES L. SOUTH, of Texas. Mr. C. T. Grant, of Ballinger, on behalf of himself and others, on December 13, 1935, wrote a letter to CHARLIE SOUTH, stating:

We noted in your maiden speech in Congress you opposed the Townsend Plan. Have you changed your mind in favor of it?

In reply, among other good reasons given for not supporting it, Congressman SOUTH said:

I believe this tax to be one of the most destructive and oppppressive taxes yet to be suggested, and one which would be extremely burdensome to those least able to pay. I am convinced the plan is unworkable, and would not be for the best interest of our country.

Our good friend and distinguished colleague from Cody, Mr. GREEVER, another youngster here, ably represents the entire State of Wyoming. I quote from the Wyoming Eagle of December 27, 1935, the following:

In Cheyenne, on his way to Washington, Representative PAUL R. GREEVER reiterated his belief that the Townsend old-age-pension plan is "unsound and impractical." He added: "Simple arithmetic shows the Townsend plan will cost the workingman half of what he is now earning."

DR. HENRY S. PRITCHETT

Every posted person will admit that Dr. Henry S. Pritchett is a reliable, conscientious, dependable authority on this question. I want to quote again the following from his analysis:

THE TOWNSEND RELIGION

For the Townsend plan is not a plan. It is a religion. It rests on a simple faith in the prophecies of the good Dr. Townsend, who, like many other prophets, brushes aside the plain facts that stand in the way of the realization of his faith. These facts can be simply stated, and they do not require a trained economist to understand them. What we once called "horse sense" is all that is needed.

Under the Townsend plan every 60-year-old man or woman will automatically go on the pension list and receive $200 a month, or $2,400 a year, from the Government of the United States. As there are about ten and a half million 60-year-old persons, these pensions will cost $25,000,000,000 a year, increasing as population rises. This tidy sum has to be paid out of the income of all the people, the payments to be effected by a sales-transaction tax that will reach everybody. Every time a housewife buys a loaf of bread or a pound of bacon or a calico dress she will pay a sales tax to carry the Townsend pensions. Every man, woman, and child must contribute to the Townsend pensions in proportion to his annual expenditures.

Laboring men will be called on to pay the bulk of the Townsend pensions, because they receive and spend the bulk of the national income. It certainly looks a bit doubtful when the average man is asked to lay down half his income, collected by a sales tax, in order to pay the Townsend pensions.

After calling our attention to the fact, Mr. Chairman, that the laboring men will be called upon to pay the bulk of the Townsend pensions, even if it were constitutional, which it clearly is not, Dr. Pritchett says that it would be the greatest appeal to selfishness, and a corrupter of American life:

Under the terms of the plan every 60-year-old must spend the entire $200 by the end of the month in which he receives it. For example, the $200 received January 1 must all be spent by February 1. Not a dollar must be left in his hands at the end of the month. This provision furnishes the greatest appeal to selfishness to which our human weaknesses have ever been exposed. The swapping of payments between pensioners will be a temptation which few will resist. It will require an army of inspectors to make sure that the endowed brethren are not merely swapping payments. The Townsend plan would become in practice the greatest corrupter of American life ever devised.

We will all please note, Mr. Chairman, that in his conclusion Dr. Pritchett tells us that the Townsend plan will take away half of the income of 92 percent of the people, most of whom will then have very little money to spend.

And herein lies the fatal defect in the Townsend plan. It takes away from all the people (including the Townsend pensioners) over half their income, and thus makes it impossible for the 92 percent of the people not in the Townsend plan to spend any money. If good Dr. Townsend, the apostle of this faith, could get the twenty-five billions (plus expenses) from some outside source—perhaps the planet Mars—and hand it out to the ten and a half million 60-year-old persons to spend, his faith would be justified by his works. But there is no way to get the twenty-five billions except to take it away from the incomes arising from wages, salaries, and interest on investments. Mainly it would come from those living on wages and salaries—laborers, clerks, college professors, school teachers, and all who earn their livelihood by service in one form or another. The Townsend religion is based on a profound fallacy—the assumption that by taking billions away from all the people and giving it to a small minority to spend we can bring in prosperity. Townsendism is a sincere religion on the part of those who practice it. But sincerity is only one quality which a religion must have. It must not only feel; it must think straight. Neither religion nor economics can endure on a false foundation. The politicians who are flirting with the Townsend plan are playing with fire.

HENRY SMITH PRITCHETT.

ALL CONGRESSMEN THREATENED WITH DEFEAT

Dr. Townsend and his followers have threatened that all Congressmen who refuse to vote with them will be defeated. The main campaign slogan put on their propaganda postcards is, "Thank God for the ballot." Another is, "There will be a proper punishment for you on election day." Another is, "Be wise and stay in Congress." Another is, "Change your mind while there is time." Another is, "Vote against us and out you go." Another is, "Are you willing to lose your job?" If Members here were cheap politicians, who thought more of being reelected than being of service to their country they might respond to such threats.

THE PATH OF LEAST RESISTANCE

The easy way to be reelected would be to join them and keep silent; but that, probably, would be the last reelection, for there are thousands of good honest men and women all over the United States who have been deceived by this Townsend propaganda, and who sincerely believe that Congress could give them $200 per month simply by passing such a law, and if they voted for you believing that you would produce the $200, and after your election they found that they had been deceived, that such a law is unconstitutional and cannot be put into effect, they will turn against you, and see that you are never elected again. The path of least resistance does not always pay. It is duty well performed that always pays. I would rather have the confidence of my constituents and have them realize that they can depend upon me under any and all circumstances, than to gain a reelection at the expense of having them believe that I had deceived them.

INVOLVING THE CHURCH

The Washington Post last Tuesday, January 14, 1936, quotes Rev. James R. Cox, pastor of St. Patrick's Church, Pittsburgh, as saying, "no Member can be elected without pledging aid", and stated that he gave the warning:

That no man will get into the next Congress unless he endorses the Townsend plan.

The Texas delegation of 21 Members enjoys the reputation here of being an average delegation in Congress. Who will say that this delegation would deny justice to the aged? Who will say that this delegation is unsympathetic? Why are they not just as much interested in the problems of aged men and women as Dr. Townsend?

ONLY 56 VOTES

When the vote was taken on the Townsend plan during the last session, only 56 Members voted for it. Not a Congressman from Texas voted for it. All 21 of the Texas Congressmen were unanimous in their position against it.

DR. TOWNSEND HAD MY DISTRICT ORGANIZED

On January 21, 1935, I received a letter from Mr. J. B. Leath, president, and Mr. D. C. Dove, secretary, of the Townsend Club, Mineral Wells, Tex., stating they represent 1,500 voters in Mineral Wells, and have the signatures of 2,000 voters in Palo Pinto County, and of 40,000 of the best people of my congressional district, who demand that I support the Townsend plan or resign my position. I quote from my reply the following:

After taxing incomes, inheritances, gasoline, tobacco, liquors of all kinds, the nuisance taxes, the excise taxes, the 2-cent tax on bank checks, extra postal rates, and all other taxes, this Government last year could not raise but $3,700,000,000 in total revenues from all sources. Now compare that with the stupendous sum of $24,000,000,000 needed for the Townsend plan. Can't you see that it is simply out of the question? Can't you see that it is impossible? Can't you see that it is ridiculous? Can't you see that it is absurd?

You wouldn't have any respect for me if I voted for such a monstrosity. You would not have any confidence in me if I told you I would vote for it and help to pass it. Because if it were passed, it could not be executed. It would not be possible to raise the money. The Government could not make the payments. The people would not receive their $200. They would find out that Congress had handed them a gold brick. Don't you think that it is cruel and unpardonable for any person to attempt to fool and disappoint eight or ten million old men and women and lead them to believe that they will be paid $200 per month when there is no possible chance on earth to pay them? I am not going to fool my constituents. I am not going to mislead them. I am not going to disappoint them. I want them to have confidence in me. I want them to believe in me. I want them to know that they can depend on me. And they do know it.

As I have said many times before, I am in favor of a sane, possible old-age pension such as was outlined by the President the other day. I have been in favor of it for several years. We must care for our aged men and women. I am far more concerned about the aged men and women in my district than is Dr. Townsend. I know them. He doesn't. I am their Representative. He is not. I sympathize deeply with all of their many problems, about which he knows practically nothing. We would have passed an old-age pension in the last Congress, but the President wasn't ready for it. But he then promised us that he would approve it this session. He is ready for it now. And we are going to pass it this session. And we would pass it if Dr. Townsend had never been born.

Your friend,

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

PROMOTE THE GENERAL WELFARE

The Constitution nowhere provides for an old-age pension. That is why, for about a century and a half no Congress has ever attempted to pay one. As before stated, the Constitution prevents a tax being levied upon all the people to pay a gratuity to any particular class. But there are four words in the preamble of the Constitution, "promote the general welfare", which, from time to time, have been liberally construed by the Supreme Court in a way that leads us to believe that a law authorizing a reasonable payment to the needy aged matching a like payment by the States, might be construed to be authorized as a means to "promote the general welfare", and might be held to be constitutional.

CONGRESS HAS PROVIDED AN OLD-AGE PENSION

In the last session of Congress, a law was passed authorizing the payment of a Federal pension of $15 per month to every needy person 65 years old or older, provided the State paid a like pension of $15 per month. Before Texas could pay such a pension it was necessary to pass a constitutional amendment. Texas voted on this change on August 24, 1935. I made a speech urging this change and, at my own expense, I had reprints made of same and mailed copies all over Texas and to each constituent in my district. From what I then sent to the people of Texas, I quote the following:

TEXAS IS A GREAT EMPIRE

Texas is one of the greatest States in the Union. It is rich with natural resources. Its potentialities are without limit. Why, of course, it can raise the needed money. It would be a reflection upon Texas if it could not. Texas can do anything any other State can do for its aged. There are 28 States and 2 Territories which have provided old-age pensions for their aged. They are: Arizona, California, Colorado, Delaware, Idaho, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, North Dakota, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Utah, Washington, West Virginia, Wisconsin, Wyoming, Alaska, and Hawaii. The District of Columbia has just had it granted.

FAILURE WOULD BE A CALAMITY

Texas must not fail on August 24. Too much is at stake. The issue is the welfare and future of our needy aged. They have suffered too long. We can do this for them. It is constitutional. It is proper. It is needed. It really benefits everybody. It is for the good of all. Our State can finance it. Our Government can finance it. Let us do away with poorhouses. Let us do away with poor farms. Let us not make their last years sad. Let us not humiliate them longer. Let us make glad their declining years. I hope that unselfish Texans will go to the polls on August 24 and get real pleasure out of voting for the aged men and women of Texas.

SUPPORT OF INDIGENT PARENTS BY THEIR CHILDREN

Thirty-nine States have statutes which provide that the children of indigent parents may be required to support or contribute to the support of such parents. The citations to the laws are given below.

Mr. Chairman, as I have permission next Monday to discuss this subject at length, I will wait until then to show more fully just how this proposed plan would affect all the people of the United States and just how it will affect us Members of Congress in the coming primaries this summer. I am going to put some facts in this RECORD Monday that will help every Representative in this body in the approaching Townsend contest. [Applause.]

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, coming from the Fourth Michigan District, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes on this Townsend plan question.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I am not going to object, I simply wish to make the statement that I do not object because I feel that someone on this side of the aisle having spoken on the question, fair play dictates that someone on the other side should express himself on the same matter; but after this we are going to stick to the bill.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, the thing in the speech of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] to which I must object, coming, as I do, from this rock-ribbed Republican State to which he referred—and November next will give us a solid Republican delegation—there will be no Democrats here from that State, unless possibly it be from the city of Detroit—is, having these gentlemen, these so-called supporters of the Townsend plan, get out on this floor and sail their little boats around here under one flag, while back home they are flying an emblem which means an entirely different thing.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. No.

Mr. HOOK. You will yield in November.

Mr. HOFFMAN. You may not be here to ask me to yield, and I may not be here either. [Laughter.] You will not be here because the Republican ticket will sweep the State. I may not be here because the Townsendites may endorse a Democratic candidate in my district—they have been misled before—and they may win in my district.

Mr. HOOK. They will not win in mine.

Mr. HOFFMAN. We have talked about freedom from coercion—Democrats and Republicans alike resent being given orders, although sometimes—and we will try to forget it—those from the "brain trusters" have been followed.

Speaking of coercion, listen to this: I read from the Townsend National Weekly of December 30, 1935. On the first page, at the head of an article, this is printed:

A warning to Congress.

And, over on the third page, after calling attention to the spread of the Townsend plan, there is this command:

Now, you can take our orders or—get out.

How does my good friend from Texas, Mr. BLANTON, like that, he who is always ready to defend the privileges, the rights of the Members of the House—how do you like it? You, sir, from Texas; or, for that matter, the rest of you? Listen again:

Take our orders or get out.

This, Mr. Chairman, from an organization, sponsor of the plan whose originator appeared before the great Ways and Means Committee of this House in January and February of last year, with his experts, and who up to this time has failed to offer to this Congress for action any plan which follows his plan as outlined in his sworn testimony, or any plan which tells us how we can accomplish the result which he seeks.

Oh, yes; I know what you say. You want a $200 a month pension, raised by a general transactions tax, but never have you given us the faintest idea of the mechanics of such a plan; never have you told us how the money would be collected, how it would be disbursed, nor the cost of the collection and the disbursement.

What do you Townsend supporters here in Congress actually want? As the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] said:

Why do you not tell us what you are for?

Mr. MONAGHAN. Will the gentleman yield? If the gentleman will yield, I will tell them what they are for—an adequate old-age pension.

Mr. HOFFMAN. The gentleman does not know where they stand. [Laughter and applause.] An adequate old-age pension, you say? That is not the proposition for which the Townsend supporters who have taken the floor speak.

The Townsend supporters have the blessing of Dr. Townsend. Their names are published in the issue of December 30, 1935.

Those who come from California, Washington, and Oregon have reason to support that plan. With them it is a matter of necessity. They are, so to speak, between the devil and the deep blue sea. Their constituents are at the present time in a frenzy, carried away by the thought that everyone can get something for nothing; that all, without effort on the part of anyone, can be healthy, wealthy, and wise; enjoy all of the luxuries, as well as the necessities, of life—even their wonderful climate cannot produce nor sustain such a Utopia. It rains at all Rose Bowl football games. And so the Representatives from those States, because of that peculiar situation which for the moment exists, are forced—and the force is as compelling as though it were physical—to bend the knee and bow the head before the storm and stress of the time, lest more ignorant and unworthy men come to represent their districts.

To these gentlemen our sympathy goes out. Of them we should have no criticism. They have our respect. For them we should hope and pray that soon will come the day when their constituents will recover, will shake off the mental fog which now beclouds their judgment, realize the true worth, the sound common sense, the good judgment of their present Representatives in this body, and permit those Representatives to use their own judgments, follow their own convictions.

To those self-styled crusaders, those knights in flashing armor, who march so proudly forth in this body to a great volume of sound, if not to clashing cymbals and the clarion call of trumpet, who on the floor of this House this week pledged their allegiance to the Townsend plan, I join in the challenge of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and ask, What is inscribed on your Townsend banner?

Is it the slogan given by Dr. Townsend in his sworn testimony before the Committee on Ways and Means on the 4th day of February 1935, when the following occurred?

Mr. COOPER. You insist that the $200 a month to everbody over 60 years of age could not be changed?
Dr. TOWNSEND. Yes, sir.

And you will find it on page 754 of the hearings before that committee on H. R. 4120.

In the Townsend National Weekly, under date of December 30, 1935, in a box on the front page, there is this statement:

$200 PER MONTH STANDS

There has never been, nor will be, any compromise on the $200-per-month provision in the Townsend demands. All statements to the contrary are false.

Is that your battle cry?

Are those Representatives who are listed as Townsend supporters in the same issue of that paper still standing hitched to the doctor's snubbing post? If you are, then why do you not introduce a bill giving everyone $200 per month?

Why should a Representative tell his people back home that he is in favor of one thing; then, when he comes here, speak in favor of something else?

Another thing, back home the people are told that the pension is for the poor man. What does Dr. Townsend say? Turn again to the record, page 684:

Mr. HILL (reading). Section 2 names the individuals who may be eligible for pension under this bill.

* * * * * * *

Now, regardless of the income, from whatever source received, any citizen of the United States receiving that income who is over the age of 60 years would be entitled to the $200 per month pension?

Dr. TOWNSEND. Yes. I agree to that.

Mr. HILL. That would, of course, include the wealthy people as well as the classes of people all down the line, all the way down to those who are in a state of poverty.

Dr. TOWNSEND (p. 685). We agree that the plan shall be nondiscriminatory and applied to all citizens equally.

Mr. HILL. In other words, it would apply to John D. Rockefeller, Sr.; to Henry Ford; to J. P. Morgan, as well as to a man who has no means or income at all?

Dr. TOWNSEND. If they wish to acquire the pension under the provisions of the act.

Mr. HILL. That is, they would be eligible?

Dr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Again, Mr. Hudson, who sat by Dr. Townsend's side, was asked—and you will find it on page 733 of that record:

Mr. VINSON. Is that correct? Would you not include Mr. Andrew Mellon as a beneficiary under this bill, he being past the 60 years of age?

Mr. HUDSON. Absolutely.

And that is what some of the Townsend organizers and lecturers are telling the people back home—$200 a month for everyone. But that is not the McGroarty bill. The McGroarty bill provides for a 2-percent transactions tax, the collection of what might be termed a "jack pot", and the division, after administrative expenses are deducted—and no one knows the amount of those expenses or whether there would be anything left—of what is left among those qualified to receive the pension.

And by the McGroarty bill you provide:

This annuity shall not be payable to any person who, directly or indirectly, receives from any source a net income of any kind or nature in excess of $2,400 per year.

Even the good doctor should realize the absurdity of taxing the bread, butter, milk, and meat, as well as the clothing and everything the poor man uses, for the benefit of Ford, Rockefeller, Morgan, and Mellon.

Yes; you slipped one over on the good doctor and his original plan. You come here now, and you back a bill which does not give any of those fellows I just named a nickel. [Laughter.] You just give it to the poor people. [Laughter.] You limit it to those who have a net income of $2,400 or less per year, and the major portion of the fund to pay it must come from those who earn less than $2,400 per year.

Bring out your plan. Tell us what it is. Do not wait until after election, until you have won support on the theory that you are for one proposition, while, as a matter of fact, you are for something else. Tell the people where you really stand. Tell us whether we are to follow the doctor and his 2-percent transaction tax, $200 a month for everyone over 60 meeting the other requirements of his plan, as testified to by him; to be spent, if the pensioner wishes, for whiskey—see the doctor's testimony, page 687—whether the plan is for something less than $200 and, if so, how much less. Tell us and tell us now; tell us next week when we have general debate, whether your flag is still nailed to the declaration on the first page of the Townsend National Weekly of December 30, which, let me repeat:

There has never been, nor will be, any compromise on the $200 per month provision in the Townsend demands. All statements to the contrary are false.

And when that is finished, tell us, are you heeding that statement contained on the first page of the same issue, A Warning to Congress, and are you following the concluding sentence of that article, found on the third page, which permit me to again quote:

Now, you can take our orders or—get out.

If Dr. Townsend and those who are threatening Members of this Congress with political execution, without trial, whose only test as to whether the death sentence shall be administered or not is the answer to the question, "Take our orders or get out", have the faith in this plan which they profess to have, let them be courageous about it. Let them stand by their convictions. If they win and the plan is successful, their's be the glory; if they lose, if the plan fails, let them go down with it. Let them organize their third party with Dr. Townsend as its Presidential candidate, with a congressional candidate in each district pledged to its support, and, like true soldiers, stand or fall on that issue.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. Mr. Chairman, I should not have deigned to interrupt the discussion today were it not for the mighty fine speeches that have just preceded me, consisting of mere villification and abuse of men who have come to this Congress with the ardent hope and desire of establishing an adequate pension system. To those who laugh at the arguments made, I say that he who laughs last laughs best.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman must confine his debate to the bill.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Chairman, we are here considering the independent offices appropriation bill, and under that measure we are appropriating millions and millions of dollars for various offices in this Government that we could well afford to abolish, diverting the money into a pension in the interest of the aged people of this country. In consideration of this bill argument has been advanced which I should like to answer. It has been asserted here today that I defended a sales tax. In answer to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU] the other day I stated that I was opposed to a sales tax, but favored income, inheritance, and gift taxes. I have so stated to my constituents, and I challenge the gentleman who preceded me to show in what particular sentence of any speech that I made in the State of Montana I varied my stand on the floor of this House.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONAGHAN. I refuse to yield. I deeply respect the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and his sincerity and ability and fighting spirit. I know when he takes this floor he takes it because he conscientiously believes that he is right, but I do not yield to obstreperous Republicans who take the floor merely for political purposes.

Mr. RICH. Regular order! [Laughter.]

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Chairman, there will be a time when there will be a different laughter in this House. The reason that such abusive speeches are being made here against men who are for the Townsend plan or any other adequate pension is because of the fear, the dire fear, in the hearts of those men that the $800 a month they earn will not be forthcoming after next January 3.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONAGHAN. I refuse to yield, Mr. Chairman. The Townsend plan has been presented to this Congress just as any other bill. Because of the millions who are urging its enactment it should receive consideration at this session of Congress. If you do not believe in it, vote against it, but be men enough to allow us to vote publicly, and let the people know where you stand. I shall do it on any issue that comes up in this gagged, hog-tied, bound House, where anyone who has a fairly decent principle or opinion is so frequently prohibited from giving voice to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Montana has expired.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and Mr. BOLAND, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9863, the independent offices appropriation bill, 1937, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. TABER moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to that committee to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment: Page 34, line 6, strike out the figures "$941,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$763,000."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, on that I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 91, nays 267, not voting 72, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

On motion by Mr. WOODRUM, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

NEW DEAL CURRENCY TINKERING

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks to include a radio address I made on November 30.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered over the Columbia Broadcasting System, November 30, 1935, from New York City:

Do you know what currency is? Do you know what function it performs in our daily lives? It is a subject the elements of which are very simple, and yet one which has certain very complex aspects. In the few minutes allotted to me tonight I am going to tell you in as simple words as I can what our currency is, what function it performs, and what the New Deal has done with it and to it.

What is currency? Basically it is the medium which we use to exchange conveniently what we produce for something which is produced by others. Everyone who works supplies or helps supply certain goods or services which are valuable to others, and we support ourselves by exchanging the products of our labor for goods or services we need or want, which in turn are produced by others.

As society developed it became increasingly difficult to make this exchange directly. Even under primitive conditions it was hard to divide up in the desired amounts the articles which people wished to exchange. A hunter with a surplus of animal skins could exchange them for arrow heads, some of which he could use to exchange in turn for the grain he wanted, or could hold to supply his future needs. He was willing to dispose of his skins on this basis because he was sure that what he got in exchange would keep its value so that he might reexchange it again for something he might need later. He was sure the value of the exchange medium would be maintained, for it had a real value in itself. Little by little gold came to have a paramount position in the world as a medium of exchange simply because it satisfied better than anything else the necessary elements of convenience, permanency, and value. Later still, as a greater convenience, came the use of pieces of paper to represent the gold, which was stored in a safe place, available on demand whenever needed.

I have sketched in simple terms the orthodox history of currency, the principles of which are as sound today as thousands of years ago when primitive man used beads or arrow heads for the same purpose. The use of currency has become so prevalent, however, it has filled its functions so adequately for so many generations, our exchanges are so vast and intricate, that we are inclined to forget the simple principles which underlie the problem, and we have come to think that the pieces of paper, or the small coins which we carry around today are themselves of intrinsic value, whereas, as a matter of fact, they are of little or no real worth by themselves.

It may surprise many of you to know that most of the pieces of paper which we today pass about from hand to hand and call money, although they are the promises of the United States to pay, may not themselves be redeemed for anything of value. Let us see how the New Deal brought this about.

For many years prior to the Roosevelt administration the great bulk of our currency, made up either of Federal Reserve notes or of gold certificates, was redeemable in gold on demand. The gold could always be secured, and the paper it represented had value because of this fact.

The President took office on March 4, 1933, and 5 days later the Emergency Banking Act gave the Secretary of the Treasury the right to take all privately owned gold and gold certificates. Assuming that such a drastic step may have been necessary for a short time, as an emergency measure in connection with the general closing and gradual reopening of the banks, from that time on a series of absolutely unnecessary currency tinkering steps followed.

On May 12, 1933, as part of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, the President was authorized to issue $3,000,000,000 of United States notes, valueless pieces of paper without any metal backing whatsoever, greenbacks or printing-press money, whatever you wish to call them. Although this authority has never been exercised, it hangs today as a menace over our currency system and should be repealed instantly.

The same statute authorized the President to reduce the gold content of the dollar by 50 percent and to fix the weight of the silver dollar at a definite ratio to the gold dollar. This is the old unsound bimetallism theory which most of us thought had been repudiated once and for all in the Bryan campaign of 1896.

On June 5, 1933, the President approved the infamous joint resolution declaring invalid all contracts requiring payment of obligations in gold, notwithstanding the fact that his own Treasury Department had a few weeks before sold half a billion dollars in bonds to the public, carrying the solemn obligation of the United States to pay them in gold at maturity. A year later in the gold-clause cases eight of the nine members of the Supreme Court declared this repudiation of the obligations of the United States unconstitutional, but the statute still remains on the statute books, and the administration toward the end of the last session of Congress forced through an act making it impossible for any holder of Government bonds to sue the United States on the gold obligation in those bonds. The Supreme Court having stated that Congress had no power to take away the right, the administration insisted that the remedy be removed, a flagrant denial of a right which had existed for 80 years.

And then came the London Economic Conference. In our complicated world economic system the prosperity of one country depends greatly upon that of others. No nation can long prosper with the rest of the world in a depression, for the transfer of goods in world trade is necessary so that the surpluses of one nation may be consumed by others. All currency problems have therefore an international aspect.

The economic conference was called to accomplish the stabilization of the currencies of the chief nations of the world, thus establishing a fair exchange basis between them. A delegation was sent from this country with full promise of cooperation, but after a few weeks of work the whole thing was wrecked by the personal orders of the President. Our delegation returned not only with nothing accomplished but with the result that the other nations concerned have now cause to distrust any stabilization advances which we may make.

In addition to all this was the ill-advised Warren gold-buying policy of 1933. Professor Warren sold the President on the idea that this country should bid up the price of gold, thus reducing the value of the dollar commensurately, the purpose being to achieve a certain price level. All orthodox economists know that there is no particular value in a certain price level unless wages increase correspondingly, and there is such a development of business as to maintain the situation without artificial means. But, even if a certain price level were desirable, the Treasury found out much to its surprise that prices did not go up correspondingly with the price of gold. After juggling his figures for weeks and becoming more and more hopelessly involved in commodity indexes and similar statistics, Professor Warren faded quietly from the scene, and the Treasury abandoned the gold-buying plan even more quietly, in extreme contrast to the blare of publicity with which it had been begun.

Having failed to achieve its object by its gold-buying policy, the administration laid plans to cheapen the dollar in other ways. On January 30, 1934, by the so-called Gold Reserve Act of 1934, the Government arbitrarily took over all the gold of the Federal Reserve banks, giving them gold certificates in exchange, that is, pieces of paper which were themselves valueless but which represented theoretically an equivalent amount of gold. The next day the President reduced the weight of the gold dollar by more than 40 percent, thus in 24 hours consummating a legal theft of more than $2,000,000,000 from the Federal Reserve banks of the country. One day they had gold. The next day they had gold certificates, which on their face gave the banks a call for less than 60 percent of the gold they had the day before, but they couldn't even get that, and cannot today. In the meanwhile the Treasury calmly set up as a profit on its books the gold it had thus stolen, and the New Deal speakers today regularly take this unconscionable profit into account when they estimate the resources of the Treasury. It would take only a few more thefts of this nature to wipe out all Treasury deficits, a kind of lifting yourself over the fence by your own bootstraps, which would put a private individual in jail.

Some of this so-called profit was set aside under the same January 30 legislation as a stabilization fund of $2,000,000,000 whose operations are secret, and entirely in the hands of the Treasury. No one can tell today how much of this has been used, or for what purposes.

On June 19, 1934, the disastrous Silver Purchase Act became law, under which the monetary stock of silver of the country was eventually to become one-fourth of the monetary value of the gold stock, unless in the meanwhile silver reached a price of $1.29 an ounce, more than twice as much as it then was. This act has resulted solely to the advantage of a few States where silver mining is carried on, and to the great profit of the silver speculator, who has reaped a rich harvest. On the other hand, it has completely disarranged the monetary system of several friendly countries, particularly China, which was on a silver standard. China has been drained of a large portion of its silver stocks and has therefore been forced off a metal standard, wrecking to a great extent its whole economic status and reducing trade with the United States by more than one-half in less than a year.

All this legislation and administration activity has resulted in making the American dollar less valuable. Because more dollars can be bought for gold, foreigners have shipped their gold over here to buy dollars, and we hold today more than half the world's gold, sitting unused in the Treasury vaults. In addition, we have accumulated a large amount of silver which is perfectly worthless, and have at the same time unsettled the interior economy of all nations in whose currency silver plays a major part. We have made it more and more impossible to effect world-wide stabilization of currency, and have therefore made it more and more difficult for international trade to go forward.

In the meanwhile the administration has carried on the greatest peacetime spending orgy in the history of the world, and there seems to be no let-up in the future. Each year the President postpones for another year or two the Budget balancing which he promised the year before. This vast expenditure in excess of revenue is closely allied with the currency problem because it brings closer and closer the danger of inflation.

Every depression brings out the disciples of unsound money as a hot spring day brings the snakes out of their holes. Forgetting the history of inflation in other countries, they urge experiment after experiment, all directed toward accelerating the decline in the value of the dollar. They keep saying that this can all be controlled, closing their eyes to the fact that real inflation never has been controlled, and when it once starts it is like a great torrent moving faster and faster until it reaches the brink of the precipice and plunges over with a roar, carrying everything into the abyss of bankruptcy and industrial stagnation.

It was so easy to devalue the dollar and thus give the Treasury a paper profit of several billion dollars. All that it amounted to was announcing to everyone who had a fixed amount of dollars that what they had would thereafter be worth just so much less. It is so easy to print just a little bit of worthless paper money and have the Government pay its debts with that money, always with the promise that it will stop at a certain point. But this kind of thing does not stop, unfortunately. One act of this kind begets another, until nothing can stop the juggernaut of destruction.

The New Deal record for currency tinkering is a disheartening one, but it is not too late to call a halt. We must reestablish a sound basis for our money. We must respect the sanctity of the promises of our Government. We must work toward international stabilization. We must set our faces like flint against the menace of inflation and all the horrors that accompany it.

MRS. M. N. SHWAMBERG

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secreary of State recommending the enactment of legislation authorizing an appropriation in the sum of $500 in settlement of the claim presented against the Government of the United States on behalf of Mrs. M. N. Shwamberg, nationality indeterminable, as compensation for personal injuries sustained by her as the result of a collision between a public jinrikisha in which she was riding and a United States Marine Corps ambulance on Seymour Road, Shanghai, China, on January 31, 1935.

I recommend that Congress enact legislation authorizing an appropriation in the amount mentioned, in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of State.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD to insert a telegram from Herbert S. Chittenden, of Burlington, Iowa, in which he sets out a system for paying the soldiers' bonus, which he thinks will not do any harm to the country.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following telegram:

BURLINGTON, IOWA, January 15, 1936.

Representative FRED BIERMAN:

It would be well to divert the billions of dollars that are being spent on destructive "pork" river projects and pay the past-due war debt to the country's soldiers. Practically all of the work on these "pork barrel" projects is done by machinery and a very small percentage of the money goes for labor. The upper Mississippi 9-foot channel will endanger the lives of thousands of families and eventually drive them from their homes. It will destroy many thousands of acres of fine useful timber, also ruin clam beds and commercial fishing. The largest basket factories in the country will lose their chief source of timber supply. These projects are so insanely impractical that they will cost the taxpayers millions annually for their upkeep. The bonus would be a great stimulant to business and prosperity of the country. It would go 100 cents on the dollar where it was supposed to go and all "pork" would be eliminated.

HERBERT S. CHITTENDEN,
Burlington, Iowa.

THE BONUS—OLD AGE PENSIONS—AGRICULTURAL RELIEF

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, as the Seventy-fourth Congress runs into the second week of its second session we find the Congress with a heavy calendar before it, not heavy only by reason of the number of bills thereon which are demanding consideration, but heavy principally by reason of the problems confronting it. In my humble judgment, the most important of these are three in number, being:

The payment in cash of the adjusted-compensation certificates held by the veterans of the late war; the payment of an adequate old-age pension; and the enactment of legislation which will furnish much needed assistance to struggling agriculture in this country.

I would, Mr. Speaker, at this time, with the forbearance of yourself and the membership of the House, discuss briefly these problems as they appeal to me.

On last Friday, January 10, this body, by a vote of 356–59, passed a bill authorizing an appropriation to be made with which to pay the adjusted-compensation certificates in cash in full. Many of us voted for this bill with some misgivings, not misgivings because we were not eager and anxious to pay the certificates in cash, but misgivings because we were afraid that since the bill only authorized the raising of the money with which to pay the certificates, we were fearful lest the ex-service men would have to continue their wait over another extended period while the Congress battled in an effort to find a method of paying them what would either meet with the approval of the President, and thus dodge his veto, or one which we could pass over a Presidential veto in the event the method did not meet with his approval. Of course, as every Member of this House knows, I am one of those who favor the plan of issuing currency against the gold and silver reserve in the Treasury of the United States, of which there is an unpledged balance of something in excess of $5,000,000,000, and use this money to pay our obligations to the World War veterans, holders of adjusted-compensation certificates. In my judgment this would have a twofold benefit: First, it would give the ex-service men cash for their certificates; and second, it would put additional new money in circulation in a sufficient amount that the purchasing power of the dollar would be reduced and commodity prices would be greatly increased. However, the method of raising the money is in my opinion secondary to the paying of the certificates. I shall therefore vote and support with every pound of my strength any plan to raise the money which in my judgment will get the ex-service men their money in the shortest length of time. I am hopeful that a plan will be agreed upon and a bill enacted into law that will get the cash in the hands of our ex-service men before the leaves bud in the spring.

I am not at all satisfied with the old-age-pension plan that we adopted at the last session of Congress, embodied in the social-security bill. My objections to it are twofold. In the first place, the Federal Government is not authorizing the payment of enough money to them, and in the second place, since the Government admits by the passage of that legislation that it has some obligation to the old men and women of this Nation, it should not say to them we will pay you this obligation provided you live in a certain State, and provided that State has certain laws which will permit them to first obligate themselves to pay you before we will fulfill our obligation to you. There are almost as many plans for the payment of an old-age pension now pending before the Congress as there are Members of the Congress. I sincerely trust that one of these plans will get far enough along the congressional hurdles that it will come on the floor of Congress for consideration before the end of this session, and I want to say to the membership here now that I will support any of these plans that propose to pay to the old people of this Nation, direct, some sum of money which will adequately take care of their needs, and which money will be paid to them irrespective of where they live or what laws are on the statute books of the State wherein they live.

The recent opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States dealt a telling blow to the agriculturalists of this Nation and, in my opinion, a blow below the belt. We have protected big business in this Nation through tariffs for years. We have protected other kinds of big business with subsidies. We have subsidized the railroads; we have subsidized the merchant marine; we have subsidized the schools of the Nation; we have even gone so far as to subsidize every State in the Union, provided it would meet certain requirements. I speak of those States which receive funds to be expended on the highways; which receive funds to be expended in the public-school system; which receive funds to be expended in certain universities and colleges, provided those universities and colleges use the money for the teaching of certain subjects. Therefore I say that there is abundant precedent for the Government to subsidize in some way the most important industry to civilization that there is in the United States. I can, of course, mean but one thing—that the Government should in some manner subsidize agriculture. I whole-heartedly favor an amendment to the Constitution which will make it possible for the Congress to pass legislation for the general welfare and to pass legislation which will give protection and assistance to agriculture; but it is well known that it would take a year or even more to accomplish this, even if it could ever be accomplished with the block of States in the industrial North and Northwest that would vote against any constitutional amendment which would be of benefit to the agriculturalists of the South, Southwest, Middle West, and Northwest. But are we to sit idly by while we attempt to amend the Constitution? I say not. I feel that we should pass legislation which will furnish protection and assistance for agriculture, pending the time that we are able to amend the Constitution.

There have recently been meeting in this city farm representatives from all over the United States. They have been diligently engaged in conferences from which they hope to evolve a plan that will give some lasting assistance to this struggling industry. Of course, the first thing that we must do is to come into this body and appropriate funds with which to carry out the contracts already entered into, and surely those which have been by the farmers executed, wherein they agreed to forestall the planting of certain crops with the understanding that the Government of the United States would reimburse them in cash payment for those crops which they had not planted. This, Mr. Speaker, I am confident, will surely be done, because it is a solemn agreement entered into in good faith by the farmers of this Nation, and I trust entered into in good faith on the part of our Government, which we boast is the greatest Government under the sun.

The plan which is now being very freely discussed by farm representatives and by the Secretary of Agriculture and by the President himself is one that would subsidize the farmers under a plan similar to this. It would be based on soil conservation, and might I say here that since it was myself who introduced the first two bills in Congress to set up as a permanent department of Government a soil-erosion service, and since it was myself who made the first speech on that subject that was ever made on the floor of this House, and since the bill which was adopted was taken almost entirely from the original bill which was introduced by me, I can certainly take unto myself, from recent developments, a great deal of satisfaction. The reason that these gentlemen feel that the plan which they have under consideration would be by the highest court in the land held constitutional is this: In the recent opinion the Court indicated that the Congress would have power to levy taxes and pay benefits for the public defense and for the general welfare.

Their reasoning is that since the soil is admitted by everyone to be the greatest natural resource within the possession of the citizens of the United States, that any law which would have for its purpose the protection of that great natural resource could not fail to be constitutional. It would work like this: By reason of the fact that the farmers of this Nation are so sorely in need of money, they have in the past been planting every available acre to make some cash crops. These basic crops have been cotton, corn, and wheat, all three of which drain the fertility from the soil and all three of which encourage erosion on the land, by reason of the fact that the land must be kept bare of vegetation and thus expose its nakedness to the elements and invite the rains that come intermittently to wash its fertile topsoil into the gulleys, the gulches, the creeks, and the rivers. This plan would therefore pay a farmer benefits for that land which he did not put into cultivation, provided that he would plant on that land some crop which would prevent its erosion and which would build back the fertility taken from that land, such crops as legumes.

Thus is explained what the President meant when he said that we are shipping the fertility of our soil to the foreign lands too cheap, his meaning being that when we punish our land to grow surplus crops, which force the price of those crops down to such a point that first they must be disposed of at a price so low that the farmer could not get from them cost of production, and, second, a price so low that we sold those crops at that ridiculously low figure to foreign lands. This plan is only as yet in the rough, and the details are now being worked out. I sincerely trust that those details will have in them benefits that will flow not only to the landowner but also to the tenant farmer. If this plan does in the end have such provisions, I shall certainly be one of those to heartily support the same, and, Mr. Speaker, if there is another plan or other plans evolved and presented to this Congress which will accomplish the purpose of giving substantial aid to the agriculturalists of this country, I shall be one of those who will support that plan or plans with every ounce of fighting strength that I possess, and I pledge myself here and now to an undying struggle to obtain for the ex-service men of this Nation, the old people of this Nation, and the farmers of this Nation those things to which they are so justly entitled; and until these three battles have been won, Mr. Speaker, I will feel that my work here has not been accomplished.

THE LATE HON. CLYDE KELLY

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by inserting a tribute to the memory of Hon. Clyde Kelly, of Pennsylvania, by the American Indian Federation.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following tribute to the memory of Hon. Clyde Kelly, of Pennsylvania, by the American Indian Federation:

MEMORIAL

As we are gathered here in the first annual meeting of the American Indian Federation, it is fitting that we pause to render tribute to the memory of one who has but recently departed from this life and whose death has brought deep sadness among the Indians throughout the United States, the late Honorable Clyde Kelly, of Edgewood, Pa.

Clyde Kelly was a man among men. His record of service in the Christian Church, his record of service in the Congress of the United States, his record of service in many a cause for the betterment of all humanity—the Bible Class of the Chevy Chase Presbyterian Church which bears his name—all of these bear mute testimony to the high ideals of true Christian service which motivated him throughout his entire life.

For all of these things, the name of Clyde Kelly will remain in the hearts of those who knew him. But it is for his record of service in the cause of freedom for our race that the Indians will remember Clyde Kelly. He did not view the Indian as a problem, an inferior, nor as a curiosity. With the eyes of true Christianity, he looked upon the Indian as a human being, entitled to all the rights and privileges of freedom guaranteed to other human beings by the Constitution of this Nation. With deep and discerning wisdom he looked beyond the outward results to the real cause of the evils. He saw the Indian people as slaves in bondage suffering under the autocratic and demoralizing control of a bureaucracy.

His was not a passive sympathy. He was not content to sit idly by while such conditions existed. Actively, vigorously, and militantly, year after year, he carried forth his efforts within the Halls of Congress and among the people of the Nation in the cause of freedom for the Indians. And the words which he has spoken there will live on—a source of highest inspiration, hope, and encouragement to all Indians and friends of Indians. No one can measure the good that he has accomplished in this one cause alone. Just as a small stone cast into a pool causes an ever-widening circle of ripples—so too have been the thoughts, the words and the deeds of Clyde Kelly.

Marc Antony, standing at the tomb of Julius Caesar said: "The evil that men do lives after them—the good oft interred with their bones."

Let this not be true of Clyde Kelly. Let us catch up the torch which he carried aloft in the cause of freedom for our race, that his work may never die. Let us go forth today, reconsecrated and rededicated to that cause and with a strengthened determination within ourselves that this cause shall be carried forward to ultimate victory.

And with deep and sincere appreciation of the loss which has been suffered by the Indian race through his demise, with sorrowfully saddened hearts, let it be hereby

Resolved, That we, the American Indian Federation, in first annual meeting convened, do spread upon our records this tribute to his memory, so that all coming generations may know and be inspired by the name of Clyde Kelly. Of him let it be said that he was a true friend to the Indian people. To have known him was a rare and privileged blessing. Let us honor his memory as a Christian, for his high ideals of service to humanity; honor his memory as an American and the true principles of democracy for which he labored; honor his memory as a man for his great strength of character and his beautiful simplicity of spirit; and lastly, let us honor his memory as our friend, the best friend the Indian race has ever had within the Congress of the United States; and be is hereby

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be transmitted to the bereaved family of the late Honorable Clyde Kelly, with expressions of our deep and sincere sympathy. May this testimony of our appreciation for the unselfish service he gave to our race and the high esteem with which we cherish his memory bring some measure of comfort to them. May the merciful tenderness and the gracious kindness of our Heavenly Father surround and sustain those who mourn.

THE A. A. A.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein a resolution from the Hickman County Farm Bureau in regard to the Agricultural Adjustment Administration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution from the Hickman County Farm Bureau in regard to the Agricultural Adjustment Administration:

HICKMAN COUNTY FARM BUREAU,
Centerville, Tenn.

Resolutions of the Hickman County Farm Bureau in session at Centerville, Tenn., January 11, 1936

Be it resolved, That we, the members of the Hickman County Farm Bureau, and other farmers of Hickman County, express our great indignation and regret over the action invalidating the Agricultural Adjustment Act. We unhesitatingly state that the throwing out of the A. A. A. is a death blow to our farmers who, under the benefits of the A. A. A., were beginning to recover from many years of low prices for their products and beginning to recover from the effects of the insecure position agriculture has had up to 1933.

Be it further resolved, That we solicit your efforts to make provisions to pay the remaining unpaid payments due under existing 1934 and 1935 adjustment contracts.

Be it further resolved, That we respectfully request that you urge action in Congress to require the processing-tax money, now held in escrow, be turned over to the Government to help pay the unpaid payments of 1934 and 1935 contracts or to require the processors to pay this money to the consumers from whom it was collected.

Be it further resolved, That we respectfully solicit your every effort to work with our farm leaders in supporting a control program for agriculture, so we as farmers of our county, State, and Nation may have a just and proportionate income for our labors; be it

Further resolved, That your efforts in our behalf will be carefully observed and we as a Farm Bureau organization in our county ask you as our Representative in Congress, to support our President, the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, our Secretary of Agriculture, the Honorable Henry Wallace, our Farm Bureau President, Mr. Ed O'Neel, and Mr. O'Neel's representatives, who represent our county, State, and Nation, in their efforts for justice for agriculture and justice only; be it Further resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to our Senator, the Honorable K. D. McKellar, to our Congressman, the Honorable Clarence W. Turner, to Secretary of Agriculture, the Honorable Henry A. Wallace, and to the President of the United States, the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Passed this the 11th day of January 1936, at Centerville, Tenn.

ROY BLACKWELL,
J. A. JONES,
ASHFORD PRINCE,
The Hickman County Farm Bureau by the Committee.

Whereas agriculture was in a deplorable condition prior to 1932, and in that year had sunk to the lowest level known in the history of our country, and farmers all over the land were faced with the then impossible task of saving their property and homes from bankruptcy on account of overproduction of agricultural products, and on account of unfair and impossible competition with industry, which had the benefits of an effective protective tariff, which agriculture did not have, and the lack of this effective tariff caused the price of agricultural products to be based on low world markets; and, as this condition of the farmer, as conceded by all people of fairness and good sense, brought all business to practically a standstill, closing banks and shutting down factories, throwing millions out of employment, and even jeopardizing the safety of the Republic; and

Whereas the Congress and leaders of our Government, recognizing the conditions and the causes thereof, enacted the Agricultural Adjustment Act for the main purpose of controlling production according to the needs of consumption, as a result of which the prices of farm products have risen to the point where despair on the part of the farmer had given way to renewed hope; and as the increased prices which the farmer had received for his products has brought about a big upturn in business and employment, and had removed from the horizon of our country the specter of a long-continued depression with general economic failure; and

Whereas the Supreme Court has seen fit to declare the A. A. A. unconstitutional and illegal (for causes known to it), and has thereby brought about the possibility of the return of the terrible conditions of 1932, and possibly even worse: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the farmers and businessmen of Williamson County, in mass meeting assembled, deplore the action of the Supreme Court in declaring the A. A. A. invalid, and that we do now call upon Senators MCKELLAR and BACHMAN and Representative TURNER to do all within their power as our representatives in the Congress to enact without undue delay such legislation as will give results comparable to the benefits and advantages comparable to those accruing to us through controlled production with living prices for our products, which the A. A. A. guaranteed us, and which we consider fair and just; and be it further

Resolved, That we petition the Congress, if it is necessary to bring about the above results, to enact legislation providing for an amendment to the Constitution limiting the power or the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, so that the Court cannot pervert the will of the people in such legislation as we are asking for through our representatives in the Congress, thereby depriving the people of the United States the right and opportunity of removing from the future the causes of uncalled-for and unnecessary depressions with the attendant suffering and hunger and loss of life and property.

W. C. JONES,
Chairman.
By R. C. DEDMAN,
Secretary.

FRANKLIN, TENN., January 11, 1936.

Resolutions

Be it resolved by the Humphreys County Farm Bureau in session at Waverly, Tenn., on the 11th day of January 1936, respectfully petition the President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, our Tennessee Senators, K. D. McKellar and Nathan A. Bachman; our Congressman, C. W. Turner; and Secretary of Agriculture, Henry A. Wallace, to work in connection with the farm leaders of all sections of the country in working out and enacting into law some measures or plans whereby the farm products of the country at large may be as effectively controlled as under the A. A. A., just recently struck down by the Supreme Court as unconstitutional.

We also respectfully urge that action be taken as speedily as possible so that the benefits so far accomplished in behalf of the farming interests in general may not be entirely lost, and farm prices may not be allowed to get back to the 1931–32 level.

We urge that such legislations be enacted as to carry out and have the Government fulfill all unexecuted contracts heretofore entered into under the A. A. A.; be it Further resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded at once to the President, United States Senators from Tennessee, Congressman, and Secretary of Agriculture.

Respectfully submitted. JNO. W. ANDERSON,
President of Farm Bureau.

As farmers, business and professional men of Maury County, Tenn., we have witnessed the vast benefits to agriculture in particular and to business in general accruing from the operation of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and it was with deep regret that we learned that this act has been ruled invalid by the highest court in the land.

Firm in the belief that the welfare of the entire Nation, all classes and all sections, depends upon economic equality between those engaged in industry and those engaged in agriculture, we hereby go on record as petitioning Congress to act as expediently as possible to pass new and further laws, or take any other steps necessary, so as to insure for agriculture complete parity with industry and to give to the farmer benefits equal to those which accrue to industry under the tariff system.

We recognize the leadership of our President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, and appreciate his courageous stand for the best interests of agriculture and for the well-being of the American citizen, and stand shoulder to shoulder with him and other forward-looking leaders who are seeking a solution to the economic problems of the Nation.

In this connection we recommend that Congress and the Executive branch of the Government act at once to adopt a national program for agriculture that will come within all legal limitations and at the same time continue and extend the benefits which began with the A. A. A. the welfare of the Nation as a whole demanding speedy, effective, and permanent action.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for 4 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman what he is going to talk about?

Mr. RICH. I want to talk about the consolidation of corporations against the Sherman antitrust laws, something that is vitally important to the welfare of every man, woman, and child in America.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, may I have unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes on Monday next, after the reading of the Journal and consideration of matters on the Speaker's desk?

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

NATIONAL LOTTERY BILL

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a letter from State Representative Roth, of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter written to me by State Representative Roth, of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, regarding the lottery bill and Townsend pension plan:

COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Allentown, Pa., January 15, 1936.

(Frank L. Roth, 603 North Ninth Street, Allentown, Pa. Committees: Agriculture, cities, pensions and gratuities, printing, public utilities, corporations)

Hon. EDWARD A. KENNEY,
New Jersey Democratic Representative,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. KENNEY: On July 2, last, I wrote to you relative to your national lottery bill to provide revenues, to reduce Federal and State taxes, which you had up before the House Ways and Means Committee, which we people in our section of Pennsylvania are so very much in favor of to raise money for the purpose as aforesaid. On July 5 you answered my letter very kindly, with the hope that you would eventually be successful.

I again desire to call your very special attention to this, the most important matter, that the Members of the House and Senate should take an active part in at once, as the most important matter to be considered in your present session of Congress.

A national lottery is the only sure method to raise money without taxation for the purpose to raise money to pay the bonus, old-age pensions, and to reduce Federal and State taxes. Other countries are doing it. Why not do the same thing in America. The money is spent anyhow by playing the lottery game in other countries and the smaller beneficial drawings right at home. The churches are gambling right along on the smaller scale, who are only the few of the kickers. But if the said churches are gambling for a good cause, then why is it that the people in general throughout the United States shall not have the liberty and the privilege to do the same thing. We are overburdened with taxation and the lottery movement would greatly relieve the people of America by being further loaded up with tax obligations.

Also desire to call your very special attention to the fact that we Pennsylvania people are very much in favor of the so-called Townsend pension bill and ask you to support the said bill. We are not so much in favor for the $200 monthly payment plan but should be at least the amount of $100.

The old people who need help should receive first and immediate attention. In fact it is by far more important than the bonus bill for the younger class because they can much easier support themselves than the aged who are unable to work anymore and barred from getting employment. Therefore, we hope and put our trust in thee that you will use all your good efforts to help in pushing the above matters through and enact same into laws.

I wish to thank you a lot for whatever you may do in these matters and further ask you to cooperate with your other Members in the House and the Senate and get them to join in the movement. I again thank you. I remain,

Yours very truly,

FRANK L. ROTH.

THE LATE HON. HAMILTON FISH, SR.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the subject of Hamilton Fish, Sr., a former Member of this body, and to include therein a brief biography of his public service.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman's request is granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to call to the attention of the House the passing of Hon. Hamilton Fish, Sr., at Aiken, S. C., on Wednesday last.

Mr. Fish had a long and highly honorable public career in the service of both New York State and the Nation. He always served with distinction and fidelity. He was a publicist of note and did not hesitate to take a hand, even in his later years, when he believed that the cause of America could be served. Like his distinguished son, Hon. HAMILTON FISH, Jr., he was a Member of this body.

Pursuant to the consent of the House, I append hereto a biography of Mr. Fish, which is taken from the columns of the New York Herald Tribune.

HAMILTON FISH, 86, DIES; SERVED STATE AND NATION—IN ASSEMBLY AT ALBANY FOR 12 TERMS, WAS ASSISTANT UNITED STATES TREASURER—FATHER OF REPRESENTATIVE—OWN PARENT WAS GOVERNOR, SENATOR, SECRETARY OF STATE

AIKEN, S. C., January 15.—Hamilton Fish, former Assistant Treasurer of the United States, father of Representative HAMIL-

TON FISH, Jr., Republican, died at 4:15 p. m. here today at the winter home of his daughter, Mrs. William Lawrence Breese. Mr. Fish, who was 86 years old, contracted a cold several days ago, but his illness had not been considered dangerous.

Surviving, besides the son and Mrs. Breese, are three other daughters, Miss Janet Fish, of Washington; Mrs. John Cutler, of New York City, and Mrs. Henry Forster, of Garrison, N. Y. Funeral services will be held at noon Saturday in Garrison, where Mr. Fish lived.

IN POLITICS 50 YEARS

A member of one of this country's oldest families, Mr. Fish served 12 terms in the New York State Assembly, 2 terms as speaker of the assembly, 2 terms as Assistant Treasurer of the United States, and 1 term as Representative in Congress from the Twenty-first New York District. He had been mentioned for Governor of New York and was in the thick of politics for more than 50 years before advancing age caused his retirement.

Mr. Fish was the second son of Hamilton Fish, who won triple distinction as Governor of New York, United States Senator, and as Secretary of State for 8 years during the administration of President Grant. His mother was the former Julia Kean, of New Jersey, a relative of the late John Kean, United States Senator from New Jersey. Mrs. Fish also was a close relative of the Wadsworths, Kings, Duers, Livingstons, and other famous families.

GRANDFATHER FOUGHT IN REVOLUTION

Through these forebears Mr. Fish was related to several distinguished early American patriots. He was a grandson of Col. Nicholas Fish, who fought in the Revolution at Saratoga, Monmouth, and at Yorktown; who was a law student under John Morin Scott; who was the personal friend of George Washington and the confidant of Alexander Hamilton; and who married Elizabeth Stuyvesant, the great-great-granddaughter of Gov. Peter Stuyvesant and daughter of Margaret Livingston, cousin of Chancelor Livingston.

Mr. Fish was born at Albany on April 17, 1849, while his father was Governor. He was named Hamilton after his father, who in turn received the name from Nicholas Fish, who administered Alexander Hamilton's estate after the latter's duel with Aaron Burr. Since then the name Hamilton has been perpetuated in the Fish family.

ELDER BROTHER WAS DIPLOMAT

Mr. Fish's elder brother was the late Nicholas Fish, diplomat, who became Minister to Belgium and Switzerland and who died many years ago. His younger brother was Stuyvesant Fish, financier and president of the Illinois Central Railroad, who died in 1923.

Of the three brothers, Hamilton Fish was the only one to enter the hurly-burly of everyday politics. From his birth he grew up in a political atmosphere. When he was still a baby his father went to Washington as a Senator, and young Hamilton received his first education at a private school there. Later he attended school in Geneva, Switzerland, and other private schools in this country.

Mr. Fish was still in Columbia College, from which he received his B. A. degree in 1869, when he became private secretary to his father in the Department of State. Before he was graduated from Columbia Law School, from which he received a degree in 1873, he had been an aide on the staff of Gov. John A. Dix, of New York, and chairman of the Putnam County Republican Committee. In 1873, when he was admitted to the bar, at the age of 24, he was a delegate to the Republican State convention.

ELECTED TO ASSEMBLY AT 24

In the same year Mr. Fish, running in Putnam County on the Republican ticket, was elected to his first term in the assembly. It was the first time in history that Putnam had given a majority to the entire Republican ticket. He was reelected from Putnam 11 times.

WHO WILL PAY THE BILLS

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by including a radio speech I made today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me today:

The people of the United States were shocked and alarmed some 20 years ago when the newspapers announced that for the first time in the history of the country a Congress had appropriated a billion dollars. Some of the Congressmen of that day sought to justify their extravagance by declaring that "this is a billion-dollar country."

This was a billion-dollar country. In fact, from the standpoint of ability to assume financial burdens, it was a richer country then than it is today. It had enjoyed two decades of almost uninterrupted prosperity; industry and agriculture had access to profitable foreign markets; the national debt was negligible; tax rates—Federal, State, and local—were low, measured by present standards.

Nevertheless, the reaction of the people to the announcement that Congress had called upon them to contribute $1,000,000,000 for the support of the Government and its activities was not one of complacency. Congressmen were sharply called to account, and some of them were elected to stay at home.

I wonder what the people of 20 years ago would have said if they could have gazed into some crystal and foreseen that in 1936 the interest on the national debt alone would amount to $800,000,000—almost as much as the total budget voted by the most extravagant Congress they had ever known. I wonder what they would have said if someone had predicted that the time would come—and come so soon—when a Congress would, after limited debate and perfunctory consideration, add $3,300,000,000, $2,000,000,000, $3,000,000,000, $4,880,000,000, and so on, ad infinitum, to the burdens already borne by a people that had recently been forced to shoulder a major part of the cost of the greatest war of history. I wonder what they would have said if they had been told that during 3 short years, when the people's ability to pay was at its lowest ebb, the United States Government would spend more money than it had spent in the 124 years beginning with the administration of Washington and ending with that of Taft.

How can the complacency of the American people toward the present orgy of spending be explained? Is it possible that they believe that the Government can continue forever to pay out two dollars for every dollar it collects; that debts can be incurred indefinitely without a reckoning; and that deficit can be piled upon deficit without disaster? Do they indulge in the wild imagining that money can be made to fall like manna from Heaven, or conjured forth by the hocus-pocus of economic miracle men? Or has the moral level sunk so low that a whole people is willing to borrow money without intending to repay, to issue bonds which it plans to repudiate or currency it does not expect to redeem? If such is the case, then the moral solvency of the Nation has sunk to an even lower level than its economic solvency.

I refuse to believe that there has been such an impairment of character. I believe that the average man is essentially honest, and that his indifference to unbalanced Budgets and huge public debts is due rather to the false notion, instilled by demagogues who care for nothing but votes, that it is possible by political leverage to shift the burden to a few.

If the national debt could be liquidated by confiscating Wall Street, it might be worth trying. It would be an easy solution, and most of us would probably be in favor of it. But, unfortunately, easy solutions generally don't work. Last year we "soaked the rich." We increased taxes in the higher brackets without mercy. We compelled those with million-dollar incomes to disgorge 75 percent of their "ill-gotten gains", in addition to what the States exact. Under the new rates, if a man lives, say in California, he pays a combined Federal and State income tax of 90 percent. The additional revenue from the higher taxes assessed against estates and against personal and corporate incomes will be, according to the President's Budget message, $220,000,000—a large sum, but not enough to keep the Federal Government going for 11 days! If the rate were 100 percent, we should get only a fraction of what is needed to cover current expenditures, and nothing for paying the national debt.

In fact, the expenditures of government in this country, Federal, State, and local, are $10,000,000,000 more than the total of the net incomes of all corporations, and of all individuals with a net income of $5,000 or more.

In 1934, the latest year for which figures are available, the total of incomes of $25,000 or more was only $1,500,000,000; of from five to twenty-five thousand, $3,500,000,000; of less than five thousand, $7,500,000,000.

Last year Congress authorized expenditures of $10,250,000,000. If the taxable income of every taxpayer in the country, including those in the lowest bracket, had been confiscated, leaving nothing, the amount collected would have exceeded the amount of authorized expenditures by only one-half enough to cover the deficit for the previous year.

These figures, and others that might be cited, prove that the idea that the rich can be made to bear the burden of the Federal Government and that the poor may view extravagance with complacency is without foundation. There are not enough of the rich, however large their individual incomes. Arithmetic is the best answer to demagoguery.

The truest thing that Roosevelt ever said was that "taxes are paid in the sweat of every man who labors." If that statement had been made the working formula of Congress and the administration, instead of being used merely as a vote-getting slogan, the record of the last 3 years would have been far different and we should today be on the road to real recovery.

The spending program is the present greatest bar to recovery, and there can be no return to prosperity until it is stopped. So long as one-fifth of the income of the people goes out in taxes there will not be enough left for normal spending to furnish employment for the 11,000,000 men who are out of work. So long as $4,000,000,000 of additional Government securities, exempt from State and local taxation and partially exempt from Federal taxation, are made available for investment every year, there will be no incentive or opportunity for the people to use their capital for the rehabilitation or expansion of industry. So long as the fear of the collapse of Government credit and of its aftermath of inflation hangs over the Nation, few will be rash enough to risk their capital in new business enterprises.

The burden of taxation falls most heavily on those who directly pay no taxes. They pay in higher prices and higher rents; the manufacturer, the merchant, and the landlord pass their taxes on—must pass them on or go out of business. High prices mean less consumption, and less consumption means less production and less employment. Despite the increased use of machinery in industry, it is safe to assume that all the unemployed who are willing and able to work could have jobs again if taxes were reduced to what they were before the war. Most of them could have jobs if taxes were reduced to the extent permitted by the Government's present situation. The men who are most responsible for the continuation of the depression beyond the time when it would naturally have spent itself are those who have sought to cure the depression by "priming the pump" with money exacted from the people.

Only the other day Secretary Morgenthau made a startling statement before the Senate Finance Committee. He declared that in 18 months the Federal debt, already more than $30,000,000,000, would be $40,000,000,000. He stated that during that period the Treasury will face the problem of raising $6,000,000,000 for refinancing and $6,000,000,000 for new expenditures; and he might have said "an additional undeterminable number of billions for new financial adventures now contemplated by Congress."

Then he added these significant words: "Government credit is a delicate thing. One day there is confidence and the people who buy bonds are with you. Then overnight something happens, and they won't buy. The minute I cannot raise the money required to finance the Government, that minute you will have complete chaos."

From the Secretary's words it is apparent that we are sitting on top of a volcano. No one knows when the eruption will come, but it seems certain that it cannot be long averted unless we change our ways.

So in answer to the question, "Who will pay the bills?" I would say: We shall all pay, the poor more than the rich, the workingman more than his employer; but, most of all, those of the younger generation who will inherit debts where we inherited the countless wealth of a great and unencumbered nation, and whose portion will be an economic structure wrecked by the profligacy of the most reckless spenders of all time.

AT THE CROSSROADS

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a radio speech I made on December 17.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech by myself, under the auspices of the National Republican Congressional Committee, over the network of the National Broadcasting Co. from Washington, December 17, 10:15 to 10:30 p. m., eastern standard time:

President Roosevelt's New Deal administration which labors under the guise of being Democratic, but which has so consistently ignored Democratic Party principles, is floundering badly. Its failure is apparent on every side. Inconsistencies and cross-purposed, un-American and experimental policies in direct conflict with each other, have brought about a condition which is little short of a Government debacle.

It must be obvious to everyone that, as a Nation, we are now at the crossroads. We have to choose and we have to choose quickly whether we want sanity and soundness in Government or whether we are willing to continue on to ruin and destruction. We have tried experiments in Government which are alien to the American idea. We have tried them and found them wanting and disastrous. We are confronted with the necessity of decision.

I believe that now, more than at any time in the history of these United States, we, as citizens—if we have, as I know we have, the good of the country at heart—must analyze what has been going on, and correct it before it is too late.

If the New Deal deliberately had set out to confuse the American people, it could have done no better than it has done. Instance after instance piles up where the President announces one policy, and his closest advisors announce another in direct conflict with the President's. I think I have only to cite one or two of these to illustrate what I mean. You all remember when, not so long ago, President Roosevelt landed at Charleston, S. C., after a vacation trip which was in reality the opening of his 1936 campaign for reelection. He made a declaration at that time which should be analyzed by every individual in America. On that occasion, the President asserted that we are on our way back, and I quote: "Because we planned it that way." The President added that nobody should be allowed to tell you differently.

On a day less than 2 weeks ago, but somewhat later than the President's Charleston remark, we saw one result of that planning. A spokesman for his administration declared that more than 10,000,000 people were still unemployed, and that 22,000,000 were on relief rolls. He threatened industry with new taxes if it didn't take up the slack. But he didn't say that the New Deal has had more than $8,000,000,000 to remedy this situation, nor did he explain how impossible it is for industry, throttled by New Deal experimental legislation, to possibly take up all of the unemployment slack. Perhaps that was unnecessary. Our taxpayers are now realizing what they face because of the New Deal's squander lust. They know that unemployment has not been lessened to the extent that Government spending should demand. Yet the President says they planned it that way. If it was planned that way, then the admission of futility is an astounding one. It is so astounding as to compel the American people to demand that Congress investigate. But the President says it was all planned. Now, taking his word for it, I should like to ask you a few questions. Did he plan the greatest national debt in history? Did he plan the huge deficit? Did he plan an unbalanced Budget? Did he plan a monetary policy which probably as much as anything else has hindered and retarded recovery, and, together with his ideas of a tariff, has robbed the American farmer of his export market? Did he plan reform before recovery, a program which the courts are stopping in the greatest reversal of policy ever suffered by any national administration? Did he plan the tremendous waste of the people's money which is going on daily under his administration? Did he plan to change our very form of Government? He says he did. Did he plan all of the inconsistencies which have marked his administration so far?

Only recently we have had an illustration showing convincingly how little regard for consistency Mr. Roosevelt has. In his speech at Atlanta, on November 29 last, the President apparently concurred with what Republican leaders have constantly said, that the American people cannot borrow their way out of debt. This remark of the President's was made despite record-making borrowings by the Government. And 1 week after the President had made his declaration the New Deal borrowed an additional $900,000,000. I suppose Mr. Roosevelt calls this teamwork. What the American people will call it will be spelled out in votes next November. However, we will not have to wait that long to obtain another electoral repudiation of the New Deal, because final returns from today's special election in my own State will undoubtedly show the winner to be the Republican nominee who has attacked the New Deal.

These things which I have cited must give rise to the question, What can be expected of an administration which has brought a Nation to the crossroads through so many conflicting, cross-purposed, impossible, and unworkable policies? It must lead also to the question of what can be expected of an administration so prolific in promises, so sparse in fulfillment. However, in making our analysis we must not forget that another Presidental campaign is on. Nor must we forget that a man who has made so many promises and ignored them so easily can make still more promises and continue to ignore them just as easily, and we must judge them accordingly. I do not hestitate to say, in view of the past record of Mr. Roosevelt, that there will not be the same ready acceptance of promises from President Roosevelt as were accorded those of Candidate Roosevelt in 1932. Mr. Roosevelt's record of broken pledges precludes such a possibility. Our people have learned by sad experience that what were to be the sweet fruits of New Deal promises seem always to turn into the bitter ashes of empty realization.

The glamour of the New Deal has faded. Its veneer of Americanism has worn thin. The public has seen through the New Deal. It has weighed it and found the scales tilted. It has concluded that the term "New Deal" is simply a deliberate misnomer for a group headed by Franklin D. Roosevelt, who spurn our Constitution while working to set up a government in which American principles are conspicuous by their absence, and in which promises are made solely as a bid for votes. Our people have seen the growth of a Tammanyized political machine put together at heretofore undreamed-of expense to the taxpayer, and designed for one reason and one reason alone—the perpetuation of an administration whose policies are wholly alien to anything ever conceived as being American.

To some this may seem a severe indictment, but to those who doubt that the indictment is truly found I suggest only a fair, impartial, and temperate analysis of the Roosevelt record for the nearly 3 years in which the New Deal has dominated Government affairs.

No matter how you may wish to look upon it, the fact remains that conditions born of the New Deal are fading the white and blue and exposing the all-red color of the New Deal banner. Socialism, even communism, is the keynote of an administration which rode into power under the guise of the Democratic Party. I do not hesitate to say that if our citizens will evince the interest and take the time to make a cold-blooded analysis of what Mr. Roosevelt's New Deal has attempted to do to the American form of government the repudiation will be so complete as to rid Washington not only of the heads of this un-American movement but likewise of the greatest bureaucracy ever built up in any nation since the beginning of time, in a direct contradiction of a pledge to curtail governmental agencies. We have only to become awake to what must follow to cause an uprising of the electorate which will spell the doom of the potent but misleading little catch phrase, "New Deal."

Washington looks now as it did in war days. It is overrun by bureaucrats. From their luxurious offices in the mansions that once housed the Capital's social elite, and from hotels and apartment houses and new Government buildings they occupy, they issue decrees ranging from death sentences imposed on pigs and cows, to telling their own stenographers just how hard they should strike the keys of their typewriters. The control complex of the New Dealers is responsible for many actions which would be comic were it not for their destructive effects on many basic principles of Americanism. Their attempts to graft a hybrid policy of mixed communistic and socialistic ideas upon the tree of American Government would be ludicrous if they were not so harmful. In many instances, the harm was permitted because New Deal majorities in the House and Senate agreed to them.

Few, if any, of the New Deal schemes have assisted in our progress toward recovery. On the contrary, what recovery we have made has been accomplished in spite of them, and despite the shackles placed upon business by the New Deal. You do not extinguish a fire by pouring kerosene on it, nor do you get out of debt as a nation or as an individual by going deeper into debt. Mr. Roosevelt and his satellites have given us a costly exhibition of what can happen when dreamers of utopia are given the key to the Treasury. We are in the midst of a riot of senseless and extravagant waste. Our Government today is still spending a $2 bill for every $1 bill taken in. And, according to the most careful estimates, in the first 3 years of the Roosevelt administration the collegiate pilots of the New Deal will spend in actual and budgeted amounts a sum that falls but little short of the total expenses of the Federal Government from 1789 to 1913. This huge expenditure is money which belongs to the people of the United States, to you, your family, your neighbors, and friends. It doesn't belong to Mr. Roosevelt, nor does it belong to Professor Tugwell or Mr. Wallace or Professor Frankfurter, or that grand spender, Mr. Hopkins. They will not pay it back. You and your children and generations yet unborn will have to pay it back. They will have to pay for the squander lust of the Roosevelt era. They are the ones who will have to pay for the fantasies of the Roosevelt boondoggiers.

Mr. Roosevelt says there will be no new taxes imposed in the coming session of Congress. We have heard that before. And we have also seen a veritable orgy of indirect taxation through slashing of the value of the dollar, confiscating nearly $3,000,000,000 in gold and imposing better than $1,000,000,000 in processing taxes. And these things were wholly aside from the soak-the-rich proposal.

For the most part, as it is evident from the recital, taxes have been imposed under Mr. Roosevelt to a tremendous degree by the New Deal politicians who attempt to hide their various imposts by indirection.

The President only recently at Chicago branded as political profiteers those who criticized his policies. I am constrained to believe that the use of the phrase "political profiteers" by the President was ill-advised for the singular reason that the record discloses that no group seeks political profits to anywhere near the extent practiced by those who are so rapidly nearing the end of their domination of your Government. We are rapidly seeing through the New Deal's political standards, and it is a safe thing to say that the American people will not be a party to the vote-buying program of the New Deal. You and I—all of us—are at the crossroads, and the future of this country depends upon which road we choose to follow.

INTEREST PAID ON VETERANS' LOANS SINCE 1931 NOT REFUNDED

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have many letters from veterans complaining because the recently enacted law does not provide for the repayment of interest that veterans have paid on loans. The argument is made that it is penalizing the veteran who paid his interest and placing a premium on the one who was delinquent in his interest payments.

RESULT OF COMPROMISE

All major legislation is a result of compromise. Hardly a bill of major importance becomes a law that does not represent the sacrifice of view or compromise of opinion on the part of practically every Member of the House and Senate. It is a difficult matter for any particular Member of the House or Senate to obtain everything he desires in the form of legislation. Many factors enter into the making of laws. The policy of give-and-take is often resorted to and one who never compromises is at a disadvantage in lawmaking. A compromise caused the situation under discussion.

WHY DEBT DUE IN 1931 INSTEAD OF 1945

During the past 6½ years those of us who have endeavored to sell to the people the proposal that the adjusted-service certificates should be paid in cash used the following arguments:

First. The veteran was deprived of nearly 7 years' interest when the amount of his adjusted-service certificate was calculated.

Second. The veteran was allowed 4-percent interest on his adjusted-service credit of a dollar a day for home service and a dollar and a quarter a day for service overseas, whereas the veteran was charged 6-, 7-, and 8-percent interest on the loans obtained on his certificates.

Third. War contractors on deferred payments received 6-percent interest from date supplies furnished and more than $3,000,000,000 were refunded to income-tax payers after the war in one form or another, and on these refunds 6-percent interest was allowed from the time of the alleged overpayment.

Fourth. That $60 was deducted from a veteran's adjusted-service certificate which should not have been deducted. When a soldier entered the service he gave his civilian outfit to the Red Cross. It was sent to a foreign country to relieve distress over there. The $60 was given to every honorably discharged veteran when discharged to assist him in the purchase of a civilian outfit of clothing. The $60 was given to the officers who drew four, five, six, and eight thousand dollars a year, together with other allowances, as well as the private who was drawing $30 a month. The high-salaried officers were not required to pay their $60 back because they were not entitled to an adjusted-service certificate. Therefore, the men who served the longest for the lowest pay should not be required to pay their $60 back.

Fifth. Twenty-five percent was added to each adjusted-service credit for compensation for waiting from 1925 to 1945.

Sixth. That if the Adjusted Compensation Act is changed so as to give each veteran a dollar a day for domestic service and a dollar and a quarter a day for service overseas, as agreed upon by Congress in 1924, as of June 5, 1918, which represented the half-way period between the beginning and ending of the average veteran's service, 6-percent interest is allowed, the $60 is not deducted and the 25 percent is not added, each veteran was entitled to an amount equivalent to the full face value of his adjusted-service certificate October 1, 1931. According to our arguments used before the country the whole debt was not due until October 1, 1931, using our formula for computing the amount. Therefore we could consistently contend that no interest be charged on loans after October 1, 1931, but could not very well contend that interest should not be charged before that time.

REFUND OF INTEREST INSISTED UPON

In our efforts at this session to obtain the passage of a law for the full and immediate cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates, we insisted that no interest on loans be charged after October 1, 1931; that interest that has been charged and not collected be canceled, and that all interest paid since October 1, 1931, be repaid to the veteran who paid the interest.

The Vinson-Patman-McCormack bill, which originated in and passed the House, provided for cancelation of all unpaid interest even before 1931. Veterans were first permitted to obtain loans on their certificates January 1, 1927. From 1927 to 1931 there were millions of little transactions in which veterans would borrow a small sum on their certificates for a short length of time and redeem their certificates by paying the loans. From January 1, 1927, to date more than 10,000 banks closed their doors. Many of these small loans were made with these banks and the records necessary for a veteran to substantiate his claim for an interest-payment refund are no longer available. The House Committee on Ways and Means declined to permit a refund of interest paid on the theory that the proof would not be available to all the veterans and it would delay the payments in view of the millions of small transactions involved and the numerous calculations necessary. Furthermore, the Ways and Means Committee was persuaded, I am told, to decline on the ground that after the veterans received their money, many of them would later secure the evidence sufficient to place them in a position of being entitled to a refund of interest paid. This would cause numerous claims against the Government and a flood of private bills introduced in both Houses of Congress. It seemed to be the desire on the part of Members in both the House and Senate to bring this entire question to a close. The House passed a bill providing for cancelation of all unpaid interest clear back to 1927. The Senate made only a minor change when the date October 1, 1931, was inserted since all veterans who borrowed the 50 percent in 1931 were required to pay all past-due interest up to that time.

DISCRIMINATION

We were successful in accomplishing practically everything we desired except a refund of interest paid. It is true that this appears to be a discrimination against the man who paid the interest on his loan regularly. At the same time, it was insisted that if a veteran who had paid interest on his loan since October 1, 1931, was repaid that sum of money, all the veterans who had not borrowed on their certificates would likely have considerable support for their contention that they should be given interest since October 1, 1931, on the theory that if it is right to repay interest on loans since October 1, 1931, it is right to pay interest to those who did not obtain loans.

The number of veterans in the class who paid the interest is very small and if a sacrifice had to be made in order to obtain the passage of the legislation we could not have sacrificed a point that would cost the veterans generally so little as their loss on the sacrifice of this point. Practically all the veterans borrowed the limit allowed by law—50 percent after March 1, 1931. Practically all of them borrowed this money through governmental agencies and very few of them paid any interest at all. In fact, they were never notified that their loan was due or that a year or 6 months had expired or that they were expected to make interest payments. Many of them were not able financially to pay the interest.

PRACTICALLY EVERY POINT GAINED

We succeeded in convincing the country and Congress that although the adjusted-service certificates were payable in 1945, each veteran holding one was, as a matter of right and justice, entitled to an amount equivalent to the full face value of his certificate October 1, 1931. We gained practically every point; we yielded a small amount. I regret that it was necessary to yield anything, but for the reasons stated in the first part of this statement, it was necessary to yield as we cannot always get everything we want.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD at this point to include an article by Raymond Clapper that appeared in the Daily News on Tuesday, January 7, 1936.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

Mr. RICH. I am constrained to object, Mr. Speaker. I object.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including a petition by the junior committee of the National Economy League.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, I object. I object to anything going in from the Economy League.

THE INTEGRITY OF NATIONAL HONOR AND A NEW DIGNITY FOR THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES AND NEW PROBLEMS

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, Members of the Seventy-fourth Congress in this the beginning of our second session, you will be shortly called upon to discuss and finally vote upon a new neutrality bill.

Last session you gave your stamp of approval to the law which later became Public Resolution 67 under a suspension of the rules. Today the six cardinal principles of that legislation are within the knowledge of every American schoolboy.

Quietly and profoundly that resolution enacted a new era in the legislative prestige of this House. Without equivocation, forthright, and dignified this lower House took the most important part in the handling of foreign affairs that has ever been its peacetime province. We began, set the limits, and in every legislative way played our part in enacting those laws whose far-reaching effects are only now being felt. On that 17th day of August of last year it can be said that the American people wittingly or unwittingly saw their chosen Representatives in the lower House accept a new but effective control over foreign affairs. From that day to this we have had that power, and so long as we have our Government I sincerely trust that we will never lose that privilege.

To be sure, the treaty-making powers are invested in the Senate and the President. To be sure, also, we only pass laws to effect the proper appropriations that may be necessary for those treaties, but in the legislation that is called neutrality legislation we rise to a vantage point in parliamentary prestige.

Our Nation has been immune from the charge of secret understandings and more hidden treaties. It was our war President who leveled his barrage of sensible ammunition at the secret pacts of Europe and forced them to remain under the cover of the peace-conference table, though in the unfortunate denouement of that conference much that was done was the direct result and purpose of those pernicious pacts. Equally vicious also were the secret understandings like the Grey-Campon correspondence, which misled our statesmen. It was no wonder that our delegation insisted upon "open covenants openly arrived at", and subject to the searchlight of popular inspection.

We are forging another link in that chain of popular checking of treaties and laws affecting foreign nations. With the House of Representatives taking an active and coordinate part in the affairs of nations—yes, actually proposing and more actually disposing—is it any wonder that we now feel that the American people may now have a more direct and incisive knowledge of what is going on in the realm of foreign affairs and indirectly foreign relations?

It is fitting that we should, therefore, look at the problem of new neutrality legislation with an understanding of the new dignity of our House and the even newer responsibility.

I wish to draw to your attention the fact that in dealing with all matters of foreign affairs we must ever retain in our memory the picture of all of our treaties. Those agreements, the most solemn expression of our national promises and covenants, are the most certain indexes of national faith and character in the armory of international law. They reflect the history of the gradual intercourse of nations, but greater than this historical reflection they represent in the family of nations the touchstone of national reputation.

It has always been a cause of profound regret to me that there is such an implied and understood condition of all international treaties permitting repudiation of solemnly drawn-up treaties whenever the material circumstances upon which they have been based have been changed or have caused undue burdens. In many ways the power, susceptible of good, has been employed ruthlessly. This possibility of easy unilateral executive repudiation is known by the Latin shortened phrase "rebus sic stantibus," Unfortunately, the right or privilege of repudiating these treaties is placed in a body or person who usually has been for the most part capriciously irresponsible. This person, whether an autocrat, a king, a czar, or even a group, has had no hesitancy in using weak pretexts for abrogation. The people of the countries interested have had no right of disapproval and even have had no knowledge of either the rule or its use.

Obviously, such a practice in the business or social world would invite chaos and overwhelming distrust. Unfortunately, this doctrine is also usually bulwarked by the possession of immense power, naval or land, by which the superior nation acts with impunity.

It is rare that a small nation dares to exercise the right which has become the prerogative of the great powers alone. That attitude was all too true of the era at the opening of the nineteenth century, with its increase in the manifold problems of international relations and the growth of economic interdependence among nations, and which has found the practice of treaty making growing by leaps and bounds. In spite of the doctrine of easy repudiation all nations are constantly using pacts to express their desires and wishes. Today they are the most vital means of peaceful intercourse among nations.

Obviously such agreements are entered into in the best of good faith and with a full consciousness of permanence.

There has, however, grown up a feeling that this doctrine of rebus sic stantibus is part and parcel of every treaty, yet there is complete discord on its interpretation and practice. Some assign the reason to be resident in the fact that the state being all powerful can do no wrong and has a right to act from selfish interests. Others use the excuse that no state has a right to partition or bargain away its sovereignty. It is submitted that neither pretext is justifiable in this day and age. Unfortunately, however, state after state in history has found this type of surrender the easiest way to effect its selfish interests. It would be easy to show precedent after precedent involving such excuses with even this country involved.

We know that during the World War aliens were drafted into the United States Army in direct defiance of treaty obligations which had positive articles pledging opposite actions. We know also that in 1881 our demand upon Great Britain for a change in the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty was based on this doctrine. The words that we used then, "this Government, with respect to European state, will not consent to perpetuate any treaty that impeaches our right to claim on the American Continent", made a strong statement and obviously met with protest from across the water. However, peaceful means were employed, and the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty of 1901 resulted.

It is a strange thing that international law permits a repudiation of this type of treaty while it does not permit any excuse for the revision of treaties imposed by force which work harsher inequalities and constantly present to the affected nations permanent irritations and causes of revanche. One has only to analyze the acts of Versailles Treaty to appreciate this, but nowhere is it more evident than in the historical picture of the Alsace-Lorraine problem, for every change in sovereignty of that valuable territory engenders in the losing nation bitterness and revenge; but under our present scheme of things there is no universal remedy or outlet of correction but war.

If we admit that treaties are concluded with that implied agreement at this time, we must still further determine what is the basis for the doctrine. Certainly if we leave its determination to each party, we are permitting unilateral digression in an unlimited way. There are those leaders, however, who suggest that a conference should be held before the doctrine is applied, but it is difficult to understand how that would solve matters. Certainly there would be no willingness to surrender advantages on the part of either nation. It would, of course, indicate a better spirit, but beyond that would be useless.

The position of a third agency in the nature of umpire or board of arbitration might be helpful, but whether under the existing circumstances such is possible is a moot question. The inescapable conclusion remains that something like this is necessary if we are to have any sanctity in our treaties or any respect and honor for our international covenants.

It is no excuse to say that a nation cannot partition away its sovereignty in this day and age, and certainly a nation like ours would be stultifying the very conception of its government if it used such an excuse. There were days, of course, when a dynasty planning its own personal schemes and ambitions surrendered part of the public domain, but that day is over and in an enlightened world that cannot be offered as an excuse. This does not mean that there are not onerous conditions for which every dictate of justice would demand relief, but it does indicate that such relief should not be demanded peremptorily.

Most leaders admit that the doctrine itself is so replete with dangers and is so provocative of retaliating animosities that its disadvantages outweigh its alleged benefits. Even in a balance of evils it is right that the honor and integrity of treaties should outweigh the disadvantages of unforeseen forces. If worse comes to worse, it would be better for the selection of a third-party umpire nation or agreed-upon board of arbitration to advise before there is an ultimate repudiation. The penultimate step should be negotiation.

We have a similar problem in the Supreme Court's determination of the conflict over Federal statutes and treaties. In Whitney v. Robinson (124 U. S. 194 (1888)) it was decided that when a Federal statute and treaty relates to the same subject the courts will always endeavor to construe them so as to give effect to both, if that can be done without violating the language of either; but if the two are inconsistent the one last in date will control the other. For example, the statute that "Russian hemp imported to this country shall pay a duty of $40 a ton" was held to repeal the stipulation in the prior treaty with Russia, which in effect declared that the duty on Russian hemp should not be more than $25. Another instance occurred in this country when the La Follette Seamen's Act, made it impossible for the Executive to comply with the treaties requiring the United States to return all deserting seamen to their ships. Obviously the nations whose rights under the treaties were affected could demand some other compulsory privilege as a price for agreeing to a new treaty. But it is submitted that such violent and precipitant actions will engender ill feeling and bring our Nation into disrepute.

Certainly the fathers of this country in enacting clause 2, article VI, which provides:

> That this Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding—never contemplated such indirect breaches.

This discussion becomes very much in point in the matter of our neutrality bill. No one can contemplate a far-reaching act predicated upon the desire to keep us out of war without first checking our treaty disabilities and duties. In the situation involved in the present conflict, so pregnant with unfortunate repercussions, it is our duty to check all our treaties with Italy and Ethiopia. We would be unfaithful to our duty if we did not survey the treaty history of these countries. The selections below from the treaty of 1871, which has been supplanted by an amended pact of 1913, will permit a good idea of what is contained in many of our commercial agreements. It is submitted that these articles present problems to us that demand our most sincere consideration. It is submitted also that these articles present the most momentous study of international obligations and honorable compacts ever presented to this country.

I present this study to the Members of this House that in the interchange of ideas we may develop a course which will not impugn our national prestige or honor.

ARTICLE 1

There shall be between the territories of the high contracting parties a reciprocal liberty of commerce and navigation.

* * * * * * *

ARTICLE 13

The high contracting parties having agreed that a state of war between one of them and a third power shall not, except in the cases of blockade and contraband of war, affect the neutral commerce of the other, and being desirous of removing every uncertainty which may hitherto have arisen respecting that which upon principles of fairness and justice ought to constitute a legal blockade, they hereby expressly declare that such places only shall be considered blockaded as shall be actually invested by naval forces capable of preventing the entry of neutrals, and so stationed as to create an evident danger on their part to attempt it.

* * * * * * *

The liberty of navigation and commerce secured to neutrals by the stipulations of this treaty shall extend to all kinds of merchandise excepting those only which are distinguished by the name of contraband of war. And in order to remove all causes of doubt and misunderstanding upon this subject, the contracting parties expressly agree and declare that the following articles and no others shall be considered as comprehended under this denomination:

1. Cannons, mortars, howitzers, swivels, blunderbusses, muskets, fuses, rifles, carbines, pistols, pikes, swords, sabers, lances, spears, halberts, bombs, grenades, powder, matches, balls, and all other things belonging to and expressly manufactured for the use of these arms.

2. Infantry belts, implements of war, and defense weapons, clothes cut or made up in a military form and for a military use.

3. Cavalry belts, war saddles, and holsters.

4. And generally all kinds of arms and instruments of iron, steel, brass, and copper, or of any other materials manufactured, prepared, and formed expressly to make war by sea or land.

* * * * * * *

The present treaty shall continue in force for 5 years—from the day of the exchange of the ratifications, and, if 12 months before the expiration of that period, neither of the high contracting parties shall have announced to the other, by an official notification, its intention to terminate the said treaty, it shall remain obligatory on both parties 1 year beyond that time; and so on until the expiration of the 12 months which will follow a similar notification, whatever may be the time when such notification shall be given.

It cannot be too strongly urged upon the membership of this House that this entire problem of treaty contravention presents a most Herculean labor. For example, let us repeat the testimony of Prof. Charles Cheney Hyde, professor of international law, Columbia University, former State Department adviser and holder of the Hamilton Fish chair. That distinguished authority, who is the writer of one of the monumental treatises on the subject of international law, was questioned about that controversial subject. Study his answer for an insight in the difficulty that must face everyone not so posited in the fullness of knowledge along these particular lines as the professor himself:

Mr. FISH. Have you written anything that deals with placing economic embargoes on countries with which we have treaties that say we shall have no economic embargoes?

Professor HYDE. No, sir; I have not spoken on that point and I have not given attention enough to the treaties involved to express an opinion. But I have had a finger in the pie, so to speak, in the drafting of the first new commercial treaties drawn after the war, that with Germany, of December 1923, and I do not remember that we considered any of those points. I greatly doubt whether we violate any treaty in doing this, and I will never believe the United States has violated any treaty until the courts have said so.

Now study the answers of Prof. Edward M. Borchard, professor of international law at Yale, recognized world-wide authority on kindred subjects:

Mr. MOORE. I saw an article in the New York Times, written by you, in which you said that section 3, as applied to arms, munitions, and implements of war, was permissible without any reference to the treaty—that international law permitted that.

Will you give me your authority for that view?

Professor BORCHARD. It is elementary law. The fact is that eight countries of the world have done it in their peacetime legislation, prohibiting the export of arms, munitions, and implements of war, when they were neutral and other countries at war. In time of war, neutrality imposes and permits a series of neutral measures designed to prevent military aid to either belligerent. A permissive arms embargo is one.

Mr. MOORE. I do not know what treaties those countries had at that time.

Professor BORCHARD. They had the usual commercial treaties, I assume.

Mr. MOORE. I do not know whether they had or not. I am asking you now for some authority, because we have searched for it for days in support of your opinion that section 3 is permissible, whereas section 4 is not permissible.

Professor BORCHARD. Yes, sir; because the neutral's duty is not to aid militarily either belligerent, and he is privileged to cut off trade in munitions of war. The Italian treaty so limits the definition of contraband.

Mr. MOORE. I cannot find a single thing that says that.

Professor BORCHARD. It is as elementary as the rule that contracts must be observed. You do not find much discussion of that rule, either.

Mr. MOORE. Oh, yes.

Professor BORCHARD. The authority also lies in actual practice. Eight countries have done it.

Mr. MOORE. Eight countries would not make international law.

Professor BORCHARD. It is fundamental.

Mr. MOORE. But I want to know your authority.

Professor BORCHARD. It has been done from the beginning of the nineteenth century. But I am sure I can find you also opinion authority.

Mr. FISH. Is the State Department the best authority for that?

Professor BORCHARD. Did you get any protest over the act of 1935?

Mr. MOORE. We did get a protest.

Professor BORCHARD. I would like to see it. General acquiescence by other powers in the act of 1935 is some evidence of the rule.

Mr. MOORE. It is not a conclusive argument. I am asking you to spot the international authority.

Professor BORCHARD. I do not have a library at my side. I daresay Dr. Hyde would concur; I am confident Judge Moore agrees, for we have discussed it. The exception has been written into commercial treaties on occasion, e. g., article 20 of the treaty with Haiti. But it is not necessary to make an express exception; it is implied.

Mr. MOORE. I do not believe Mr. Hyde has it in his book. I have his book on my table.

Professor BORCHARD. If he has not, then it is so elementary that he must assume everyone knows it. But if the arms embargo violates the commercial treaties, as you seem to think, but I do not, a fortiori you must conclude that commodity embargoes do.

These two extracts afford an excellent opportunity to consider the range of diversity in the subject and the reactions of two eminent authorities on a principle that seems so weighty in neutrality.

We can sympathize with the two famous physicians of London who could not make up their minds in consultation on a case and reported dubiously. The head of the family insisted on a positive opinion. They answered that they were unable to give one, but he might easily find 50 doctors who could.

On this positively mooted subject we have the energetic assertions of Professor Borchard, apparently backed by the doyen of all experts, Judge Moore, who have both discussed the subject and have definite opinions, and the statement of Professor Hyde, who never apparently encountered the question, yet all three writers, leaders par excellence in their common field. When the Olympians disagree mortal man must beware.

INCREASE IN MEMBERSHIP OF THE SUPREME COURT OF PUERTO RICO

Mr. IGLESIAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in reference to a bill pending in the House of Representatives which has reference to Puerto Rican matters.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Puerto Rico?

There was no objection.

Mr. IGLESIAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a proposed amendment (H. R. 10312) to the Organic Act of Puerto Rico which I introduced in the House yesterday, which is followed by an explanation of and reasons for such a change submitted to me by the chief justice of the Supreme Court of Puerto Rico, the Honorable Emilio del Toro:

A bill to amend section 40 of the act of March 2, 1917, entitled "An act to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes"

Be it enacted, etc., That section 40 of the act entitled "An act to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes", approved March 2, 1917, as amended, is hereby again amended, to read as follows:

SEC. 40. That the judicial power shall be vested in the courts and tribunals of Puerto Rico now established and in operation under and by virtue of existing laws. The jurisdiction of said courts and the form of procedure in them, and the various officers and attachés thereof, shall also continue to be as now provided until otherwise provided by law: Provided, however, That the supreme court shall be composed of a chief justice and six associate justices, appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, and the Legislature of Puerto Rico shall have authority, from time to time as it may see fit, not inconsistent with this act, to organize, modify, or rearrange the courts and their jurisdiction and procedure, except the District Court of the United States for Puerto Rico."

The amendment consists in substituting the words "* * * chief justice and associate justices shall be * * *" by the following: "supreme court shall be composed of a chief justice and six associate justices * * *", and it is considered necessary for the following reasons:

In 1899, when the island of Puerto Rico had 953,243 inhabitants, the Military Governor, by general orders no. 118 of that year, divided its territory into five judicial districts, and created in each a district court from whose judgments appeals could be taken to the supreme court which was established in San Juan, composed of a chief justice and four associate justices.

From that time until the present the supreme court has been composed of one chief justice and four associate justices, appointed since 1900 by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate.

In the meantime, the population of the island has swelled to 1,672,821, according to an estimate made by the health department last July, and the judicial districts have been increased to 8, with 8 district courts, which really are 11, inasmuch as that of San Juan has 3 judges and that of Ponce 2, who act independently.

As a logical consequence of the increase in population and the added district courts, there has been a tremendous increase in the work of the supreme court. The same number of Justices who decided 237 cases in the year 1904–5 decided 362 in 1914–15, 600 in 1924–25, and 759 in 1934–35. But that is not all. Until some years ago we were able, more or less successfully, to set the hearings of appeals so that they would take place within a reasonable time after their docketing. That is not possible at present with regard to civil appeals.

Without taking into consideration the great number of cases already heard and pending decision and those which were to have been heard during the remaining month of December 1935, it may be correctly stated that, after setting the cases for the months of January and February 1936, 140 civil appeals will have been left over without a setting, which means that some of them cannot be heard until November or December 1936, and that the new appeals to be filed run the risk of not being heard until the year 1937.

As it might seem strange that only 140 appeals should require so long a time, it must be borne in mind that the said 140 appeals are in civil cases, and that civil appeals are only part of the work of the court, which consists besides of criminal appeals, of administrative appeals, and extraordinary remedies, which decisions have proceeded with relative rapidity.

Perhaps it might be advisable to refer to the plan followed by the court in its work. The week is divided thus: Mondays, hearings of motions and of extraordinary remedies; Tuesdays, Wednesdays, Thursdays, and Fridays, hearings of criminal and civil appeals, the sessions commencing at 2 p. m. At the hearing of motions and extraordinary remedies counsel are entitled to 40 minutes for argument, in criminal appeals 1 hour and 10 minutes, and in civil appeals 2 hours and 20 minutes. As a general rule, one criminal appeal and two civil appeals are set for the same day, unless the appeal refers to a case which, as indicated by the briefs, will consume all the time allowed, and in that case a single appeal is set.

After the hearings are over the justices meet in the conference room, where they discuss the orders and judgments of the court and read, discuss, and approve their opinions. Meetings very rarely end before 5 p. m.

The mornings on working days, Saturdays, and sometimes holidays and part of the recess periods are dedicated by the justices to study individually the cases and to prepare the orders, judgments, and opinions, which is the most difficult and the most intensive part of their work.

After a careful consideration and viewing the problem from all its angles—the constant increase in population, more intensive and complicated life, new economic and social problems which entail new juridical relations and new legal formulas, a larger and more proficient bar, two systems of jurisprudence, and two languages—it is obvious that if it is sought to preserve entirely the efficacious action of the supreme court, and if it is desired that the administration of justice continued with due promptness, it is absolutely necessary to increase its inner strength, its capacity for work, by adding to its council two more justices morally and mentally equipped for the work.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the House of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. R. 1299. An act giving jurisdiction to the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claim of the Cherokee Fuel Co.;

H. R. 1550. An act for the relief of Douglas B. Espy;

H. R. 4436. An act conferring jurisdiction upon the United States District Court for the Western District of Washington to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claims of Alta Melvin and Tommy Melvin; and

H. R. 4799. An act to provide for the reimbursement of certain officers and enlisted men or former officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps for personal property lost, damaged, or destroyed as a result of the earthquake which occurred at Managua, Nicaragua, on March 31, 1931.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to an enrolled bill of the Senate of the following title:

S. 1277. An act to amend section 24 of the Judicial Code by conferring on district courts additional jurisdiction of bills of interpleader, and of bills in the nature of interpleader.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the House, in accordance with its previous order, adjourned until Monday, January 20, 1936, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

600. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a draft of a bill to authorize the Secretary of War to acquire by donation land at or near Newburgh, in Orange County, N. Y., for aviation field, military, or other public purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

601. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a report by the Secretary of State recommending the enactment of legislation authorizing an appropriation in the sum of $500 in settlement of the claims of Mrs. M. N. Shwamberg; to the Committee on Claims.

602. A letter from the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, transmitting their third annual report; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

603. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting the report of the Director of Emergency Conservation Work; to the Committee on Labor.

604. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a report from the Secretary of State in regard to a claim of William L. Jenkins; to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII.

Mr. JONES: Committee on Agriculture. House Joint Resolution 460. Joint resolution authorizing an appropriation to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to meet commitments and obligations, including administrative expenses, incurred under the provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, and for other purposes, with amendment (Rept. No. 1917). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

9553. Also, petition of L. S. Reed and others, for the extension of star-route contracts and increased compensation for star-route carriers; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

9554. By the SPEAKER: Petition of the League of South Dakota Municipalities; to the Committee on Education.

9555. Also, petition of the American Indian Federation; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

SENATE

SATURDAY, JANUARY 18, 1936

(Legislative day of Thursday, Jan. 16, 1936)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

PATRICK A. MCCARRAN, a Senator from the State of Nevada, appeared in his seat today.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Megill, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 9863) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. LEWIS. Noting the absence of a quorum, I move a roll call.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Chavez	Hayden	O'Mahoney	White
Connally	Holt	Overton

Mr. LEWIS. I announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] are necessarily detained from the Senate.

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] is necessarily absent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Ninety-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

EXTENSION OF LEASES IN KETTLEMAN NORTH DOME FIELD

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, reporting, pursuant to law, relative to an extension beyond the 20-year period of certain oil leases within the Kettleman North Dome field, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

WITHDRAWALS AND RESTORATIONS OF PUBLIC LANDS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office relative to withdrawals and restorations of public lands under the act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. 847), during the calendar year 1935, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a resolution of the Federation of Italian World War Veterans in the U. S. A., Inc., New York City, N. Y., favoring the continuance of friendly relations between the Governments and peoples of the United States and of Italy, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution of the Greenville (S. C.) Trades and Labor Council, favoring the adoption of a constitutional amendment restricting the power of the Supreme Court of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CAPPER presented resolutions adopted by Joseph A. Wahl Camp, No. 17, of Lawrence, and Theo. Hanmer Camp, No. 28, of Great Bend, both of the United Spanish War Veterans, in the State of Kansas, favoring the enactment of the so-called Philippine travel-pay bill for the relief of volunteer officers and soldiers who served in the Philippine Islands after the ratification of the treaty of peace with Spain, which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COPELAND presented a resolution adopted by the Italian-American Loyal Order of Columbus, of Buffalo, N. Y., protesting against the activities of certain foreign visitors to the United States in their attempts to control American public opinion and influence the Government of the United States to participate in the affairs of the League of Nations, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the memorial of Anthony P. Formanek and sundry other citizens of New York City and vicinity remonstrating against Government ownership or operation of the railroads, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Education and Labor, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 196) to correct errors in the enrollment of Private Act No. 349, Seventy-fourth Congress, approved August 29, 1935, and to clarify the duties of the Comptroller General in connection with said act, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1471) thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED

Mrs. CARAWAY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on January 17, 1936, that committee presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled bills:

S. 1016. An act to empower the health officer of the District of Columbia to authorize the opening of graves, and the disinterment and reinterment of dead bodies, in cases where death has been caused by certain contagious diseases;

S. 1277. An act to amend section 24 of the Judicial Code by conferring on district courts additional jurisdiction of bills of interpleader and of bills in the nature of interpleader;

S. 2013. An act to provide for the issuance of a license to practice the healing art in the District of Columbia to Dr. Pak Chue Chan;

S. 2434. An act for the relief of George W. Hallowell, Jr.; and

S. 2939. An act to provide for the issuance of a license to practice the healing art in the District of Columbia to Dr. Ronald A. Cox.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. NORRIS:

A bill (S. 3746) granting a pension to Frank Swartz; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma:

A bill (S. 3747) for the relief of Maizee Hamley; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. FRAZIER:

A bill (S. 3748) to authorize the Bureau of Mines to conduct certain studies, investigations, and experiments with respect to subbituminous and lignite coal, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

A bill (S. 3761) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to patent certain land to the town of Wamsutter, Wyo.; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. LONERGAN:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 199) directing the President of the United States of America to proclaim October 11, 1936, General Pulaski's Memorial Day for the observance and commemoration of the death of Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H. R. 9863) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ALLOCATION OF FUNDS TO SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEES

Mr. McKELLAR submitted a resolution (S. Res. 219), which was ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that hereafter no special committee of the Senate shall receive or accept any funds, nor shall any allocations of funds be made to any such committee, from the Works Progress Administration, or from any other Federal or State agency, except the Senate, for use in connection with any investigation being carried on by such committee.

THE NATIONAL DEFENSE—ADDRESS BY ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE NAVY ROOSEVELT

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be incorporated in the RECORD an address on the subject of National Defense delivered by The Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Col. H. L. Roosevelt, on Saturday evening last, before the Washington chapter, National Sojourners, in the city of Washington.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Toastmaster, noble Sojourners, ladies, and gentlemen, I am glad to have the honor and the privilege of addressing you tonight on the subject of National Defense.

It is a matter in which you are more vitally concerned than any other group of our citizens, since the Master Masons who make up the membership of the Sojourners are all present or former officers in the uniformed services of the United States. The great body of our citizens is free to follow its own affairs and to regard national defense with an academic eye, but for those of you who are now in the service of the United States it is your career and your personal and official responsibility. That you so consider it is affirmed in the statement of purposes and beliefs which I read on the masthead of the Sojourners' Official Bulletin. Therein you set yourselves objectives beyond comradely intercourse and mutual aid; you pledge yourselves to the support of every movement that makes for pure patriotism and Americanism, and you are banded in opposition to any influence whatsoever that may be calculated to weaken the national security.

Your principles, which are in accord with the useful and elevated ideal of Freemasonry, are no less consistent with the honorable traditions of the corps of officers in the American services.

Let us consider briefly the nature of the elements of national defense. They fall into two parts—the tangible and the intangible. The tangible elements are the agencies, the institutions, and the material which we see and maintain. There is the Regular Army, with the Organized Reserves; the National Guard; the stores, the weapons, and the supplies, which constitute our land forces. There is the Navy, with its personnel of trained officers and men, its ships at sea, and its shore establishment on which the fleet and the sea activities are based. There is the Marine Corps, on shore and afloat, an integral part of the Navy. There is the United States Coast Guard, trained and equipped to operate with the Navy in war, and active at all times along a wide variety of important channels. There is the Public Health Service, waging unremitting war against disease, and with its equipment and trained personnel prepared to accept added responsibility in the scheme of national defense. There is the Coast and Geodetic Survey, constantly engaged in making safe the paths of navigation, and prepared also to adapt itself to naval missions in emergency. Beyond these establishments lie other tangibles: our patriotic citizenry—the great reservoir of manpower; and our highly developed industrial organization, which furnish the weight and the sinews for any national effort that we may be called upon to make.

Since your interest in these matters is, in the nature of your profession, informed and keen, no detailed discussion of our material resources is here indicated. Certain public questions now current have given rise to wide differences of opinion, but the sturdy good sense of our people has in large measure supported those movements looking toward national defense. The Army has received important increases in personnel, and its equipment has been augmented and modernized. The Navy, under the recommendations of the President, and through the energetic efforts of the Congress, is being brought up to its stipulated treaty strength. It is true that extraordinary effort has been put forth in the last 3 years, but there existed the gap caused by a decade of neglect, during which time naval building had almost stopped. Now, modernization of old units, replacement of obsolete vessels, and new construction in those categories hitherto deficient are rapidly raising the Naval Establishment to the standard necessary for the maintenance of our naval policies. Increases in personnel are being judiciously provided as the new ships go into commission, both in the Navy and the Marine Corps. The naval air arm has been increased and its functions widely extended. Superb flights, executed both by single planes and by very large tactical formations, have broadened the operating radius of the naval air force beyond the most sanguine expectations of even the recent past. There exist still certain deficiencies in naval auxiliary types, but we have hopes that the present Congress may rectify such needs.

It is hard for me to stop talking about the Navy, once I am started on that subject, because it happens to be my job. Yet we in the Navy realize perfectly that national defense is not the affair of the individual branches of our uniformed services but of the whole team. It is, therefore, with much satisfaction that we observe the intelligent public interest which extends recognition and support to each of our sister establishments. The Coast Guard, the Public Health Service, and the Geodetic Survey have all received attention in the last 3 years. Industry has been effectively coordinated and our various staffs, through joint studies, have placed the machinery for national defense in a higher state of preparedness than ever before in our history.

This brings me to the intangibles, which may perhaps be defined with accuracy as the morale and the patriotism animating the hearts of our people. It was Napoleon, I think, who said that the morale is to the material as 3 to 1. We are justly proud of the energy and skill of our ordnance officers, of our chemists, and of our designers and constructors in all our services. But our great guns, our fine tall ships, our fast and sturdy airplanes, and the enormous plants of our industries would be no more than so much scrap metal if the men behind them lacked the moral factor. The tangible things can always be procured; the intangibles are in the realm of the spirit and are more vital to the security of our Nation than the material concerns I have enumerated. Without that spirit, without patriotism, without belief in the ideals and institutions of our country, we are nothing, and the things that we have mean nothing.

In this country our morale and our patriotism find their expression in something which, for lack of a more specific term, we may call Americanism. Americanism is the spirit created by the freedom and the limitless opportunities in the New World. A spirit at once practical, and idealistic beyond anything that has existed on the old continents, it impelled our fathers to create for themselves a new nation in the wilderness, and to sustain that nation by wisdom and hard work, and by force of arms when force was necessary, through its early periods of growth and struggle, until it became the world power that we serve today. In the cycles of human affairs we have had our bad times and our good times, but throughout the stresses of both adversity and prosperity we have retained in large measure the faiths upon which our fathers built.

In recent years we have been passing through a critical period. Unmistakable evidence of recovery is today increasingly apparent, but it would be idle and foolish to ignore the evil trends and tendencies which have manifested themselves, and which are now still among us. It would seem that—not in this country alone but in the whole world—there has been a revolution of thought. Some of this is the aftermath of the Great War. Unrest along similar lines has followed most of the mass efforts in human history. Viewed in the perspective of history, such convulsions eventually work themselves out and matters settle down. Good crop years follow bad ones, rains relieve the droughts, and men recover quickly from material calamities and misfortunes. But the worst and most dangerous features of the present time are the attacks made on the morale of our citizens. Certain groups in this country—some with purpose and some inadvertently—are doing their best to undermine the spirit of Americanism.

There is no lack of evidence as to these activities. Ranting speakers and hysterical writers, taking advantage of the wide tolerance which has ever been a feature of our national character, openly advocate the overthrow of the Government by violence. More insidious than these extremists are the agitators who would inspire, particularly in our schools and colleges, a sort of intellectual sabotage against the Government in the form of nonsupport. Other endeavors take the form of assaults upon the prestige of our governmental institutions and of movements cunningly calculated to break down the confidence of the people in the integrity of their representatives and of their institutions. Finally, there is a group of people who believe, or profess to believe, that war as an institution may be done away with by world disarmament; the United States to give example to the rest of the world by setting aside, or by rendering impotent, its armed forces, which are the principal agents of national defense.

There are several subdivisions of this group. I am a pacifist, in that I do not want war and desire to avoid it. Most of you, I venture to say, are pacifists in the same sense. But we differ widely from the gentlefolk I have just mentioned as to the means by which peace may be preserved. Some of these advocates of disarmament are sincere and worthy people. But all of them are not. Some of them tie in too closely with the agitators who would overthrow the Government by violence from without, or destroy it by propaganda from within, for they would render it impotent by destroying its agencies for defense—and destruction is the next step along that road.

Our defense against these subversionists is the intangible thing that we have discussed; it is the morale, the patriotism, the Americanism of our people. On no account should we neglect the tangibles. Neither armies nor fleets can be improvised after the emergency breaks upon us. The means to guard ourselves against emergencies must be prepared in the years before the emergency comes. If such proof were needed by intelligent men, the events of 1917 proved the fallacy of the idea that "a million men would spring to arms overnight to defend their country." They might spring, but unless the material side had been kept up they would find no arms to spring to and the end would be disaster.

It is in the two things taken together that our strength lies: The men and material and the spirit that animates all. Let you in your society and all patriotic Americans see to it that neither fails us.

MONETARY POLICY—RESOLUTIONS OF NATIONAL AGRICULTURAL CONFERENCE

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD certain resolutions in reference to the monetary policy adopted by the National Agricultural Conference, composed of a number of Grange organizations.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTIONS ON MONETARY POLICY ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL AGRICULTURAL CONFERENCE IN WASHINGTON, JANUARY 17, 1936

The following organizations comprise the National Agricultural Conference:

The National Grange, representing 35 State, 1,000 county, and 8,000 community granges, with 800,000 members.

American Farm Bureau Federation, representing 37 State and 1,800 county farm bureaus and 300,000 farm families.

National Cooperative Council, representing 3,500 farmers' cooperatives, with more than 1,000,000 members, cooperatively marketing grain, cotton, wool, dairy products, livestock, poultry, citrus and deciduous fruits, vegetables, nuts, etc., and including farmers' cooperative purchasing organizations.

Farmers' National Grain Corporation, largest cooperative grain-marketing organization, having 250,000 affiliated stockholders and 250,000 additional patrons, supplying grain to 2,000 elevators in all-important grain-raising States.

National Farmers' Union, representing local and county units, with 300,000 members in 26 States. (The Farmers' Union joined the National Agricultural Conference after action had been taken on this resolution.)

PREAMBLE

American agriculture, while demanding a monetary policy fair to debtors, has at no time favored a policy unfair to creditors. We have denounced unfair inflation as well as unjust deflation. We have repeatedly insisted upon monetary policies looking only to restoring price levels so that debtors will pay and creditors will receive the same real values, the same purchasing power, that creditors lent and debtors borrowed. And to promote justice and honesty between debtor and creditor, we further insist upon a permanent monetary policy which will stabilize price levels and thereby prevent farmers from having to pay with 30-cent wheat and 5-cent cotton debts incurred on a basis of $2 wheat and 25-cent cotton, or vice versa.

To this end the conference unanimously adopts the following resolution:

"That the desire and objective of the National Agricultural Conference is that our monetary system be so revised and currency and credit so managed as to establish and maintain the dollar with a constant purchasing power, preserving the equity of contracts between debtor and creditor, and avoiding the dangers and losses that are inevitably involved in excessive and uncontrolled inflation or deflation. To accomplish this, be it further

"Resolved, That there be established a 'monetary authority' (by whatever name called);

"That this monetary authority be, as largely as possible, nonpartisan and nonpolitical;

"That their tenure of office be of such length as to protect this body from sudden change;

"That the members, through pensions or otherwise, be adequately provided for throughout life;

"That this 'authority' be directed by definite mandate from Congress, under that section of the Constitution which directs Congress to 'coin money and regulate the value thereof', to establish and maintain a unit of value (the dollar) with a constant purchasing power; a monetary currency regulated on an index of basic commodities on their world price, considering gold and silver as commodities, and dealing with them in terms of their market value.

"That Congress vest in this 'authority' the power to control price adjustments through monetary action by means of (a) repricing of gold; (b) regulating the value of the dollar; (c) declaring the gold content of the dollar; (d) regulating the issuance and volume of currency; (e) and such other powers over money and credit as Congress may see fit to give to it for the accomplishment of the congressional mandate, always reserving, however, to Congress at designated periods the right of review and direction of the operation under this mandate.

"We recommend that Congress consider placing in their mandate to such 'authority' the requirement that they bring about basic commodity price adjustment to the 1926 level or to the level of the average of that period from 1922 to 1929, whichever in the judgment of Congress is more fair.

"We recommend that this 'authority' be given a reasonable length of time to attain this result, and that when such price level is attained that the powers vested in this authority be used in such a manner as to maintain such price level within a reasonable range—for example, 5 percent—to the end that the purchasing power of the dollar may remain constant."

The National Cooperative Council adopted the same resolutions which it endorsed as a member of the National Farm Conference and, in addition, the following report of its own committee on monetary policy setting forth the reasons for its action:

"The National Cooperative Council is composed of organizations interested in many lines of agricultural endeavor. The products from the farms of their members range from the basic commodities, which are directly affected by the rise and fall of world prices, to the finished products, such as butter, milk, fruit, nuts, vegetables, and eggs, the prices of which, while directly affected by production costs, are also affected by business, pay rolls, and consumer purchasing power.

"The interest of this council in any program for the raising and stabilizing of basic commodity prices must take into account their effect upon business activity, pay rolls, and consumers purchasing power, as well as the effect of such a program upon basic farm prices.

"When the National Cooperative Council adopted as its policy a monetary program of revaluing the dollar and stabilizing it upon basic commodities at such a level as would tend to recreate and preserve equity between debtor and creditor, between farmer and laborer, between producers of basic commodities and fixed charges and taxes, it had in mind the necessity of increasing business, increasing pay rolls, and reestablishing purchasing power.

"The monetary policy established by the council's previous resolution is sound. The results which flowed from the execution of that policy so far as the President has put it into effect are indisputable and conclusive evidence of its soundness.

"A brief recitation of the beneficial effects of that policy include the following:

"First, a 65-percent increase in basic commodity prices, including such farm products as corn, wheat, and cotton, before other agricultural legislation became effective.

"Second, the stimulation of business by 50 percent which took place directly after this policy was put into effect.

"Third, a material increase of employment which also took place during the same period. This reemployment was estimated at approximately 3,000,000 men.

"Coincidental with the rise of commodity prices, employment, and business came the increase in security values. Undoubtedly much of the strengthening of banks, life-insurance companies, and institutional endowments resulted directly from the increased security values which followed the institution of this policy.

"During the period between August 1, 1933, and the present time various activities undertaken by the Government have played their part. Some of these have retarded recovery. Undoubtedly N. R. A., in its over-all effect, stopped the recovery started by the program endorsed by your organization. Evidence of this is found in the fact that immediately following the Supreme Court decision which removed it, business and employment again surged upward. Today business activity for the first time is as great as it was at August 1, 1933, and employment today is at the highest rate since long before the United States went off the gold basis.

"Further increases in basic farm prices came with 1934 and 1935. These increases should very largely be credited to the drought and A. A. A. in the West and Southwest, and to the A. A. A. in the South. An indirect effect upon such products as milk, eggs, and butter was the resultant increased cost of production which brought some reduction of supply and consequently some increase in price to these products. On the other hand, when the prices of these products rose to a relatively high basis due to scarcity, the lack of consumer purchasing power brought substitutions such as oleomargarine for butter, rayon for cotton, and cheese and macaroni for meats. The effects of these must not be lost sight of.

"This committee recognizes that the adjustment of the monetary question is not the only adjustment that is needed in agriculture to restore economic opportunity. It may be necessary to bring these other adjustments about as rapidly as possible. These include orderly production and marketing; a more reasonable sharing of the burdens of taxation, of which agriculture has borne too large a part; a better sharing of the benefits of our policy of protection in foreign trade as between agriculture and industry. None of these other matters, however, can function satisfactorily until provided with a dollar of constant purchasing power, and none of them will so promptly produce beneficial effects. These maladjustments should be corrected as rapidly as possible by measures that are legally and economically sound."

Separately the National Grange and the American Farm Bureau Federation reaffirmed in their meetings in Washington the positions on monetary policy taken by their annual conventions in 1935 and 1934.

American Farm Bureau Federation: "In order to avoid the disastrous effects of recurring periods of depression resulting from the inflexibility of a fixed monetary unit and in order to establish and maintain a commodity dollar which will provide a stable medium of exchange for goods and services, we recommend the establishment of a definite policy of currency management to maintain stable price levels in line with fixed costs, from generation to generation, as authorized by the Constitution. We do believe this recommendation is fundamental for the establishment and maintenance of a fair medium of exchange, not only in our domestic market but also in our foreign markets."

National Grange: "Provide an honest dollar, one just to debtor and creditor alike, and prevent uncontrolled inflation or deflation."

At its annual convention in Sacramento, Calif., in November 1935 the National Grange resolved:

"The grange stands for an honest dollar, a dollar that will be fair to debtor and creditor alike. We advocate an amendment to the Banking Act of 1935, under the terms of which Congress will give a mandate to the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System to manage the currency in such a way as to restore the average price level obtaining between 1921 and 1929, and then to stabilize the purchasing power of the dollar at that point. Congress should exercise the authority conferred upon it by the Constitution to coin money and regulate the value thereof."

Defining what farmers mean by an honest dollar, Mr. Louis J. Taber, master of the National Grange, said in his annual address at Sacramento on November 13, 1935:

AN HONEST DOLLAR

"As we are emerging from the worst economic storm in our country's history, the causes are gradually becoming clear. War, speculation, unsound business practices, and neglect of agriculture, were all contributing factors. The trouble was not our ability to produce more than we could consume. We are not too efficient. The farm crisis was due primarily to the collapse in prices. This collapse was due largely to the world-wide price drop caused by the phenomenal rise in the value of gold. We need not fear overproduction if we can keep our medium of exchange functioning. We do not need to discard our methods of society, composed of individual enterprise; but since our Nation has become mechanized and urbanized, we cannot stand deflation when half of the services and prices remain fixed in dollars and the other half must take the full brunt of the rise in the value of money.

"During this collapse figures of the Department of Agriculture indicate that prices paid to farmers fell from the index of 146 in 1929 to 55 in February 1933. Debts, taxes, some types of labor, telephone charges, freight rates, and the price of manufactured goods controlled by great corporations, fell very little, and some of them refused to fall at all. When the dollars the farmer received are reduced by nearly two-thirds he cannot be expected to buy those things which have not been reduced at all, therefore factories closed and unemployment was increased. As the farmer's buying power returns we see factories again opening.

"Our recovery, beginning in the spring of 1933, has continued. The index prices paid farmers for September of this year was 107, or nearly double that of 1933. A much further rise will have to occur before prices paid farmers are in line so that business can go full speed ahead. While farm prices are 107, the Department of Agriculture reports taxes on farms at 151, and the prices of things that farmers have to buy at 126. This still leaves a wide margin before normal industrial production can occur.

"A part of the increase in farm prices is due to the reduced supply of farm products brought about by drought and adjustment. We will not be in a normal situation until a normal crop can be sold at prices that are relatively as high as the price of the goods that agriculture must use. Even then farm prices would not be in line with taxes, debts, and some types of skilled labor. Since the prices of more than half the things for which money is paid refuse to fall, practically the whole world has reduced the value of money, so that the things which fall can be brought back to the level of the things which refuse to move. The weight of gold in our dollar has been reduced by 41 percent, but it still buys more than it bought before the depression. Most other agricultural countries in the world have gone further in raising the price of gold than the United States. Forty-seven countries have either left the gold standard or raised the price of gold. Our country was one of the last to leave gold, and the first to return to it. Three countries have not raised the price of gold, and their agricultural price level has remained almost stationary. American cotton is now selling in many European countries in gold at a very slight advance over the price of February 1933. Most of the rise of the price of cotton in this country is due to the revaluation of the dollar.

"The Grange believes that there is a common-sense approach to the monetary problem. We are opposed to both unlimited inflation and to deflation. We want no violent business activity; we do not want the Nation to again go to the very brink of ruin because of deflation. We demand a sound dollar. Money is not sound when it suddenly loses half of its value, or when it suddenly doubles in value. Uncontrolled inflation is the same as high-speed joy riding, which will end in a sickening crash. Deflation is placing the car in reverse. A sound-money policy is putting the car in gear for normal speed straight ahead.

"So long as the currency is in a given weight of gold, its value must rise and fall whenever the supply of or the demand for gold changes. We cannot repeal the law of supply and demand, and this law applies to everything, and gold is no exception. Here some of the world's great financiers seem to stumble. For this reason farm organizations favor a money that is stable in value. They would permit the price of gold to vary with the value of gold in order that the dollar may keep stable in value. Organized agriculture is in agreement with the present policy of the British Government, which has frequently been announced as primarily concerned with the buying power of the pound rather than its weight in gold. We would restore the dollar to a buying power that would bring the price level in reasonable adjustment and then keep it there with a dollar stable in value.

"There are four schools of thought on the money question:

"First. Those who believe in uncontrolled inflation.

"Second. Those who want to go back to the old gold content of the dollar. This would result in terrible deflation. We should discard each group because one remedy will be as cruel and disastrous as the other.

"Third. Those who want a permanent gold standard, fixing the weight of the dollar near its present value. This group has the support of most international bankers and those who favor world stabilization.

"Fourth. Those who believe that the price of gold, or the amount of gold, should fluctuate in accordance with the value of gold, thus giving us a dollar stable in value and stable in commodity-purchasing power.

"We believe that if this latter school of thought can succeed, it will result in the greatest monetary blessing in 100 years."

The position of the American Farm Bureau Federation was elaborated in its resolutions adopted at its annual convention in Chicago in December 1935:

"Business depressions of the character from which we now are emerging result in the ruination of families, devastation of homes, stagnation of business and industry, and decay of agriculture and labor.

"Such depressions automatically take from our people the guaranties under the Constitution of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

"Depressions are man-made and they can be man-controlled.

"We request Congress to set up a joint committee, representative of the House and Senate, to study thoroughly and factually the causes of business depressions.

"We ask that the results of such studies be used as a basis upon which the Government of the United State may develop ways and means of preventing recurrence of such depressions. We believe that one of the principal contributing causes of such depressions lies in the inflexibility of a fixed monetary unit."

AGRICULTURAL POLICIES—ADDRESS BY FORMER PRESIDENT HOOVER

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, last evening I asked unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an address the cost of which I had not had appraised. It has since been appraised, and I again ask leave to have it printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I do not understand the request of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AUSTIN. Last evening I asked unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by former President HOOVER at Lincoln, Nebr., January 16, 1936. The address came back to me this morning with the suggestion that I repeat the request, because I had not obtained an appraisal of its cost, which I have now done.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I have recently debated various realities of the New Deal at Oakland, New York, and St. Louis. I propose now to explore it further, particularly its agricultural policies and their effect on the whole people.

The New Deal has developed a new technique in debate. They set up a glorious ideal to which we all agree unanimously. Then they drive somewhere else or into the ditch. When we protest they blackguard us for opposing the glorious ideal. And they announce that all protesters are the tools of Satan or Wall Street. When we summon common sense and facts they weep aloud over their martyrdom for the ideal.

The New Deal explanation on their agricultural policies exceed 30,000,000 words. You will not expect me to turn the light into every dark corner in 30 minutes. Some of the rugged prima donnas who have directed these policies have resigned and said worse things than I would say. One quality of the old regulated individualists was teamwork.

Right at the outset let us get some things perfectly clear. There is an agricultural problem. It concerns the entire Nation. It concerns the happiness of 7,000,000 homes. Our country will not have reached either full moral or economic stature until confidence and hope shine in these homes. The problem is still unsolved.

Aside from its flagrant flouting of the Constitution, the New Deal farm method had within it destruction both to the farmers and to the Nation. A new program is necessary. It is now in the making. The Nation has a right to insist that it must be effective and it must be based upon sound principles.

I shall debate the subject in five directions.

Part 1 will be the reasons why the farm question is of national interest. I hope this part will be emphatic.

Part 2 is a few words upon the causes of the farmers' problems. I hope this part will not wholly spoil the stock in trade of many politicians, for they have to live also.

Part 3 is what the New Deal is doing to the farmer as a citizen along with all other citizens. These are the things to avoid in the future. I hope this part will not be too sad.

Part 4 is what the New Deal has done to the farmer in his farming business. This is also sad.

Part 5 consists of some discussions of a new program. It may shock those who believe in doing nothing for human ills. It may shock those who believe that all healing medicine comes off the collective brew.

In all parts there are remarks on what the New Deal has been doing to the whole structure of human liberty and American institutions in the guise of farm relief.

Each part has unpleasant features to somebody. However, my position is such that approval by politicians and many others who live by the sweat of the farmers' brows is immaterial. If this country is to be saved as a decent place for the farmers' children and all our children to live in ordered liberty and faith of the future, we have a lot of unpleasant truth to face. In the long war for right thinking falsehood often wins the first battle. But truth always wins the last—if the Nation survives in the meantime.

PART I

President Roosevelt, on December 9, at Chicago, properly stated one reason why the plight of the farmer is an issue which concerns all of the American people. He said, "Farm prosperity cannot exist without city prosperity, and city prosperity cannot exist without farm prosperity." Every President since George Washington, every public man, every economist, and every school teacher has said the same thing. It is vitally true, even if it is not news. But the President omitted to state other reasons why his farm policies are an issue vital to the whole American people.

The first is that the urgent need of farm relief has been used as a power to impose the New Deal philosophy upon the American people. That is comprised of government by individuals in place of a government of laws. It comprises goose stepping the people under this pinkish banner of planned economy. That was tried under the N. R. A., but the Supreme Court halted it early. It has had a longer march under the A. A. A. Step by step the New Deal agricultural policies advanced from cajolery with a gentle rain of checks to open coercion. Men who planted on their own farms and sold in their own way the product which God and their own labor give them could have been sent to jail for doing just that. That is not liberty. That is collectivism.

The second reason the President did not state was that those ideas of production control revolve upon planned scarcity instead of the plenty upon which America alone has made progress. To stop the production of 50,000,000 fertile acres is not progress. That also concerns the whole people. Civilization has made progress solely through producing more and more of varied things. The whole history of humanity has been a struggle against famine and want.

Within only the last half century America achieved a triumph in this age-long struggle by the creation of a system which at last can produce a plenty for a reasonable living for all of us. We have not solved the problem of its distribution, but in this plan of scarcity we are surrendering the very foundation of human hope.

The third reason was that the processing tax levied to support this program bore most heavily upon the 15,000,000 workers' homes. It was an undeserved burden to those women struggling to feed their men and their children. But the worst of that scheme was that it set boiling the witches' caldron of class conflict of town against the farmers. This tax should never be revived.

PART II

The causes of the farmer's troubles must be honestly faced if we are to have common-sense remedy. Economic patent medicines require no diagnosis except decision that the patient is in pain.

The difficulties of our agriculture came mainly from the war and its hectic aftermaths. Wars always do that to the farmer. Demoralization lasted 20 years after the Napoleonic Wars and a dozen years after our own Civil War.

I am glad that the President at last admits that the war had something to do with the farm depression. At Chicago, on December 9, 1935, he says, in referring to farm prosperity in the period before the war: "They were the last years before the world-wide disturbance, caused by the World War, took place in our economic life." I had been told so often by the New Deal that I did it that I had given up hope of salvation. I feel better.

The dislocation of wars and slumps hits the farmer harder than any other group. Farm prices are more sensitive to these shocks than wages and industrial prices. All parts of the economic system inevitably come back into balance with time. But farm recovery is longer drawn out. That is the higher economics of it.

The painful symptoms of it appears in the farmer's pocket in the slump of purchasing power of his dollar. Many farmers cannot hold on against these delays in readjustment. I have held that we cannot see the capable and industrious driven from their homes during these periods if they want to make a fight for them. That is the humanity of it.

There is at least one hopeful aspect of these war causes of the farmers' difficulties. They do not last forever. Many of our measures can be of emergency character. Recovery will cure many difficulties—that is, if it is allowed by the New Deal to come.

When the world depression was turned, in June and July 1932, agriculture prices rose in a start toward equality with industrial prices. The farmer's dollar improved more than 20 percent. Prices were moving into a natural relation again. Then came an era of the great fear. Fright over the coming of the New Deal skidded the country into the money and bank panic. The President said "the mechanics of civilization have come to a dead stop." Many a driver who has had a bad skid thinks that. Then began the magic of the New Deal. And they repeated each mistake of the Farm Board and added a big idea. That big idea is that you can catch an economic force with a policeman.

Incidentally, the culmination of that era of great fear is the convenient starting point for all of the President's comparative statistics. He chooses the low point of quotation induced by their own actions. If he would go back a few months into 1932, before the great fear started, he would find the prices were 80 to 100 percent higher than those he quotes. And they were in 100-cent dollars. And even then they were only at the turning of the greatest depression in history. His quotations look like an effort to warm the Nation over cold glass chunks in an illuminated crate.

PART III

Things have been done to the farmer by the New Deal which do not relate to agriculture.

Firstly, this torrent of wasteful spending, unbalanced Budget, and debt will be paid by the farmer as well as all others. It will blight all his days with anxiety. The farmer pays for it not alone in direct taxes but hidden taxes that are wrapped in everything he buys. The farmer, in fact, pays in larger measure than any other group because he buys not alone for his family but also for his farm, and is less able than any other production group to mark up the prices of his products and pass these taxes on to the consumer. Moreover, about one-quarter of the $14,000,000,000 of the probable increased New Deal debt will rest on the farm as a supermortgage. Blessed are the young, for they shall inherit the national debt.

Secondly, the present policies of the New Deal, by credit inflation, produce stock booms that are a great dole for the "money changers." President Roosevelt, on July 24, 1933, stated that we cannot attain prosperity "in a Nation half boom and half broke." The New Deal has attained just that. That half boom is on in the stock exchange, the farmers are half broke—and the 20,000,000 on relief are fully broke. These credit booms add little to farm prices. When they crack they throw the farmer in the ditch.

There is a thirdly, on currency policies. There is a fourthly, on making the farmers pay for a large part of the Social Security Act and receiving little benefits. There is a fifthly, on relief policies which make it impossible for farmers to get labor in the midst of unemployment. There is a sixthly and a seventhly, on some other white rabbits. All of them make farm thinking difficult and intense. I do not have the time to discuss them all now.

PART IV

If we are now to deal competently with farm relief we must examine the experience with the New Deal farm measures. There are proved dangers which must be avoided. In other words, what have these New Deal principles done to the farmer?

President Roosevelt on one occasion said: "I like to think of the A. A. A. not as a temporary means * * * but as an expression of principle." From their practical works, irrespective of their words, the main principle is the economy of scarcity based on control of production enforced by telling the farmer what he can plant.

The largest justification has been that it has raised prices. Prices have improved. I leave you four thoughts on that subject: First, the inflation of the dollar, the droughts, and world recovery would have made higher prices in any event. Second, the Chicago Tribune is authority for the statement that the farmer's income from many uncontrolled commodities has been greater in proportion than from those which have had the attention of the New Deal. President Roosevelt on May 30, 1935, prophesied that "if we abandon crop control wheat will immediately drop to 36 cents a bushel and cotton to 5 cents a pound." He felt the same about hogs.

I do not know how long a time there is in "immediately." It is more than a week. Fourth, at the same time another principle of the New Deal was to lift wages and industrial prices. The sum of these two principles is that the farmer has less to sell and pays more for what he buys. Labor pays for it in increased cost of living. By this device we have got the economic dog running around in circles chasing his tail.

We may explore the effect of the processing tax in case someone might suggest we try it again. In early 1933 President-elect Roosevelt expressed himself as horrified and directed the defeat of my proposal to the Democratic Congress to balance the Budget by a manufacturers' sales tax of 2½ percent. My proposal exempted food and cheaper clothing. We did that in order that we should not impose the burden upon the poor. Yet, as President Roosevelt, he places a manufacturers' sales tax of 25 percent on pork and 30 percent on flour, both absolute essentials to the poor. That blow at the poor was no doubt softened by calling it a "processing" tax. The implication was that some wicked middleman would pay it. The housewife rebelled at this more abundant life. One result of it was that the consumption of food in 1935 fell below the worst year, 1932, by the product of over 15,000,000 acres.

We may explore what these New Deal principles did to our export and import market. You will remember that 1932 was the year when "it could not be worse." So we will take that worst year and compare it with the New Deal year of 1935. From that worst year exports of cotton have decreased 4,250,000 bales; our grain 93,000,000 bushels, our animal products by 500,000,000 pounds. This is estimated to be the product of about 2,000,000 acres. But, worse than that, this greatest food-producing country on earth has imported this year about 100,000,000 bushels of grain, 700,000,000 pounds of animal products, and increased its imports of vegetable oils to be used as substitutes by another 700,000,000 pounds.

It would take another probable 15,000,000 acres to produce these imports. The Secretary of Agriculture says America must choose one of three courses in foreign trade. The three are various degrees of the theory of more industrial imports in order that the American farmer may sell more to foreign countries. But what he produced was a fourth choice; that is, to give the foreign farmer the American farmer's market.

From all this decrease in home consumption and shift in foreign trade the farmer has lost the market for more acres than the whole New Deal curtailment of 50,000,000 fertile acres. Is that not the principle of the "economic dog" chasing his tail?

On January 10 President Roosevelt declared himself in opposition to "shipping our soil fertility to foreign nations." The logical conclusion of all that is to stop exports altogether.

There is futility here somewhere. The idea is that we encourage imports of industrial products and create unemployment at home. We are told we must do this in order that the farmer may export his products. Now we are told that it is not to our advantage to export farm products at all. He overlooks the fact that we can manufacture synthetic fertilizers to any amount necessary to cover export of "soil fertility."

In May 1932, when I vetoed a bill for reciprocal-tariff treaties, I stated that most of such treaties would sacrifice the American farmer. The New Deal method in testing poison is apparently to make the Nation swallow it. By just these reciprocal treaties the American market is today being opened to farmers of Cuba, Canada, Spain, and Italy. Yet under these principles farmers are told they must allow fertile acres to be idle because there is no market for their products. It is very confusing. The economic dog whirls even faster under this stimulus.

We must explore as to where we get to when we start controlling crops. This principle of scarcity gets scarcer and scarcer. The moment one farm product was regimented another one had to be mobilized to prevent the farmer's energy from going into that. So we marched from seven controlled commodities in May 1933 to five more in April 1934, another in May 1934, and finally we come to potatoes in 1935. Moreover, these measures are moving steadily to more and more coercion and less rain of checks—as witness the Cotton and Potato Acts. As I read further and further into the 6,250 verboten words of the potato law, I realize that one of the impulses to cheerfulness was about to be mashed out of American life. The potato had yielded not only food, but it had radiated humor to our daily conversation.

It was once the happiest of all vegetables. Its life would have been saddened by the bootlegger, the passive resister, and the Federal inspectors. Confined to a package by law, its eyes would have been dimmed by the alphabetical revenue stamps it must bear.

One of the assured principles of New Deal farming is politics. One would think in the thunders of idealism that have accompanied planned agriculture it would be clean of politics. I have but one comment. That is to read two lines from a letter I hold, written by a high officer in the A. A. A. to a gentleman who spent his life in scientific work for the farmer and who was accepted for appointment in that service. It says:

It will be necessary (for you) to secure political clearance, which means a letter of approval from the Democratic National Committee in California. The Department of Agriculture was wholly under merit service before this sort of idealist got it. The execution of these principles required 120,000 part- or full-time Federal officials. Their pay was assessed against the farmers. This new breed of middlemen every day tried hard to bring agriculture into balance with politics.

We may explore the effect of this economy by scarcity and crop control upon employment. For instance, their reduction of cotton by 10,000,000 acres is producing a hideous poverty in the sharecroppers of the South. It is creating unemployment all over the Nation of some hundreds of thousands of agricultural laborers, railway men, and others, who formerly lived by producing and handling the 20,000,000 tons of agricultural products that could come from the acres forced into idleness.

And above all other consequences the whole notion of regimenting the farmers under bureaucracy was the negation of the free American spirit. The system of scarcity was being applied to human freedom.

Does all this corroborate President Roosevelt's indication on December 9 at Chicago that agriculture is "making great strides" toward a "balance either within itself or with industry and business"? If so, it was a juggler's balance.

Finally, does anybody believe that this flimsy structure under agriculture of regimenting men, of putting fertile acres out of action, of giving American markets to foreigners, and levying its cost on the poor would not have fallen of its own weight, even without the Supreme Court?

PART V

We may now explore some of the roads to relief.

And every country, including ourselves, has adopted measure after measure to protect the farmer and to speed a return to stability. Other nations tried most of the New Deal measures before the New Deal was born. From all this experience we should by now have learned some lessons in what is harmful, what is futile, and what will help.

We shall be less than intelligent, and we shall be heartless of the farmers' problems if we do not distill from this wreckage of these experiments some lessons in truth. And there have been aids to recovery extended to the farmer both at home and abroad which have been successful. The first group of these aids is: Increase consumption of food by restoration of employment. That can come only with a balanced Budget, stable currency, and credit. Give the farmer our own home market. Adopt such sane national policies as will again restore reasonable export markets. Out of this group of policies we can restore demand to many millions of fertile acres.

The second group of policies is to retire submarginal lands where people cannot make a living. Do it in the more effective and humane way proposed by Secretary Hyde in 1932. Retard new reclamation projects until the land can be used.

A third group of policies is: Encourage cooperative marketing and those marketing agreements which contribute to prevent gluts in the flow to markets. The farm-credit machinery established by Republican administrations and improved by the New Deal should be still further improved.

But beyond these measures this farm situation is now one where still further emergency measures pending general economic recovery are necessary. They are doubly necessary as a new road must be built by which agriculture can get back onto solid ground from the quicksand of the New Deal. We shall need to open our minds to further experiment.

I suggest as one contribution to new methods that instead of trying to find a balance to agriculture by paying the farmer to curtail a crop, we should endeavor to expand another crop which can be marketed or which would improve the fertility of the soil.

We import vast quantities of vegetable oils, sugar, and other commodities. There are industrial products that could be introduced by the American farmer. We need to replenish our soils with legumes and restore coverages. If we include this suggestion with the policies I have already mentioned, which would recover our lost acres from foreigners, we would be able to employ more than all the acres put out of action by the New Deal. We would reverse this economy of scarcity to an economy of plenty.

This question of sustained fertility and better land use was brought to the forefront by former Governor Lowden in 1930. Nation-wide conferences under Secretary Hyde in 1932 further developed parts of this subject. The matter was still further advanced by the Republican side in the campaign of that year. These ideas have been further contributed to by many thinking men since that time. In order to secure these objectives, I believe we must be prepared to subsidize directly such special crops until agriculture has again been brought into balance. At the end of such a road we could hope for a balanced agriculture in full production and increased fertility in our soils.

I am advised that it can be done within the spirit as well as the letter of the Constitution.

Since this paragraph was written these ideas have been discussed in Washington, as a method of overcoming the debacle brought about by the New Deal. But if they are adopted it should be under certain fundamental safeguards. There should be no attempt to again impose New Deal ideas of controlling and regimenting the farmer or restricting production. He must be free of any restriction and control contracts. The farmer must be an entirely free man to use his own skill and judgment. The administration of these methods should be handled by the land-grant colleges in order to free agriculture of politics and the vast bureaucracy now loaded upon the farmer. This work should be coordinated by a nonpolitical national board. The cost should be borne by the general taxpayer and not loaded upon the poorest of the country through some tax like the processing tax. Otherwise this method will again be a subterfuge of pinkish national planning under another alphabet.

Somebody will shy at the blunt word "subsidy", and, in fact, the American people have been going all around Robin Hood's barn rather than use it. Over a century ago we began it in canals and turnpikes; since then we have kept it up in railroads, highways, ships and aviation, and silver mines and land reclamation—agriculture—we usually do it under some other name than subsidy. We had better begin to use straight words and we will act straight. A subsidy is a burden on the taxpayer, but it does not regiment or destroy the initiative or freedom of the receiver; it is to stimulate that.

In conclusion, may I offer a word of personal emotion. It lies beyond the land of economies. I have spent years in public service in many countries during this most fateful period of human history. I saw as few men the backwash of war upon the common man of these countries. I saw at first hand revolution creeping in under promises of relief from the agonies of war destruction. I have seen the insidious destruction of liberty by propaganda. I have seen suffering humanity sacrifice that liberty, the greatest of all human achievements for an illusion of security. The farmers of Russia supported the Bolsheviki against the new-born democracy on the promise of the land. Today they have the choice of Siberia or the collectivist farms. I have seen freedom, the most priceless heritage, torn from children that this generation might escape its responsibilities. I wish to say to you unhesitatingly that our country has been following step by step the road through which these millions of people in foreign countries lost their liberties. Our farmers have had the blessing of individual liberty in greater fullness in their lives than any other part of even our own people. It was the farmers who fired the first shot at Lexington. It must be the farmers of America who defend that heritage. I ask you to stop, look, and listen.

THE PRESIDENT'S RADIO ADDRESS—CHICAGO TRIBUNE EDITORIAL

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Chicago Daily Tribune, dated Monday, January 6, 1936.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Chicago Tribune of Jan. 6, 1936]

HE ASKED FOR IT; HERE IT IS

Mr. Roosevelt's stump speech to the radio audience was another of his calculated attempts to inflame class hatred. The opposition to him and his administration, he said, consisted of nothing more than a handful of bloated plutocrats. To be sure, he admitted, they have their millions of followers, but this following is made up of stooges and dupes.

This is his answer to the indication of the Literary Digest poll that two-thirds of the voters in the United States are eager for the opportunity to vote him and his addlebrained administration out of office. The millions who have come to distrust and fear him, so he says, don't know what it is all about. Mr. Roosevelt pretends that taxpayers don't know what he is costing them; that housewives don't know that the cost of living has gone up and up; that stockholders who have organized for self-protection by the hundreds of thousands have no reason to fear his program of spoliation; that owners of insurance policies and savings accounts feel under obligations to him for jeopardizing the security they had bought and paid for.

If Mr. Roosevelt thinks he can get away with that, his conceit matches his hypocrisy.

He talks of bloated plutocrats, he who was born to great wealth and never had to earn his living! Mr. Roosevelt is a far richer man, and his wife is a far richer woman, than all but a few of his opponents. His intimates, like Vincent Astor, are all rich men.

He talks of "unscrupulous money changers" and conveniently forgets that he ran a neat little pool in German marks when the exchange rates were running wild.

He speaks with justified contempt of "the manipulations of dishonest speculators", conveniently forgetting those stock-peddling circulars of only a few years ago which bore his name. Mr. Roosevelt, who lent his name and his reputation to the flotation of Camco, one of the wildest of the boom-time promotions, now dares to denounce stock jobbery. The suckers who placed faith in the business competence and integrity of Franklin D. Roosevelt, director of the Consolidated Automatic Vending Machine Co., do not speak over Nation-wide hook-ups, but they have not forgotten.

The same Roosevelt who now denounces the "rulers of the exchanges of mankind's goods" is the same Roosevelt who, as Governor of New York, took no step to regulate the greatest of all the exchanges. The New York Stock Exchange and the New York Curb Exchange, around which clustered most of the financial abuses of the boom era, were under the Roosevelt thumb during the boom era. The speculator in German marks and the director of Camco did nothing to protect the innocent investor when he most needed protection. It is curious that Mr. Roosevelt overlooked that fact the other night when he was shouting that he, and he alone, had the will and the competence to protect the little fellow from the plutocrats who "rule the exchanges."

Mr. Roosevelt, the stump speaker, had much to say about the sins of big business, but he neglected to note that he is himself a large stockholder in one of the biggest of them—General Electric—and perhaps in many others as well. General Electric has made a lot of money these last few years out of Government contracts for useless and uneconomical power plants financed by the Federal Treasury. General Electric obliged Mrs. Roosevelt when it rescued her subsistence homestead scheme when it was on the verge of failure, and a good many observers said it was a small return for the favors which had been conferred by the New Deal. General Electric had clear sailing in the days of Mr. Roosevelt's codes, when little businessmen like Fred Perkins, the battery man, were going to jail.

Mr. Roosevelt asked in his speech whether home owners are once more to be obliged to pay high interest rates. Again he conveniently forgets. This time his memory does not extend to that housing venture in the New York metropolitan area. Mr. Roosevelt has an investment there. No reduction in interest rates has been granted those who bought property in this co-called model development. Home owners who are in debt to Mr. Roosevelt must pay their interest notes at the old rate and on the day they are due or out they go.

This is the Roosevelt who now says that those who oppose him are plutocrats and the dupes and stooges of plutocrats. No wonder Mr. Farley has felt impelled to try to explain what his chief meant the other night and has made a poor job of the explanation. No wonder the editorial supporters of the administration have been hard put to it to justify the speech and have fallen back on the labored and the obvious.

Mr. Roosevelt's hypocrisy was too evident. No competent defense was made of that speech because no competent defense could be made of it or the man who delivered it.

POLITICAL CONDITIONS—ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES A. FARLEY

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by Hon. James A. Farley, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, at Washington, D. C., on Monday evening, December 30, 1935.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ordinarily a national campaign does not start until the two candidates for the Presidency are, so to speak, in the ring. Then it is possible to balance one against the other; to weigh the accomplishments of each, to compare their intellectual equipment, their experience, their fitness to determine questions that involve the whole country's welfare, their moral character, and mental capacity.

At such a time each party is expected to exalt its own man and assail the other in their respective efforts to convince the voters that only their man is qualified to administer the affairs of the Nation, both as to domestic problems and foreign relations.

It is different with the present political make-up, for the campaign is already under way after a fashion. And what a fashion!

The minority party, destitute of an available candidate, barren of a program, all at sea as to a platform, fills the air with denunciation of the President and fills the newspapers with a mixture of falsehoods and simple defamation. An old rhyme described the elephant as a beast with a tail at each end, and the maker of that verse might well have had the Republican symbol in mind, even though the couplet is probably older than the party.

On one end we have the Fletcher organization of standpatters clamoring for the return of the Hoover system, with the American Lobbyist League signing; checks with the same lavishness its members displayed for the lobbying through of the Smoot-Hawley tariff in the last Republican Congress and furnished the $2,000,000 slush fund in the futile effort to defeat the bill to control the greedy holding companies in the recent session. On the other end we have the Hearst newspapers, which, month in and month out, have been demanding that the Government start the printing presses issuing money with nothing behind it, and which now appear as the guardians of the conservative interests and boosting first one and then another colorless figure.

Perhaps we should not be too severe on the Republican steering committee floundering in its dilemma, because it has not one but two difficult enterprises to put over. It must first build up some lay figure into the stature of a statesman, so that the country will not be shocked by the appearance of an unknown as the Republican hero next June; and, second, it must knock down President Roosevelt, who has popular esteem in a greater degree than any modern President. There are difficulties for both propositions. There are the claims of ex-President Hoover, who, naturally, is against anything the New Deal offers and typifies what the lobbyist league is most ardently for. But they know the Progressive end of their party will not stand for another dose of Hoover. They have the assaults of that veteran, Senator BORAH, on the Hoover system to discourage them. Since long before many voters of today were born Mr. BORAH has been available for a Republican Presidential nomination, and Republican convention after convention turned him down as an unregenerate liberal—foe of everything the backers of the G. O. P. ever bought and paid for.

So it is reasonable to assume that the Republican old guard can't get the nomination for Mr. Hoover and dare not accept Senator BORAH. These are the only two among the aspirants who were at all known before the cruel necessities of politics sent the Republican candidate hunters scouting into the wilderness in their search for somebody on whom they may pin the nomination. They are working hard at their task.

The mails are full of literature telling of the heretofore unsuspected statesmanship of Governor Landon, of Kansas; of the tremendous capacity, resource, and wisdom of Colonel Knox, who used to work for Mr. Hearst and now has a newspaper of his own, but whose record otherwise is blank; and others of varying obscurity.

I would not venture to guess who in their predicament the minority party will pick to oppose President Roosevelt next November. It would save time, trouble, and expense if their political lightweights should shake dice or shoot craps for the nomination. Not that the stake would be valuable enough to exalt the winner, but it would save the country from the deluge of speeches eulogizing nonentities which will characterize the Republican convention.

Their second task—that of lowering the prestige of Franklin D. Roosevelt—is even more difficult than that of winnowing out some sort of a candidate and some sort of a platform from among mediocrities and the confusion of thought that now obtains.

Our President has performed a great job. Some people might not like the A. A. A. legislation, for example, but the farmers, restored to solvency for the first time in a dozen years, are a unit in their satisfaction over the results. A few people with enormous incomes see nothing but communism in the last tax legislation. Their numbers are unimportant, and their propaganda, seeking to convince the ordinary voter that some frightful injustice is being done in asking those best able to pay to pay their share of the national expense, is the last word in political futility.

The constantly rising tide of national prosperity is the answer to all the attacks on the Roosevelt administration. The contrast between the state of the Nation today and what it was on the advent of Franklin D. Roosevelt to the White House is all the retort required to the sprawling barrage that is proceeding from the Republican National Committee and being paid for by the special interests that are seeking the return of the system so emphatically repudiated by the people in 1932.

My hearers probably all have noted the declamations of the former President. His contention is, in brief, that he had the depression licked nearly a year before his Presidency ceased. In other words, that prosperity was just around the corner from June of 1932 and that it was only the imminence of President Roosevelt succeeding him that prevented us from reaching that corner. Now I just wonder, if the Hoover policies were so fine, if his economic philosophy was so perfect, and if the end of the depression was so plainly marked during his regime, why it was that the people almost unanimously turned his administration out at the first opportunity.

Unable to combat the fact of the restored solvency of business, our political opponents fall back on the statement that the renewed prosperity is not because of what the administration has done. Well, if it was not the acts of the administration, what on earth could it have been that turned despair into satisfaction, that brought incomes to agriculture and industry instead of deficits, and that gave the courage to those who now seek for a return to the Hoover principles to shriek for the Government to cease its program, when just a little while ago they came to Washington tremblingly to beg the administration to do something to relieve their plight?

They talk of the President's having repudiated his promise, but I have yet to hear them mention any promise that has not been carried out or is not in process of being carried out. He promised a stable currency. Our dollar is the solidest money unit in the world today. He promised economy in Government. It is costing less today by hundreds of millions of dollars a year to administer the ordinary processes of Government than it did before he came to the White House. But, they say, he promised a balanced Budget. Balancing a budget is not something that can be done in the flickering of an eyelash, particularly when millions of people are still on relief.

Incidentally, though you would never guess it from the proclamations of the Liberty League or its annex, the Republican National Committee, the Roosevelt administration did not invent the deficit. It inherited from the Hoover administration an entry in the red of something over $3,000,000,000. If you deduct the money that is coming back to the Government in the shape of R. F. C. loans and those of the Farm Credit and Home Owners' Loan Administrations, the actual amount of what the Government owes, as would be shown on such a balance sheet as any institution would get out to picture its financial status, is not so very much more than the Hoover deficit. These loaning agencies of the Government are all in a healthy business condition, getting in in payments and interest more than they are putting out. Moreover, because the Government's credit is so good that it can borrow money at a very much lower rate of interest than it did before, the cost of carrying the total debt today is less than what it cost the Government to carry the lesser debt of the Hoover period. All of these are steps toward Budget balancing. Federal income taxes this year to December 21, 1935, amounted to $321,000,000 more than last year, a gain translatable into a $6,000,000,000 increase in the income of our citizens. Given a continuance of the present trend of prosperity, we may look forward to a steady enhancement of the Government's income and an equally steady decrease in the Government expenditure.

We know that at the close of the war the United States Government owed $26,000,000,000, and that in the course of 10 years, although taxes were decreased progressively, $10,000,000,000 of this obligation had been repaid, despite the fact of the repudiation of $11,000,000,000 of debts owed to us by foreign governments. There was nothing miraculous about this. It was accomplished by ordinary methods in the ordinary way, and the process will be repeated in relation to the present deficit.

There is nothing frightful about the amount and nobody need fear that the Government is not strong enough to take care of it.

Nor is there any more truth in the allegation against the Roosevelt administration of unbridled extravagance than there is in the Treasury situation. The money is not being burned up, it is not being thrown into the sea, but it has gone into the arteries of trade and industry. It has paid wages and bought raw materials, and it is now safely among the deposits of millions of our citizens in the banks. It is there safely because of what the Roosevelt administration has done to correct banking abuses and make the fiscal depositories solider than they have ever been in our whole history.

I note among the charges that are brought against the administration one to the effect that it is timing the Public Works projects in such a fashion as to make the expenditures come just before elections. Nineteen hundred and thirty-six happens to be an election year; 1936 likewise happens to be a year in which the campaign against unemployment calls for many Public Works projects. That is all there is to the accusation. The Public Works program has been in progress for more than a year. Obviously the localities had to get up their blueprints. Congress had to appropriate the money, and the engineers had to determine which buildings, bridges, dams, or other works were best suited for a particular time of year or a particular locality. The administration does not determine when the work begins. After the President has given approval to a completed plan it goes to the Comptroller General, who incidentally was secretary of the Republican National Committee, and was appointed to his present office by President Harding. His term runs 15 years. Sometimes the Comptroller General's approval is immediate; sometimes he holds projects up for a month or two. The charge was made that Kentucky's appropriation was specially arranged to be let loose 10 days before the gubernatorial election in November. Comptroller General McCarl held this appropriation over a month, and even our adversaries will hardly contend that a Republican official would be likely to time a project to help elect a Democrat. Moreover, about the same time the States of Illinois and Kansas, among others, where there was no election, got more money than did Kentucky.

I only mention this particular phase of G. O. P. propaganda, because it so clearly illustrates the principle that in the present propaganda melee an evil construction must be placed on every act whether the President had anything to do with it or not.

These are the facts. But you need not, of course, expect the minority party and those who supply its funds to admit it. There is really not much use in nailing the lies because the Republicans take the position that "this is our story and we'll stick to it."

Now, just a word about the political prospects. I have sounded, I believe, every source of political information from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from Canada to the Gulf of Mexico, and I tell you tonight that President Roosevelt will next November receive as great an endorsement from a grateful country as he did before.

The Democratic Party has, of course, no such reservoir of money to tap for campaign expenses as the other side has. As against the blocks of money that they will get from a few we must match the small amounts we will get from the many. Just now our adversaries are in a twitter because we are raising a fund to wipe out the deficit our party inherited from previous regimes by means of Jackson Day dinners. It is going to cost at our no. 1 dinner in Washington, on January 8, $50 a plate. That does not mean that we will pretend to give our guests $50 worth of food and drink. The largest part of the price of this and every other dinner goes to the national committee to pay off its debts so that by convention time we can go into the battle with a clean slate. There will be on that night, I think, about 2,000 Andrew Jackson dinners, and the President's speech made in Washington will be broadcasted to each of these banquets.

I think my hearers will agree with me that this is a lot cleaner way of raising campaign funds than by accepting payment in advance for governmental favors to special interests, which is the process by which the party of Hoover and Fletcher, of Mellon and Ogden Mills is paying for its election ballyhoo.

GOVERNMENTAL EXPENDITURES—PHILADELPHIA RECORD EDITORIAL

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Philadelphia Record entitled "What Price Roosevelt."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Record]

WHAT PRICE ROOSEVELT?

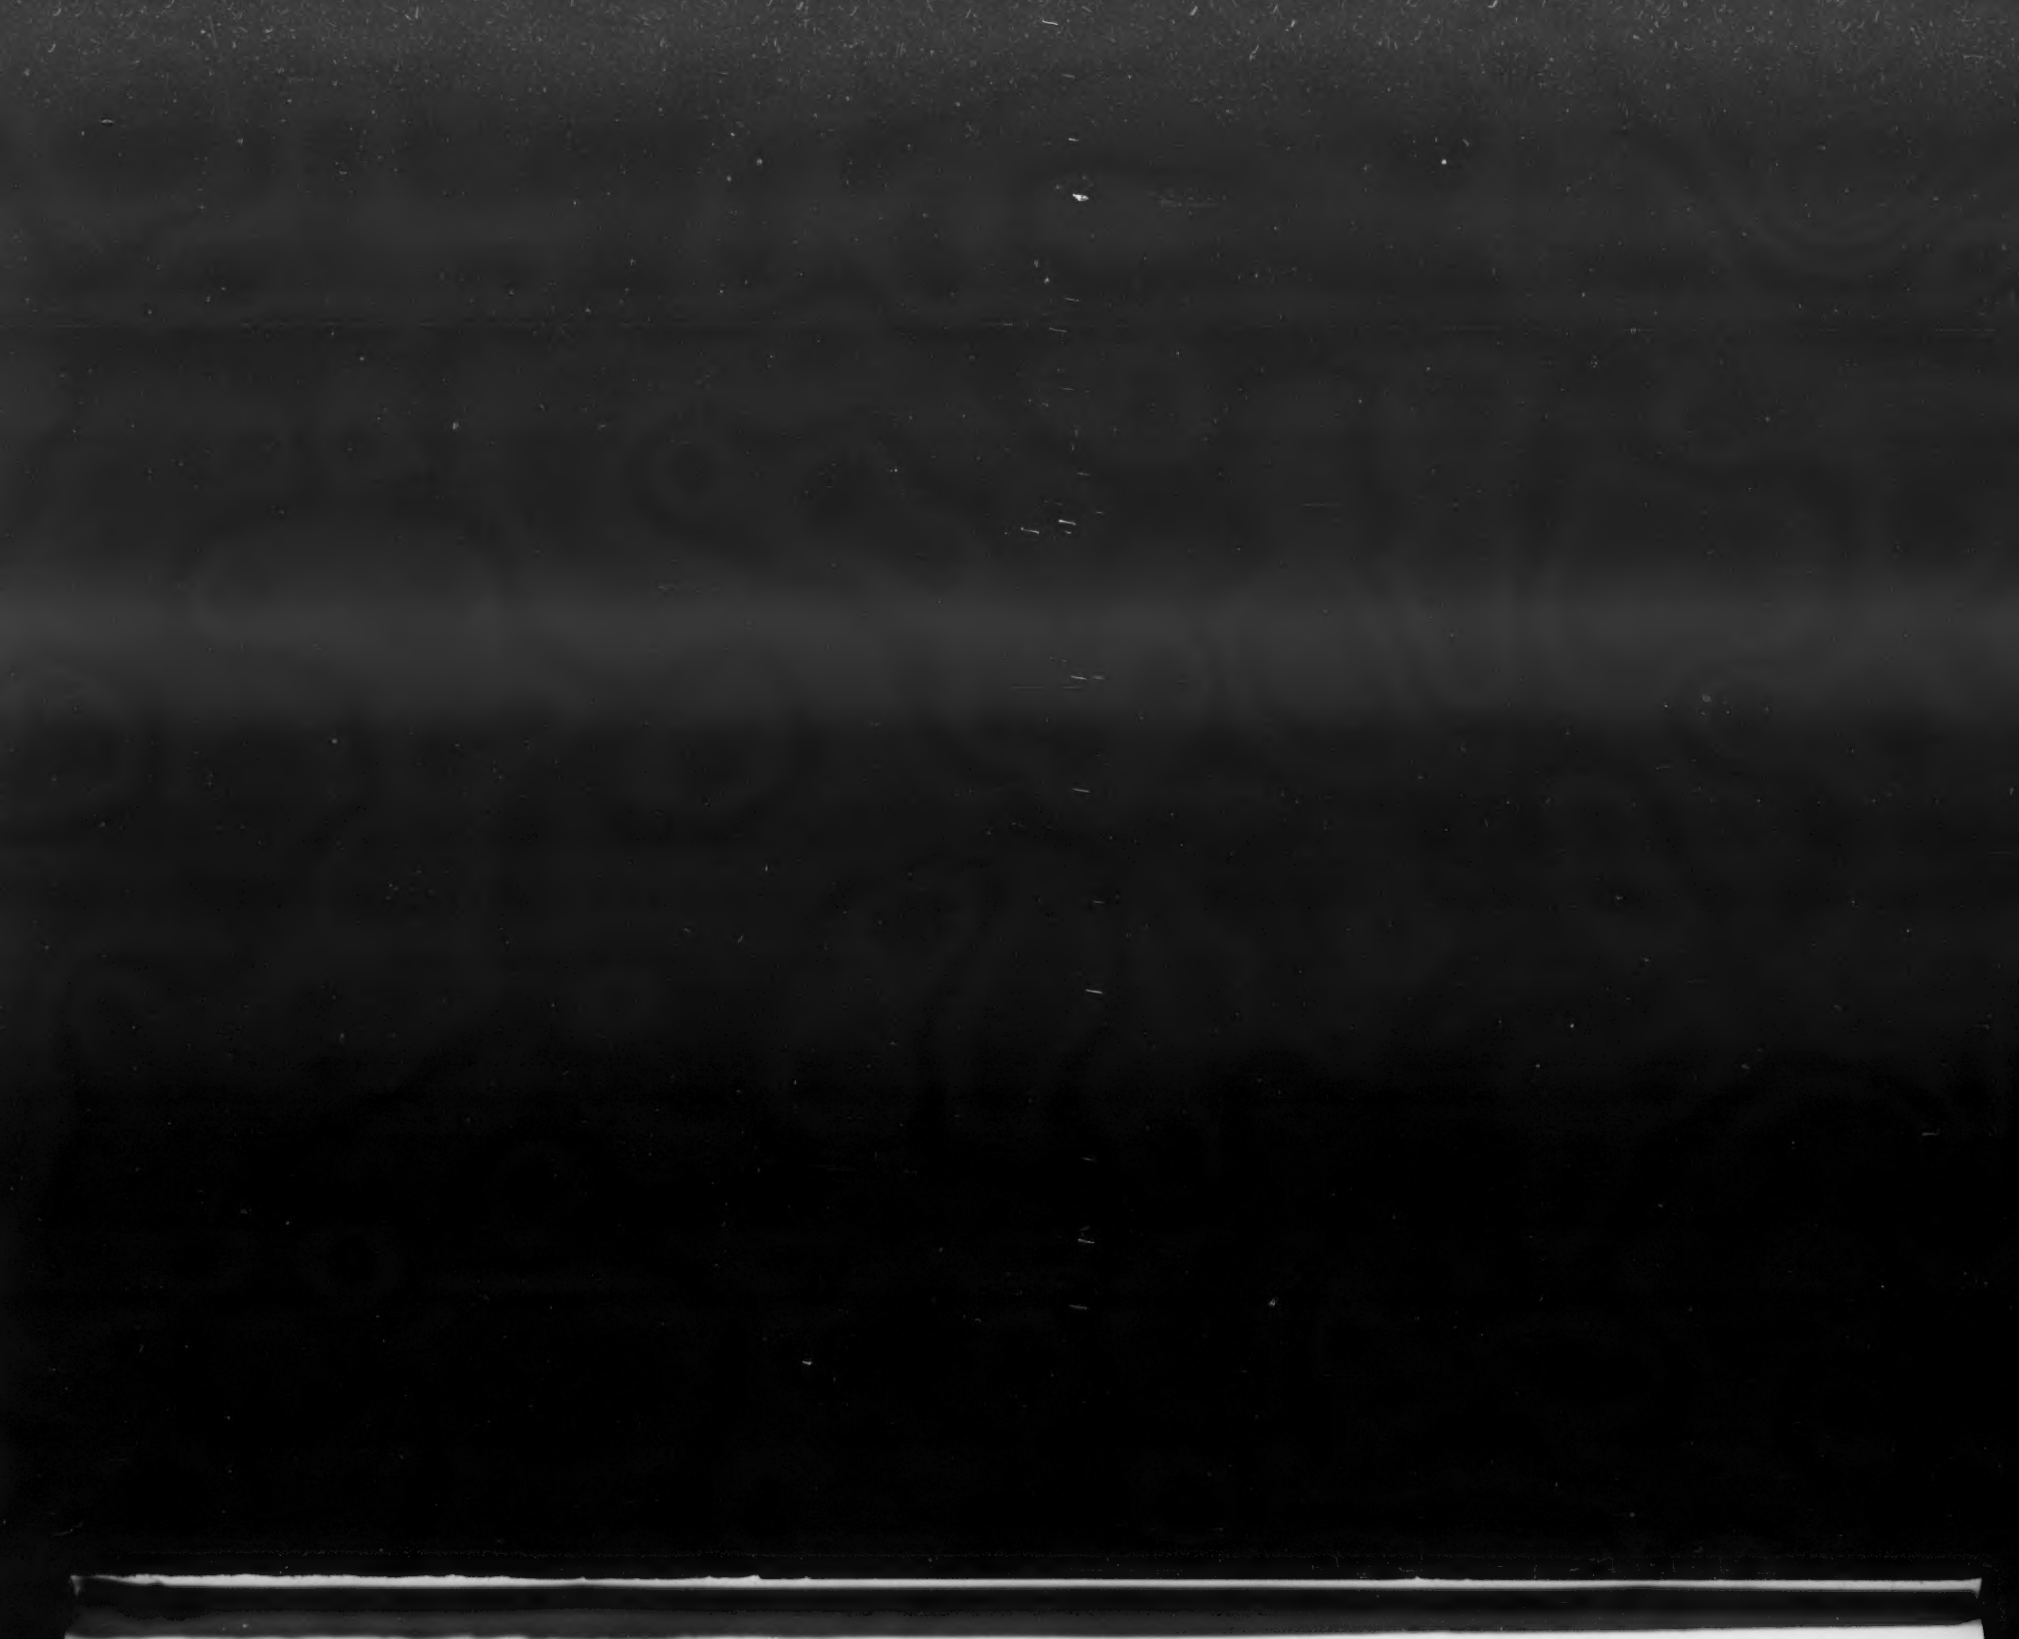
Is the New Deal worth $1,000,000,000 more debt to the American people than the Old Deal?

That's how much more debt Roosevelt has created than Hoover did.

Perhaps you have a different impression. You may, because 90 percent of the American press is closed to the truth about the New Deal and wide open to every liar in a top hat who can't understand Roosevelt and reform.

The Record proposes to present an argument you can play on your own cash register. See if you like this tune:

In the last 3 years of Hoover's administration (the businessman's administration) the net national debt increased $6,236,000,000, compared with the increase in the Roosevelt administration to date of $7,409,000,000.



In other words, Roosevelt has obligated us to $1,173,000,000 more national debt than Hoover.

Is Roosevelt worth it?

Many an intelligent American will be shocked when he examines these figures.

He has been hearing so much about "Roosevelt, the spender", "billions for boondoggling", "irresponsible waste of national credit", "burdening the future generations" that a false impression has been carefully built up in his mind.

It is time the American people went off their diet of elephant baloney.

It is time the American people stopped being guinea pigs for Republican press agents.

Roosevelt, the "spender", has increased the national debt a billion more than did Hoover, the economical.

Has it been worth it?

Marriner Eccles, Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, finds that national income has increased more than fifteen billions a year during Roosevelt's administration, as compared with Hoover's.

In a period of 30 months the national income has increased thirty-seven and one-half billions over what it would have been had the Hoover level continued.

A horse that pays 37 to 1 is a good horse on any track.

A billion is a lot of money. But remember that, divided among 125,000,000 American, it is $8 per capita.

For that billion dollar greater debt we are getting recovery under Roosevelt.

For the billion-dollar smaller debt under Hoover we were getting a one-way trip downhill.

Conditions were never so black as they were after Hoover had rung up his six-billion debt increase.

Business hasn't been as good in 5 years as it is today, after Roosevelt has run up his seven-billion debt increase.

And recall that Hoover's deficits were mounting year by year, while Roosevelt's are decreasing.

The real waster was Hoover. He wasted the Nation's manpower in idleness, its banks, its homes, its shops, its businesses, its income, to "save money." And then didn't save it.

Remember these few figures when the freewheeling Republican orators start working on you again about how Roosevelt has run you into debt.

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an opinion on the constitutionality of the National Labor Relations Act by Gregory Hankin, a well-known legal scholar of Washington, D. C.

There being no objection, the opinion was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LABOR ACT DECISION REVERSED

(AUTHOR'S NOTE.—On September 5 last the national lawyers committee of the American Liberty League staged a moot court at Washington, D. C., and rendered an opinion holding the National Labor Relations Act unconstitutional. Immediately there was great controversy over the propriety of lawyers using such rather effective means of making their views known. Much as I disagreed with the arguments set forth in the American Liberty League's opinion on the constitutionality of the labor act, I could not share in the attack on their freedom of expression. The opponents of the league have paid so much attention to the method of rendition that they completely overlooked the substance of an important controversy. After all the smoke had cleared, the fact still remained that 58 prominent lawyers have held the law unconstitutional, and their arguments have not been answered. I think that in the interest of clear legal thinking the opinion should not remain unchallenged. Since I see no impropriety in "playing court", I have set forth my views in the following opinion, having taken the more advantageous position of a reviewing "court."—G. H.)

In the matter of the National Labor Relations Act. Appeal from the Supreme Court (national lawyers committee) of the American Liberty League

This case comes before us on appeal from a declaratory judgment of the Supreme Court (national lawyers committee) of the American Liberty League, holding the National Labor Relations Act unconstitutional. Appellants, citizens directly interested in progressive legislation, assign as error the ruling of the court below that the act in question was in excess of the power of Congress, under the commerce clause of the Constitution, and that it violated the due-process clause of the fifth amendment. They also claim that the court below erred and abused its discretion in assuming jurisdiction to pass on the validity of the act.

Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act provides that employees shall have the right to self-organization; to form, join, or assist any labor organization; to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing; and to engage in concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection. Section 8 provides that it shall be an unfair labor practice for any employer to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7 or to dominate or interfere with the formation or administration of any labor organization or contribute financial or other support to it, or to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any other condition of employment, or to discharge or otherwise discriminate against an employee because he has filed charges or given testimony under the act, or to refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees.

The act creates a board (sec. 3) which is empowered (sec. 10) to prevent any person from engaging in any unfair labor practice affecting commerce, and "commerce" is defined in the act (sec. 2, par. 6) as interstate and foreign commerce. The Board is empowered to hold hearings and determine whether any employer has been guilty of any unfair labor practice as defined in the act, and, upon so finding, to issue an order directing such employer to cease and desist from engaging in any such unfair labor practice and to make amends for his transgression. The order of the Board is subject to review by the circuit court of appeals, whose judgment is made final, except that it may be reviewed by the Supreme Court on writ of certiorari or certification.

The question presented is whether this comes within the powers of the Federal Government. The court below held that, since the employment of labor and other matters dealing with employees' representation are not matters of interstate commerce but relate solely to production or manufacture, the act cannot be sustained as a regulation of interstate commerce, and must therefore be regarded as violative of the tenth amendment to the Constitution. It also held that the act invaded the rights of employers and employees, contrary to the provisions of the due-process clause of the fifth amendment.

1. Interstate commerce: At the outset we are confronted with the question whether there was an occasion for the exercise of power under the commerce clause of the Constitution. Under this provision the regulatory power of Congress extends to all matters in interstate commerce. But the power is not so limited. As an incident to regulating interstate commerce, Congress may also regulate matters which, though of a local nature, directly and substantially affect such commerce. This act does not purport to regulate matters which have no relationship to interstate commerce. In section 9 (c) of the act the Board is empowered to institute an investigation concerning representation of employment only "whenever a question affecting commerce arises", and the power of the Board, under section 10 (a) of the act, to prevent any person from engaging in any unfair labor practice is limited to practices "affecting commerce." Other provisions in the statute indicate the same limitation. These provisions must be interpreted to mean that the Congress was dealing with matters directly and substantially affecting interstate commerce rather than matters having a remote or only an incidental relation to interstate commerce (Schechter Bros. v. U. S., 55 S. Ct. 837, 295 U. S. 495).

The court below proceeded on the theory that Congress was devoid of power to enact the National Labor Relations Act, because the terms and conditions of employment deal with production or manufacture, and these do not constitute interstate commerce. We think the court erred. The Supreme Court has long recognized the extension of power under the commerce clause to matters relating to manufacture or production. The antitrust acts which were passed under the commerce clause of the Constitution have been applied to enjoin labor unions from affecting production, on the theory that they affected sales and transportation in interstate commerce (Coronado Coal Co. v. United Mine Workers, 268 U. S. 295; Bedford Cut Stone Co. v. Stone Cutters Ass'n, 274 U. S. 237).

A distinction is sought from the Coronado Coal case, and other similar cases, on the ground that there the evidence showed an intent or conspiracy to interfere with and obstruct interstate commerce. The same argument was urged upon the Supreme Court in Standard Oil Co. v. United States (283 U. S. 163). It was there contended that cross-licensing agreements for the manufacture of gasoline by the cracking process were agreements relating to manufacture and not to sale or transportation, and were therefore not within the purview of the antitrust acts. No conspiracy was involved in that case. Mr. Justice Brandeis, however, delivering the opinion of the Court, said (p. 168):

"This contention is unsound. Any agreement between competitors may be illegal if part of a larger plan to control interstate markets. * * * Moreover, while manufacture is not interstate commerce, agreements concerning it which tend to limit the supply or to fix the price of goods entering into interstate commerce, or which have been executed for that purpose, are within the prohibitions of the act."

Section 7 of the Clayton Act forbids, under certain circumstances, the acquisition of stock by corporations, where the effect may be to lessen competition or tend to create monopoly. Intent plays no part in the prohibition of acquisition, which may be a transaction entirely intrastate. The validity of this provision cannot be doubted. From this it would appear that it is not the element of intent or conspiracy in the antitrust cases that subjects intrastate activities to Federal regulation, but their actual effect upon interstate commerce.

In this view the rule of law is very simple. Congress may regulate intrastate matters as an incident to regulating interstate commerce. The difficulty lies in determining whether the regulation of intrastate matters is an incident to regulation of interstate commerce, and that depends on the question whether the intrastate matters do directly and substantially affect or burden interstate commerce. This cannot be determined by any rule of thumb but only upon a thorough consideration of the facts concerning the subject matter of the regulation.

In enacting the National Labor Relations Act Congress made the following findings of fact:

"The denial by employers of the right of employees to organize and the refusal of employers to accept the procedure of collective bargaining lead to strikes and other forms of industrial strife or unrest, which have the intent or the necessary effect of burdening or obstructing commerce by (a) impairing the efficiency, safety, or operation of the instrumentalities of commerce; (b) occurring in the current of commerce; (c) materially affecting, restraining, or controlling the flow of raw materials or manufactured or processed goods from or into the channels of commerce, or the prices of such materials or goods in commerce; or (d) causing diminution of employment and wages in such volume as substantially to impair or disrupt the market for goods flowing from or into the channels of commerce."

Upon that finding of fact Congress embarked on a policy "to eliminate the causes of certain substantial obstructions to the free flow of commerce and to mitigate and eliminate these obstructions when they have occurred by encouraging the practice and procedure of collective bargaining and by protecting the exercise by workers of full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of their own choosing for the purpose of negotiating the terms and conditions of their employment or other mutual aid or protection."

Thus we see that Congress embarked upon a method of regulating interstate commerce which is properly within its power; provided, of course, there is support in the facts found by the legislature.

The findings cannot be lightly disregarded. When the validity of a statute depends upon a factual situation, as to which there may be doubt or difference of opinion, the courts will not substitute their judgment for that of the legislature, but will consider themselves bound by the legislative finding. As Justice Sutherland said in Radice v. New York (264 U. S. 293, 294): "Where the constitutional validity of a statute depends upon the existence of facts, courts may be cautious about reaching a conclusion respecting them contrary to that reached by the legislature; and if the question of what the facts establish be a fairly debatable one, it is not permissible for the judge to set up his opinion in respect of it against the opinion of the lawmaker. The State legislature here determined that night employment of the character specified was sufficiently detrimental to the health and welfare of women engaging in it to justify its suppression; and, since we are unable to say that the finding is clearly unfounded, we are precluded from reviewing the legislative determination."

See also Stephenson v. Binford (287 U. S. 251, 272) and cases cited therein.

So settled is this rule that, even after an act was held invalid because it exceeded congressional power, and later Congress enacted another statute to accomplish substantially the same result, with a finding of fact which brought the matter within the power of Congress, the Supreme Court accepted the finding and upheld the validity of the second enactment. This happened in the case of Grain Futures Act (42 Stat. 988), whose validity was upheld in Board of Trade v. Olson (262 U. S. 1), after the Trading in Futures Act (42 Stat. 187) was held unconstitutional in Hill v. Wallace (259 U. S. 44).

Of course, should it appear that there is no foundation for the facts found by Congress in support of the legislation, the courts would not be bound thereby. But we cannot say that the findings of fact made by Congress in the National Labor Relations Act are wholly unfounded. On the contrary, they find support in the history of the labor movement in this country. On several occasions cases came to the Supreme Court in which the applicability of Federal regulation depended upon this very fact, namely, the obstruction of interstate commerce through labor troubles. See, for example, Coronado Coal Co. v. United Mine Workers, supra; Bedford Stone Co. v. Stone Cutters Ass'n, supra; International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers v. Western Union Tel. Co. (46 Fed. (2d) 736), certiorari denied (284 U. S. 630); Painters' District Council v. U. S. (284 U. S. 582), affirming United States v. Painters' District Council (44 F. (2d) 58). It is not necessary to go into detail as to how strikes, lockouts, and other labor difficulties affect sale and transportation of commodities in interstate commerce. Suffice it to say that the findings of Congress find support in facts of which we take judicial notice (Minnesota Moratorium Case, 290 U. S. 398, 443).

With these facts accepted, it must be concluded that the National Labor Relations Act is not on its face an unconstitutional exercise of legislative power, but comes within the commerce clause of the Constitution.

Great stress is laid by the court below on the fact that in many instances the relation between the object sought to be accomplished and interstate commerce is remote, indirect, and unsubstantial, and that the decisions of the National Labor Relations Board are bound to be unconstitutional. But this assumes that the National Labor Relations Board will go beyond the jurisdiction vested in it by the statute. We cannot make such an assumption. On the contrary, we must assume that the National Labor Relations Board will act within the limits of its statutory and constitutional authority. Should the record made in any case before the National Labor Relations Board fail to sustain a direct and substantial relation between the controversy therein involved and interstate commerce, then, of course, the conclusion may be reached that the Board exceeded its authority under the statute. Even if all of the orders issued by the Board should be unsupported by facts showing a substantial relation to interstate commerce, the most that could be said would be that the Board failed to exercise its functions in accordance with the direction of Congress. But that would not spell the invalidity of the act itself.

2. Due process: We now come to the question whether the law violates the provisions of the due-process clause of the fifth amendment. This clause provides: "nor shall any person * * * be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law", and the opinion below recognizes that no questions are involved pertaining to the taking of life or property. Consideration must be limited to the question whether the act deprives the employers of their liberty to conduct their business in whatever manner they please and to refuse to deal with their employees, except on such terms as they (the employers) desire, even to the extent of dominating and interfering with some labor organizations and giving aid to others, of encouraging or discouraging their employees in the matter of organization, of hiring and discharging employees for labor activities, and of favoring some and discriminating against others on that basis. The freedom of employers in dealing with their employees must undoubtedly be recognized, but this liberty, like other liberties, is not absolute. It must be exercised consistently with the rights of others. "The Constitution does not secure to anyone liberty to conduct his business in such fashion as to inflict upon the public at large or upon any substantial group of the people", said Justice Roberts in Nebbia v. New York (291 U. S. 502, 538–539).

The exercise of the liberty of employers sought to be protected in this proceeding does undoubtedly result in injury to the rights of employees. Section 7 of the act provides that "employees shall have the right of self-organization * * *." Had Congress thus created such rights in employees, as an incident to protecting the flow of interstate commerce, that would have been enough. But Congress did not even create any rights in the employees. Section 7 is declaratory of existing law. Long before the passage of the present act Chief Justice Taft, delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court, in American Foundries v. Tri-City Council (257 U. S. 184, 209), said:

"Labor unions are recognized by the Clayton Act as legal when instituted for mutual help and lawfully carrying out their legitimate objects. They have long been thus recognized by the courts. They were organized out of the necessities of the situation. A single employee was helpless in dealing with an employer. He was dependent ordinarily on his daily wage for the maintenance of himself and family. If the employer refused to pay him the wages that he thought fair, he was nevertheless unable to leave the employ and to resist arbitrary and unfair treatment. Union was essential to give laborers opportunity to deal on equality with their employer. They united to exert influence upon him and to leave him in a body in order by this inconvenience to induce him to make better terms with them. They were withholding their labor of economic value to make him pay what they thought it was worth. The right to combine for such a lawful purpose has in many years not been denied by any court."

And in Texas & New Orleans Railroad Company v. Brotherhood of Railway & Steamship Clerks (281 U. S. 548, 570), Chief Justice Hughes said:

"The legality of collective action on the part of employees in order to safeguard their proper interest is not to be disputed. It has long been recognized that employees are entitled to organize for the purpose of securing the redress of grievances and to promote agreements with employers relating to rates of pay and conditions of work."

The argument presented in Texas & New Orleans Ry. Co. v. Brotherhood of R. R. & S. S. Clerks, supra, was on all fours with the argument presented in this controversy, and in answer to the contention that the Railway Labor Act of 1926 violated the due-process clause, the Chief Justice said:

"Congress was not required to ignore this right of the employees, but could safeguard it and seek to make their appropriate collective action an instrument of peace rather than of strife. Such collective action would be a mockery if representation were made futile by interference with freedom of choice. Thus the prohibition by Congress of interference with the selection of representatives for the purpose of negotiation and conference between employers and employees, instead of being an invasion of the constitutional right of either, was based on the recognition of the rights of both" (p. 570).

It follows, therefore, that the act does not deprive the employers of their liberty without due process of law.

The court below held, however, that the act also violated the due-process clause because it deprives the employees of their liberty to deal with their employers. This argument is spurious. It is not available to the employers, since it is a settled rule of law that one may not attack the constitutionality of a statute on the ground that it invades the rights of others (Herbring v. Lee, 280 U. S. 111, 117). It is a matter of common knowledge, of which this court takes judicial notice, that the proceeding below was instituted by and on behalf of employers and not by or on behalf of employees.

Even if raised by an employee, the argument still lacks merit. There is nothing in the act which prohibits an employee from dealing with an employer. The freedom which he may have in dealing with his employer, however, falls far short of using that freedom to the injury of his fellow employees, for example, to encourage favoritism or discrimination based upon association with a labor organization. We are dealing here with a practical labor problem, not with a hypothetical situation where employees seek less favorable terms of employment but feel compensated by dealing independently with their employers.

Consideration must be given to the facts pertaining to unionization. Here again we are confronted with a finding made by Congress:

"The inequality of bargaining power between employees who do not possess full freedom of association or actual liberty of contract and employers who are organized in the corporate or other forms of ownership association substantially burdens and affects the flow of commerce and tends to aggravate recurrent business depressions by depressing wage rates and the purchasing power of wage earners in industry and by preventing the stabilization of competitive wage rates and working conditions within and between industries.

"Experience has proved that protection by law of the right of employees to organize and bargain collectively safeguards commerce from injury, impairment, or interruption, and promotes the flow of commerce by removing certain recognized sources of industrial strife and unrest by encouraging practices fundamental to the friendly adjustment of industrial disputes arising out of differences as to wages, hours, or other working conditions, and by restoring equality of bargaining power between employers and employees."

We cannot say that these findings are unfounded any more than we can say that substantially the same appraisal of facts by Chief Justice Taft, in American Foundries v. Tri-City Council, quoted above, was without foundation. Upon these facts, which are binding upon us, we must conclude that the employee's complaint that his freedom of contract is injured by this act is so unsubstantial that it does not merit consideration. This does not import a ruling that any application of the act is bound to be within the proper governmental authority. No doubt, this act, like any other act, may be administered arbitrarily or oppressively. But we have no reason to believe, and we may not assume, that this act will be so administered. If the Board will act arbitrarily in any given case, the application, and not the act itself, will be held invalid.

It is claimed, however, that, irrespective of the applications of the act, the requirements as to representation are arbitrary, unreasonable, and capricious, because the act expressly declares that representatives selected by a majority of employees in a particular bargaining unit shall be the exclusive representatives of all employees. It may well be that the majority rule is not the best system of representation. It may be that proportionate representation would be more equitable. On the other hand, it may be that the latter would give rise to further difficulties. All this goes to the wisdom of the choice of means of effectuating the right of collective bargaining. But it cannot be said that majority representation is arbitrary, unreasonable, and capricious.

For more than 150 years we have had majority representation in our political life, in corporate organizations, and in scientific, literary, social, or fraternal organizations. It is true some countries have proportionate representation in their legislatures. But it cannot be said that majority representation is so arbitrary, unreasonable, and capricious as to be contrary to our fundamental law. Beyond this inquiry we are not authorized to interfere with the policy laid down by Congress. As Mr. Justice Roberts said in Nebbia v. New York, supra (p. 537):

"If the laws passed are seen to have a reasonable relation to a proper legislative purpose and are neither arbitrary nor discriminatory, the requirements of due process are satisfied, and judicial determination to that effect renders a court functus officio."

Since the National Labor Relations Act falls within the regulatory powers of Congress under the commerce clause, and the power is not arbitrarily exercised nor so as to invade fundamental rights, the judgment of the court below must be reversed.

3. Jurisdiction: A further question arises as to what disposition should be made of this case. Appellants attacked the jurisdiction of the court below, and they contended here that the cause should be remanded with directions to dismiss for want of jurisdiction. Their argument rests on the following propositions: The court below is a self-constituted tribunal of lawyers who are bound by their oath to uphold the Constitution and laws of the United States. So long as the National Labor Relations Act has not been held invalid by a court of competent jurisdiction it is their duty to regard the law as valid and to advise obedience to it, though their own opinions may be to the contrary. We cannot agree with this contention.

As a self-constituted body, the Court below either acted in a private capacity or undertook a public duty to perform. It becomes pertinent to inquire in what capacity they acted. Since they acted merely in their private capacity, they had an unlimited constitutional right to freedom of speech and freedom of the press. The fact that their expression of opinion is inimical to the Government, or to labor, is no reason why they should be restricted in that freedom. In determining whether the freedom of speech guaranteed by the first amendment against encroachments by the Federal Government was also a right protected by the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment, Chief Justice Hughes, delivering the opinion of the Court in Stromberg v. California (283 U. S. 359, 369), said:

"The maintenance of the opportunity for free political discussion to the end that government may be responsive to the will of the people and that changes may be obtained by lawful means, an opportunity essential to the security of the Republic, is a fundamental principle of our constitutional system."

See also Near v. Minnesota (283 U. S. 697), holding unconstitutional a statute limiting the freedom of the press. In the California case, the appellant was admittedly a Communist; in the Minnesota case the appellant was described by the court as a "miscreant purveyor of scandal." Yet they were protected in their constitutional rights. We see no reason why such rights should be accorded to Communists and scandal mongers and not to the American Liberty League. This league does not claim to be a propaganda organization. It does not claim to be partisan in politics. Ever vigilant to protect the rights of the American people it has undertaken to "save" the Constitution. To that end it has enlisted the aid of prominent members of the bar to advise the people on their constitutional rights. Theirs is the freedom of expression, and hence we must sustain their jurisdiction.

While their freedom of expression is not to be disputed, however, they are limited by the duties which they have undertaken as members of the legal profession. They have given their views on the constitutionality of the National Labor Relations Act not as persons whom one meets in the market place, but as lawyers learned in the law.

The lawyers in our country act in a dual capacity—as advocates and as counselors at law. As advocates they owe entire devotion to the interests of their clients, warm zeal in the maintenance and defense of their rights and the exertion of their utmost learning and ability, to the end that nothing be taken or be withheld from their clients, save by rules of law legally applied (Canon 15 of Professional Ethics). When appearing before a court, the advocate may urge any and every remedy, argument, or defense that is authorized by law. He may resolve every doubtful question of law in favor of his client, even if his own inclination is to favor a different conclusion. If the court below appeared as advocates in this matter, nothing further could be said by us, except to adopt or reject their arguments.

In rendering their opinion on the constitutionality of the National Labor Relations Act, however, they did not act as advocates. They must then have acted in their capacity as counselors. The duty of a counselor is "to give a candid opinion of the merits and probable result of pending or contemplated litigation" (Canon 8 of Professional Ethics). His duty is to advise what the law actually is. The fact that in this case the court below undertook to advise not their individual clients but the people at large does not relieve them of, but rather accentuates, their duty of careful investigation and analysis of the state of the law.

Have they so acted in this case? Where a question is raised concerning the validity of a statute which has not been passed on by a court of competent jurisdiction, the test for determining the rule of constitutional law is not what arguments the lawyer can raise for or against the law. He must assume a judicial attitude and decide upon the matter in view of the recognized principles of law as applied to the facts. He must bear in mind also the limitations which the judiciary has imposed upon itself in passing on the validity of legislation, including the following salutary rules: (1) All doubts must be resolved in favor of the validity of legislation; (2) where the validity of a statute depends upon a factual situation, the courts must assume the existence of facts which would sustain the validity, in the absence of a showing in the record that such facts do not exist; (3) if possible, a statute must be so interpreted as to avoid holding it invalid; (4) only in extreme instances will a statute be held invalid on its face; (5) where the proper application of a statute depends on a factual situation, the application and not the statute itself may be held invalid; and (6) a ruling on the constitutional questions must be avoided if the controversy can be disposed of on some other ground.

It does not appear that the court below has given due consideration to all these rules nor to the facts pertaining to the regulations sought to be accomplished by the National Labor Relations Act. We think they should have an opportunity to do so. In reversing the judgment, therefore, we remand the cause for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

THE CONSTITUTION AND THE COURTS—ADDRESS BY SENATOR THOMAS OF UTAH

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] at the Cosmos Club, Washington, D. C., January 13, 1936, on the subject of the Constitution and the Courts.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

While doing some reading in the Jackson period in preparation for a Jackson Day talk, I ran across a poem written by Associate Justice Story in Jackson's time. In honor of a famous actress, the justice wilted with a poem that contained this line: "And warms and wins and thrills and melts the heart." Ten minutes after reading the poem I read the opinions on the Triple A case.

Judging from the spirit of these opinions, the justices of 1935 are at least different from those of a century ago. While Story may have melted at the art of a beautiful lady, his poetry did not move me one whit. I did, though, warm at the majority opinion.

I am not a constitutional lawyer; in fact, I am not a lawyer. I judge governmental change only from observation. The following are the reactions of a layman.

We have gone back. The late decisions of the Supreme and inferior courts invite our people to a consideration of the question as to whether the theory of judicial review is a mistake or not.

Personally, I do not think it is a mistake, but I do believe the judiciary must carry on within proper bounds quite as much as the legislative or the Executive. We have actually gotten to the place where today we hear on the street the expression: "Congress has passed the law, but as yet it has not passed the Supreme Court."

Whenever our Supreme Court considers itself the third branch of our Legislature, it would destroy the whole fabric of our constitutional scheme. The judiciary cannot enter the realm of the legislative without ultimately destroying the scheme of the American Government.

I am loath in using the word "unconstitutional", but I stand squarely against that which would destroy the spirit of our Constitution. Our Government hangs on a simple thread of respect for given spheres. These boundaries in form are not definite. In spirit they stand out so that even a child may recognize them.

The Executive by an abuse of the veto power or by an abuse of the power of recommendation can mar the constitutional spirit.

The legislative by a spiteful action of failing to provide for either the Executive or the judiciary may make government come to an end.

The courts by usurping and striking down established institutions of the people may mar the harmony that makes us a nation.

Now, in the very nature of things the power of the Court is not such as to actually destroy or to take the Nation back to where it was. The elements of time and circumstance make that impossible, but it can introduce uncertainty into the life of the Nation to such an extent that the forward-moving habits of the people may be curtailed and made chaotic. For example, historians glibly write that the Dred Scott decision destroyed the Missouri compromise. Nothing that was set up was destroyed, but habits of thought and manners of action were so changed that they made an avoidable war into a certainty. States were actually admitted into the Union as a result of the Missouri compromise. That part of the compromise, of course, was not affected. Decisions do not destroy, they merely retard the growth of the Nation. No court of nine men, no congress of half a thousand, and no president with a quarter million assistants can stay the march of a hundred and a quarter million people. Our constitutional history proves that.

If you must have a definite text, the eleventh, sixteenth, and eighteenth amendments were the people's answers to the Court. The first 10 amendments were the people's additions to a Convention's suggestions. The twelfth is the people's answer to a bungling Congress. The thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments show the people's determination to preserve de jure a de facto accomplishment. The seventeenth was the people's answer to corruption in legislative halls. The nineteenth was the people's answer to an enlarged social and political activity of half our population. The twentieth was the people's demand that its Government react more quickly to an expression of the people's will. The twenty-first amendment shows that even the people can repent—that is not an unhealthful sign.

Some think the people should speak again. I do not. We must bring the spirit of the sixth article of our Constitution into the fore to save our Federal system from the dilemma of an extreme swing toward the limitations put upon the States by the fourteenth amendment and the deadening ultimate of the theory of the delegation of power as expressed in the tenth amendment.

Some have been quoted as saying that the Constitution needs no amendment. To repeat, I agree with that. I think an understanding interpretation will still permit the legislative and executive branches to function. The trouble with that is that the present Court does not agree. The Senator has had experience with discriminating headline writers of newspapers as now controlled. He is also aware of practical impossibility of Constitution amending. The proposer of an amendment would be heralded as a monster. The gentlest proponent imaginable would be greeted by three-fourths of the headlines of the Nation's papers as "Wants to Smash the Constitution." However, it can hardly be denied that the latest decisions have returned us to the stage before the Civil War to the effect that the United States of America is a soverign on all waters affected by the tides and thence seaward.

It would seem that it is just as unconstitutional for a citizen to progress from Baltimore to Philadelphia in less time than 2 or 4 days as to hold that interstate commerce must be defined as it was understood in 1790.

There is little use in joining the ordinary conversational chorus about the Supreme Court, in which words and phrases come trippingly from the tongue. Constitutional, unconstitutional, interstate commerce, delegation of powers, due process of law, and so on, and so on, are heard on all sides. The users of these words repeat something that makes sound and most likely have no particular meaning in mind, or at least they forget that each phrase has as many commentaries upon its meaning as any phrase taken from the Bible. However, since the adoption of the Constitution the interpretation of it has produced a picture of the Government which it sets up. This picture has been very definite and distinct.

At the death of John Marshall the United States of America stood as a sovereign, and within its jurisdiction would tolerate no interference from the States. For 20 years after the adoption of the fourteenth amendment the Court, under the leadership of "the Big Four" opinions by Bradley, Miller, or Field, more sharply painted this picture and set up the United States of America as a sovereign, with the right to exclusive exertion of its powers.

This picture has been painted by the use of millions of words, and through these words have run continuously certain sentences which have become maxims by reason of unanimous acceptance. Such a sentence is this: This Court has no business or concern with the expediency of legislation. The only question to answer is, has Congress the power under the Constitution to enact this.

At this late date we find the Court under the leadership of the "little four." During this, what has been aptly termed the "supererogation term", October 1935, we find our distinct picture has become blurred. The labor and efforts of John Marshall have been cast aside by the very disciples who by word have worshiped him most fervently and zealously. The big four are forgotten, and the great maxim, honored and extolled for 125 years, has been swept away by the little four. In effect they say: This legislation we think is unwise and not in the national interest. The executive branch may have recommended it. The legislative branch has enacted it into law. The legal committee of the so-called American Liberty League has rendered its judgment that the legislation is unsound and illegal, and the judiciary branch has concurred and declared that the executive and legislative branches have no sound judgment about what is national interest.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9870) to provide for the immediate payment of World War adjusted-service certificates, for the cancelation of unpaid interest accrued on loans secured by such certificates, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair had an understanding that he would recognize the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] in connection with an arrangement with the Senator from Mississippi and by unanimous consent; but the Chair does not see the Senator from Missouri present.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I had the floor when the Senate adjourned last night. I have no objection, however, to the course suggested.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not see the Senator from Missouri present, so he recognizes the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, when the Senate recessed last evening I had just offered an amendment to the pending bill. The amendment was not read, but it has been twice printed in the RECORD, so I take it for granted that the amendment is now pending before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma is the pending question in connection with the consideration of the so-called "bonus" bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Am I correct in my assumption that at 2 o'clock the unanimous-consent agreement comes into force, and after that time no Senator may speak longer than 15 minutes on an amendment or more than once or longer than 30 minutes on the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has the terms of the agreement reversed. A Senator may speak no longer than 15 minutes on the bill, but he may speak 30 minutes on an amendment, as the Chair understands the agreement.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. And that agreement comes into force at 2 o'clock this day?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma is correct.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I shall occupy just as little time as possible, but I wish to place in the RECORD a few additional facts, so that the RECORD will show, at least, that the Senate had a chance to know what it is voting on when the vote comes upon the pending amendment.

Mr. President, it must be admitted that this bill provides for at least three separate and distinct bond issues. If anyone disputes that statement, I now yield or pause for contradiction. A bond issue, first, to the soldiers in the sum of $2,237,000,000; a bond issue, second, issued by the Treasury, to be sold to the public in order to raise the money to cash the bonds to be issued to the soldiers. That will take approximately $2,000,000,000 more. A bond issue, third, in the sum of $507,000,000, to be issued at 4½-percent interest, to be placed with the Government life-insurance fund. So there are at least three separate and distinct bond issues that must be issued and disposed of if this bill shall be passed in its present form.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Unfortunately, I was not present yesterday, and did not hear the Senator's remarks then delivered. I wish to ask him about the third bond issue to which he refers and which he says is going to bear 4½-percent interest.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. What was the third?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Apparently the life-insurance fund has been drawn on to cash some of the certificates or to furnish money to make loans on some of the certificates. These certificates have been filed with the life-insurance fund, and apparently the fund holds about $507,000,000 of those certificates, so we must protect the fund.

Mr. NORRIS. What is the object in making that fund draw 4½ percent?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] yesterday explained it in this way: In order for the fund to be kept at par, these bonds must draw 4½ percent, otherwise there will be a deficiency which would have to be made up by direct appropriation. If that is not correct, I shall be glad to yield to have a correction made.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, in order merely to clarify the situation, let me state that some time ago, when the old war-risk policies were issued, this fund was created by law. Anyone holding any of the old war-risk insurance policies could obtain another kind of policy, a 20-payment life or what not. The fund is held by the men who have paid the premiums from that time until now. The fund is being held by the Government in a fiduciary relationship, in other words. I should like to make just a brief statement with reference to this phase of it.

Bonds were authorized to be issued to the United States Government life-insurance fund to be exchanged for the notes secured by adjusted-service certificates held by this fund. Those were the notes that were put up and the certificates are held as security for them.

A special fund was authorized because of the peculiar circumstances obtaining. The original act provided for loans to be made on the certificates only by authorized banks and trust companies. That was some years ago, as the Senator will recall.

It was found, however, when the certificates attained a loan value, that many banks were reluctant to make loans so that the law was amended March 3, 1927, to permit loans to be made out of the United States Government life-insurance fund. That fund is owned by the ex-service men themselves.

This fund is a trust administered by the Government, but the beneficial interest lies with the holders of United States Government life-insurance policies. Since it was for the convenience of the Government that these loans were made, it would appear only fair that the Government protect the fund, as the relationship between the Government and the fund is that of a fiduciary to a trust. The rate of interest was fixed at 4½ percent because this is the same interest rate which is now being paid to the Government life-insurance fund on the holdings which are to be exchanged.

That explains why there is a charge of 4½-percent interest on the bonds.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to enable me to submit an inquiry to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. As I understand, the bill places no additional burden on the Government, but simply preserves the status quo?

Mr. HARRISON. That is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. It simply carries forward the arrangement already existing?

Mr. HARRISON. The Government agreed to pay into this fund interest at the rate of 4½ percent. That is the rate paid to the men who owned the old war-risk insurance policies, but which were transferred and exchanged for a different kind of policy. I think it was in 1931 that the rate was made 3½ percent. However, that did not change or affect the rate so far as the fund was concerned. We would have had to make up the difference between 3½-percent interest the veterans have had to pay since that time when we passed the law and the 4½-percent rate which the Government agreed to pay. The Government has been doing that all the time. This changes nothing in the world. It substitutes these bonds for the present securities now in the fund.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Oklahoma another question?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator referred to other kinds of bonds.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand, however, the bonds issued by the Secretary of the Treasury and sold to the public would not be issued except to pay the bonds which have been issued to the veterans.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. While it looks as though we are issuing two kinds of bonds, yet as a matter of fact one bond is issued and the other is canceled.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is correct. My statement was that the bill provided for three separate and distinct bond issues. The first issue is in the sum of $2,237,000,000. It takes that sum in bonds to be delivered into the hands of the veterans in the first instance. They will receive on an average $650 apiece. That means there will be 13 bonds, in denominations of $50, to go to each veteran. Some of the veterans will desire to cash their bonds immediately. I think it is safe to estimate that approximately $1,500,000,000 of the bonds will be canceled forthwith just as soon as the veterans holding the bonds can find a place where they can get the money for the bonds.

It is true that from the $2,237,000,000 the $507,000,000 going to the life-insurance fund will be deducted, so that in the last analysis there will be about $507,000,000 in bonds in the life-insurance fund, and there will be almost $1,800,000,000 in other bonds which will go direct to the veterans.

These two bond issues make up the total sum of $2,237,000,000, but before any veteran can get any money on the bonds we must first make an appropriation. I shall offer an amendment to that effect at the proper time. Before any veteran can get his money an appropriation must be made by the Congress. That would give the Treasury authority to raise the money. The Treasury Department would be authorized to raise approximately $2,000,000,000 on bonds to cash the bonds held by the veterans. The most conservative estimate I have seen is $1,500,000,000. On the basis of that estimate the Treasury would have to issue $1,500,000,000 of bonds to raise $1,500,000,000 of money to cash the bonds.

At this time let me call attention to the situation as it presents itself to the Government today. If Senators have a piece of paper and pencil and are interested, I hope they will write down the figures as I give them. My additions may not be very accurate, and I do not have access to an adding machine.

Bond issue no. 1 to the veterans will be $2,237,000,000.

Bond issue no. 2: According to the report, some $1,800,000,000 must issue to get the money to cash bond issue no. 1. Nevertheless there will be approximately $1,800,000,000 of bonds which must be printed and issued and disposed of.

A recent Budget estimate, or, rather, the newspaper reports of a more recent estimate, show that we will have to raise this year for relief purposes the sum of $2,316,000,000. If so, it must be raised through the medium of a bond issue. If the Congress desires to make good its promise to the farmers, growing out of the imposition of the processing taxes, we will have to raise approximately $1,000,000,000 through bond issues to make good those promises, so there is possibly an additional $1,000,000,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think the Senator is slightly in error. The actual amount of money which will be required to fulfill our contract with the farmers is something like $265,000,000, but if the Court should hold that we have to refund to the processing taxpayers the money we have collected and which has gone into the Treasury, it would amount to $1,000,000,000.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The Senator is correct. There is so much of this detail that it takes too much time to explain every angle of it, so if I make a mistake and any Senator wishes to correct me, I shall be glad to yield for that purpose.

So there is a possibility that we may have to raise a billion dollars to make good an implied promise to the farmers of the country. There is a possible billion dollars more.

Already this year we are $2,000,000,000 behind in our running expenses. There is a deficit which at the end of this year it is estimated will amount to a billion and a half, for which bonds must be issued.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator is not quite correct there. The estimated deficit, the new money to be raised during the rest of this fiscal year, which ends on June 30, is $500,000,000. The amount estimated to be necessary for next year is about a billion dollars; so that for the next 17½ months the two amounts would total about a billion and a half dollars of new money, which it would be necessary to raise either by taxation or by bond issues.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I gave the figures, but I did not go into detail. The Senator from Kentucky is correct; but we can see right under our eyes the necessity for raising a billion and a half dollars.

Then, Mr. President, we must refund this year and raise through bonds, either through exchange or sale and payment, the sum of $5,800,000,000 to take care of maturing outstanding obligations.

If we add those figures, we shall find that we may have to issue bonds in the total sum of approximately $15,000,000,000.

Where are we going to get the money to pay those bonds? In the first place, where are we going to sell those bonds?

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. Does the Senator think it is quite fair to regard the bonds issued to pay the soldiers as one item and the bonds issued by the Treasury to retire those bonds as a separate item and add them together?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I took it for granted that the Senator from Delaware would understand my reasoning.

Mr. HASTINGS. But does not that make the total $13,000,000,000 instead of $15,000,000,000?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I will concede that the Senator is correct and that the total is $13,000,000,000. I said we should have to print and dispose of, either through placement or otherwise, bonds in the total sum of approximately $15,000,000,000. To pay the soldiers will take two bond issues. The bonds will have to be printed and placed, and, of course, the ones that come back will be cashed, and those bonds will be retired; but my statement was made for the purpose of leading up to another statement very shortly, and that is, getting down to printing presses. I do not know what we are going to do for printers and printing presses and ink and paper with which, and on which, to print the bonds.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have not been able to estimate the difference in the number of men who would be required to print bonds and the number of men who would be required to print printing-press money in order to pay the soldiers' bonus; but I do not care to go into that subject.

The Senator's figures assume that every soldier who holds a certificate will immediately accept the bonds and immediately cash them in order to reach the total of $2,200,000,000 stated by the Senator, or whatever the exact figure is. Does the Senator think that is really a fair assumption, in view of the fact that half a million soldiers have never even borrowed any money on their certificates? Does the Senator think all these soldiers are going to rush in at once and demand payment, so that it will require over $2,000,000,000 to pay them in cash?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. If they are as wise as I think they are, they will. I will give the Senator my reasons for that statement.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know about that; but those who represent the ex-service men estimate that not only the 500,000 who have never borrowed any money on their certificates will hold them but that at least 250,000 of those who have borrowed money on their certificates will likewise hold, either in full or partially, the bonds which they will receive from the Government.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I hope the Senator from Kentucky is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. In that event, if that should happen, it is very likely that less than a billion and a half dollars would actually be required to satisfy those who need or want their money at once.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I have placed in the RECORD enough to enable anyone who wishes to investigate to get the facts and draw his own conclusions.

We heard it said yesterday that if we should print some money, that would start the printing presses to work. I have heard that said before. It has been stated on the floor of the Senate on former occasions that if we should print a little money we would put the printing presses to work. This bill will put the printing presses to work immediately in printing 45,000,000 separate, distinct bonds—not $45,000,000 in bonds but 45,000,000 pieces of paper, probably printed in green on one side and printed in yellow on the other side.

There are 3,518,191 soldiers. The average amount due each of those soldiers is $650. That means thirteen $50 bonds to each soldier. Multiply the number of soldiers by thirteen, and we get 45,000,000 bonds. That is printing-press order no. 1.

Then printing-press order no. 2 is for whatever bonds it will take to be issued and sold to raise the money to cash the bonds issued under printing-press order no. 1, at least approximately a billion and a half dollars of bonds.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. When the Liberty bonds were printed there were attached to them coupons representing interest which were detached when the interest was collected. Of course, I do not know what design of bond will be printed by the Government, whether it will be green on one side and yellow on the other side or not. I do not think the color scheme is very important.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I think they should be printed in red on both sides. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARKLEY. But the printing of money would require a color scheme also. It might be green on one side and brown on the other. The point I am trying to make, however, is that it would be possible for the Treasury to print these bonds in one sheet containing the entire number of bonds of $50 denomination each, so that if any ex-service man desired to cash one $50 bond or two $50 bonds, they might be detached. So it would not be necessary to print each $50 bond as a separate piece of paper, but they might all be printed together, representing the total amount due a soldier, so as to make it unnecessary to engage in printing each one individually.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is entirely possible, Mr. President. They could be printed in the form of $50 postage stamps—a small sheet perforated. That could be done. As to how, that is not material.

I am trying to suggest to the Senate that the printing presses must be enlarged first to print the bonds to pay the bonus—three issues of bonds; then to pay the other bonds that must be printed and issued this year—bonds in the sum of $1,500,000,000 to be sold to take care of the deficit in the next 17 months; new bonds in the sum of $5,800,000,000 to refund outstanding bonds or to be sold to raise money to retire outstanding bonds; then perhaps a billion dollars in bonds to be issued to take care of the deficit because of the abolition of the processing tax.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Assuming that we should pay the soldiers in money represented by what has popularly become known as printing-press money, and that that money should be printed in denominations of $5 or $10 or $20—but let us take $10 as a fair average—has the Senator figured how many separate pieces of printed matter would be required to turn out that much money in order to pay $2,400,000,000?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I have not figured that; but it would be a very nice sum, and I think the money would look very well to the people of the United States.

Mr. BARKLEY. It would take four or five times as many separate pieces of obligation on the part of the Government of the United States to print that money as to print these bonds.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The figures are easily ascertained. The Senator is correct. It would require several times as many pieces of paper in the form of money as it would require in the form of bonds. However, let me now call the attention of the Senate to the number of pieces of paper it will take just to pay this soldier bond issue.

First, application blanks will go out to the soldiers for them to fill in their names and residences, the companies in which they served; then the amount of their certificates, the number of their certificates, and what became of such certificates. It will take 3,581,191 of such blanks to supply one to each soldier. That is order no. 1 to the printing presses.

Order no. 2 to the printing presses is for 45,000,000 of the so-called "baby" bonds.

Then when the soldier fills out his blank and sends it in to the Government I presume he will be furnished with an envelope for it. That will take 3,581,691 envelopes. I presume these envelopes will either have to be stamped or franked. If they have to be stamped, the soldier will have to pay 3 cents for a stamp to send in his application. Of course, that is going to make a demand for stamps, and the printing presses will have to print those stamps.

Then, when the applications are received it will take a flood of employees to handle the applications, open the envelopes, and check them against the records. I think it will take something like 2,000 additional employees to receive the application blanks and check them against the records.

Then after the applications have been checked against the records and found to be correct—or, if they are not correct, there will have to be more correspondence and more paper, more blanks, more envelopes, and more stamps—if the application is found to be proper, the Government will fill out these bonds in the name of the applicant for so many dollars and mail those bonds to the place where the bonds are to be delivered, probably through some post office, or probably through some bank. Then there will again arise a need for envelopes and stamps.

Mr. President, that is only a small part of the stationery order. In order to complete this transaction there must be a multitude of blanks, a multitude of envelopes, a multitude of bonds, and a multitude of stamps. I have figured out conservatively that to carry out the detail of this bonus-payment proposal will necessitate the printing of over 100,000,000 pieces of paper. Then when we add to that the other $13,000,000,000 of bonds that we probably shall have to print and sell or dispose of this year, I find that this bill ceases to be a bonus bill and becomes a relief bill.

In order to get the paper we must go to the forests and employ lumbermen to cut down the pulp trees. That is going to give jobs to unemployed lumbermen.

After the pulp trees are fallen and cut in proper lengths for the pulp mill we must have truck drivers to come along and take the logs to the pulp factory, and that will make a demand for unemployed truck drivers.

After the pulp mill gets the wood it must process it, and that will provide employment for unemployed pulp-mill employees. After the pulp is manufactured into paper it must be transported to the Printing Office. That produces another demand for more truck drivers, it creates a demand for railroad service, and results in employment for unemployed railroad men. As many of the railroads are in the hands of receivers, it may help bring some of the railroads out of receiverships. After the paper has been sent to the Printing Office then there will be a big demand for printing, and that will give employment to unemployed printers. So, if we follow this through from beginning to end, we see the printing presses running overtime to permit this bill to be placed in operation.

I can see in the bill the printing of perhaps 150,000,000 pieces of paper, envelopes, bonds, letterheads, blanks of every kind and character; it is going to be a great relief bill. But, fellow Senators, think of the cost of all these multifarious processes through which we are going to get a little money to the soldiers 18 years after the war. That is all unnecessary, wholly unnecessary.

The time will come when we will have to meet this issue. It has been postponed from year to year. It has been met only in part as yet. It must be met and when it is met there will be a substantially cheaper dollar in circulation than the one in circulation today. The people of the United States cannot afford to be forced to give up $1.24 worth of their property or their services in order to get a dollar to pay this enormous debt which is being heaped upon the shoulders of the people of the United States. No other nation has solved its problem in such a way. Every other nation that has come out of its depression has followed a simple course, and that course has been a substantial cheapening of the monetary unit, raising the prices of commodities so that the people of the country could handle more money.

It is an axiom that the deeper an individual gets into debt, or the more property such individual has to manage, the more money such individual has to handle in order to pay his debts and to protect his property. The farm hand does not have to handle very much money. He gets $20 a month, perhaps, and his board and lodging. Twenty dollars a month to him, perhaps, is a large sum of money. But later, when the farm hand buys a farm, and perhaps puts a mortgage on the farm, and buys some horses and mules and implements, and develops a family, it takes more than $20 a month for that man to live, and as he increases his activities the more money he has to have in order to live and survive. So the deeper the people get into debt, the deeper the Nation, the States, the counties, the cities, get into debt, the more money they have to have if they are to meet their indebtedness. That is obvious; it is axiomatic.

Yet we proceed here, keeping the dollar up to the high buying power of $1.24, above that of the Coolidge dollar of 1926. In 1926, measured by the best measuring device we have—that is, the Bureau of Labor Statistics—the dollar had a buying power of 100 cents, measured in wholesale and farm commodities. By 1933, because of the scarcity of money and the scarcity of the credit, the dollar had risen to a value of 167 cents, and this administration started in 1933 to reduce the value of the dollar. Through devaluation of the gold content of the dollar and a wider use of silver, we have taken from the value of the dollar the difference between 124 cents and 167 cents. In other words, we reduced the value of the dollar 43 cents. There are still 24 cents of value in the dollar which must come out.

Here we are trying to go along and pay the existing debts, with a 124-cent dollar, and every man who produces either goods or services must give up of his services or goods 124 cents in order to pay $1 of indebtedness. To pay $1 of his bills, or of anything he owes, he must part with 124 cents in value of commodities or of services.

We may think we will succeed. A former administration thought it could succeed. It failed; and where is that former administration today? Just look across the aisle to my right, and you may see the remnants of the faithful. [Laughter.] Many on my right have supported the program which I am proposing here this afternoon, the program which, if not adopted today, must inevitably be adopted at some future date.

I did not try to save the last administration. However, I did my best to save the people under such administration; and had the money question been settled by Mr. Hoover, he would today be in the White House, the majority would be on the other side, and our side would perhaps represent the minority.

Mr. President, unless we still further raise commodity prices, this administration may go the same route the former administration went.

My fellow Senators, why is the Townsend old-age-pension plan sweeping the Nation like a prairie fire? From north to south, from east to west, the Townsend plan is sweeping the Nation. It has swept the northeastern conservative States. My State is on fire, and the condition in which my State finds itself, other States will soon duplicate. What is the reason for this conflagration? I can tell the Senate the reason. Many elderly people cannot support themselves; and for support they have fallen back upon their children, and the children being unable to support themselves, find it impossible to support their parents; and as a result the elderly people are for the Townsend old-age-pension plan, because they see relief in it; and many youngsters are for the Townsend old-age-pension plan, because they are hoping that they can transfer the support of their parents from themselves to the Federal Government.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. In other words, neither the old nor the young being able to support themselves, they want the Government to do it, although the Government has to rely upon them to support it?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Yes, Mr. President, that is correct; but the Government, under every mandate of public conscience, should support the people by giving them a chance to support themselves; and unless the Government provides money for the people with which to operate—and money is the mechanics of operation—the people cannot support themselves. It is impossible, utterly so, and the program has driven one administration from power, and unless the general price level of the country shall be raised between now and November I fear for the ides of November.

I am trying to increase the general price level. I am trying to do that through the well-known process of cheapening the dollar. Put a few more dollars into circulation, make money a little more plentiful, and as money becomes more plentiful, it becomes cheaper, and as it becomes cheaper, prices rise. No one anywhere can dispute this economic law.

There is no use raising taxes any higher. People cannot pay more taxes. They cannot pay the taxes already assessed on them. So I am trying by this amendment to take advantage of this occasion to put a little additional money into circulation, to raise the general price level, so that we can get prices up to such a point that people will commence making money, we can balance the Budget, and the banks will start making loans again.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. I have heard a good deal about fiat money—printing-press money. The contention is made that we must have a sound dollar, whatever that means. I desire to ask the Senator from Oklahoma a question. How much paper money have we in circulation today?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. We have $5,722,000,000 now in circulation.

Mr. SMITH. Can the Senator tell me how much of that aggregate is redeemable in silver?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I can. I have here a statement of January 10, 1936. That is now about a week old. At that time we had outstanding $1,005,000,000 of silver certificates.

Mr. SMITH. Leaving, then, approximately $4,000,000,000 of currency not based on silver?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I desire to modify those figures, because I find on my desk a later statement, of date January 15. On January 15 the United States Treasury statement shows that we had outstanding silver certificates in the sum of $1,009,000,000.

Mr. SMITH. There remains, then, in circulation something over $4,000,000,000 not redeemable in silver?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is correct.

Mr. SMITH. What is it based on? One cannot have a gold certificate. If one has in his possession a gold certificate, he has violated the law.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, this statement shows that we have in circulation $1,009,000,000 in silver certificates. I will analyze the statement. Back of those certificates we have some 509,000,000 of silver dollars in the Treasury, so there is $509,000,000 of the certificates which are backed by actual coined silver dollars in the Treasury. The balance of the certificates in circulation is backed by bullion in the Treasury. We have bought approximately 1,000,000,000 ounces of silver under the silver program. According to my figures and estimates, we have bought 1,065,000,000 ounces of silver to date, and the way I arrive at those figures is the following: We have paid for silver the sum of $608,000,000. We have issued certificates against the silver for the purchase price—$608,000,000. But this silver was bought for a price of about 57 cents an ounce. The monetary value is $1.29 an ounce. That means that an ounce of silver will coin one silver dollar and we will have 29 cents of silver left, based on its monetary value. So if we should issue silver certificates on the silver bullion to its full monetary value, we could put in circulation, not the $1,009,000,000, but we could put in circulation $1,645,000,000. That means that we could increase the circulation against our surplus silver bullion to the extent of approximately $636,000,000. My amendment provides that the Treasury shall have that power if they desire to have the power. It does not force them to do it; it does not direct them to do it; but it gives the United States Treasury the power to issue certificates against that difference in the monetary value of the silver and the price we paid for the silver.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Does not the Treasury have that power now?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The United States Treasury has the power, but it does not choose to exercise such power.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I asked the Senator a question which he did not fully answer.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I failed to answer the second part of the Senator's question.

Mr. SMITH. I desired to know what the other $4,000,000,000 was based on. We cannot use the gold, because we have passed an act providing that no gold certificates shall be in circulation.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I do not have the data before me. I shall have to get it from memory. We have in circulation today $346,000,000 of Treasury notes. They are the remnants of the Lincoln greenbacks. They were issued in Lincoln's day and they served the purposes of financing the Government in the conflict between the States. Those notes were so good that they have been kept in circulation all these years. When one is worn out it is immediately sent in and a new one is put out in its place. So today we have in circulation some $346,000,000 of the Lincoln greenbacks.

However, Mr. President, behind those greenbacks we have in the Treasury a redemption fund of $156,000,000 in gold set aside to redeem the amount of outstanding Lincoln greenbacks which, according to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], amounts to $346,000,000. So that redemption fund is not sufficient to back those greenbacks in full. It consists only of $156,000,000 in gold.

Then there is a small amount of silver set aside in the Treasury to help back those greenbacks, but such silver is only inconsequential in amount. So the balance of the backing of the greenbacks is the credit of the United States and nothing else. That goes to make up a part of our stock of money.

The bulk of the money in circulation consists of Federal Reserve notes. There are something like $3,888,000,000 of Federal Reserve notes in circulation. The Federal Reserve notes are issued by the Federal Reserve banks. The Federal Reserve banks are presumed to have in their vaults 40 cents in gold behind each dollar. They do not have the gold in their vaults now, but they have gold certificates to the amount of 40 cents behind each dollar. The balance of 60 cents is based upon what is called liquid paper.

So behind the Federal Reserve note there is 40 cents of gold and 60 cents of liquid assets behind each dollar of such currency.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. When the Government confiscated the gold, can anyone say why gold certificates or receipts were given to the banks and not to private individuals?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Only the Federal Reserve banks received the certificates. No private banks other than the Federal Reserve banks received such certificates.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I understand that.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The Senator will have to ask the authorities who did that for the answer. I cannot give it. I am sorry I cannot. However, it is a fact that the Federal Reserve banks surrendered their gold to the Treasury, and that they received in return gold certificates, which are receipts for the gold. I can give one answer. The banks having these notes in circulation must have, of course, under the law 40 percent of gold back of the notes. To keep our money sound, many people think the banks should be permitted to keep that value behind those notes. But they do not have the gold. They have the gold certificates, which, however, serve the same purpose.

It is a fact also that the Government is back of all this money. If there should be a default by the Federal Reserve banks in any particular, the Government, under the law, is guaranteeing those notes 100 percent.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. What form does that receipt take? Does it state that the gold would be returned to the Federal Reserve banks if and when we shall go back to the gold standard?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I have not seen one of those receipts, but yesterday I suggested to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] that very soon—I fear entirely too soon—the Federal Reserve banks under another administration will present those certificates to the Treasury and they will receive gold for such certificates; and, in my opinion, if a change in administration shall come, we shall find this gold back in the vaults of the Federal Reserve banks.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I have no desire to consume time of the able Senator from Oklahoma in his disquisition upon finances—in certain aspects much beyond my comprehension—but there is one thing which has struck me in the observations of my able friend which he may clear up for me. Assume that we could be successful in producing some decree of government, through the will of Congress, by which money would be multiplied in sums which would add a billion dollars, or two or three hundred million dollars, by the method suggested by the able Senator. Will the Senator give me his view of the manner in which that money could be distributed to the people? By what manner and by what theory does my able friend contend the individual would become possessed of it? How could it be distributed among the citizens generally? In what manner does he suggest that could be done?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. This bill proposes to pay the so-called bonus to some 3,518,191 soldiers on June 15. They are to receive something of value. We are going to give them a bond first, and under the terms of this bill, presumably they can cash the bond at will and get cash for such bond.

Now, in place of giving bonds to these 3,518,191 of our citizens in every State in the Nation, in every county, in every city, and in every township in the Nation, if we give them real money in place of giving them bonds, would not that distribute it? It would distribute one billion and a half dollars of real money immediately. That might be too rapid a distribution, but that is one way to distribute money.

Another way we might distribute the money is this: We are spending about $25,000,000 each day to run the Government; it is costing that much money each 24 hours to pay the bills necessary to run the United States of America. In a month's time we could put three quarters of a billion dollars in circulation by paying salaries in money, by paying relief workers in money, by paying contractors in money, and by paying public claims in money.

If we should place some extra money in circulation, we would find prices going up; we would find the farmer who sells a hundred bushels of wheat, in place of getting a hundred dollars he would get $150. Such farmer would profit to the extent of $50. If he sold cotton, the same result would follow. I do not care what he sells; if he sells his labor, he would get more money for such labor.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the able Senator, then, unless I misunderstand, assumes circulation of the money upon the theory that those who become possessed of it will spend it for the purchase of something else, and in that manner the money will get out to the country. I ask the Senator, must they not get something for their money and must not that something which they get be paid for by the person who had it before he could sell it? If it be labor, one must have expended considerable for it himself; we will say, in the case of a farmer, the labor he gives to his farm in the production of his crops. I am still greatly baffled by the theory, and should like to ask, in what way do we add to the circulation if we merely expend some money for something for which the same amount of money has gone out in order to procure it.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Let me answer that question, Mr. President, by analogy. A hundred years ago this Nation had another great Democratic President and Democratic administration under "Old Hickory" Andrew Jackson. Jackson had his troubles as we are having troubles today. Jackson had trouble with the banks. He started out to destroy the Bank of the United States. The bank's charter was about to expire; Jackson recommended to Congress that they do not extend the charter, and because of Jackson's fight against the bank the charter was not extended. By that fight Jackson killed the bank, and that brought on a panic. What did Jackson do? He did exactly what this administration has already done; Jackson devalued the content of the gold dollar. A coincidence a hundred years apart; January 1834 Jackson devalued the gold dollar; January 1934 Roosevelt devalued the gold dollar for the identical purpose. Under the system then prevailing the State banks could issue money, and such State banks began to issue paper money. What was the result? Prices began to rise; factories began to open; labor began to be reemployed; and at the end of Jackson's administration, on March 4, 1837, there was the most prosperous era this Nation has ever seen.

There was plenty of money in circulation; prices were high; factories were busy; there was no unemployment; and when Jackson left the President's House the Treasury overflowed with revenues. Jackson had no problem about an unbalanced Budget, because he placed the money in circulation; people were employed; they could pay the taxes; and the Treasury was full to overflowing. When Jackson left the Presidency thousands lined the streets and great crowds followed his carriage as he started on his road to the Hermitage in Tennessee. How different from the departure from the White House of the last President of these United States.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator from Oklahoma fell into an error in suggesting that Jackson devalued the gold dollar. My recollection of the circumstance is that there had been a disequilibrium between silver and gold, and Congress at that time, in order to produce a proper parity and relation one to the other, subtracted a few grains from the gold dollar.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Jackson devalued the gold dollar.

Mr. KING. But there was no devaluation at all. The Congress merely established an equilibrium between gold and silver to the extent of a few cents.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Jackson not only operated on the gold dollar once, he operated on it twice. The first time he cut the gold content of the dollar he did not cut it very much, only one grain and a half, but he made the gold dollar cheaper. The second operation was to adjust the parity between the gold and silver. That is the fact of the matter as history records.

Mr. President, I am taking entirely too much time. I have laid the case before the Senate. I can do no more than present the facts about the amendment which is pending.

It provides, first, that the Treasury Department may issue money against its surplus silver. It provides, second, that it may issue money against its surplus gold. If the administration does not choose to do that, then, it can pay this bonus bill by issuing bonds, and, instead of selling the bonds or giving them to the soldiers, such bonds may be placed in the 12 Federal Reserve banks, placing enough bonds in each such bank to pay the soldiers in such district. Instead of selling the bonds to the banks, it is provided that the banks shall receive a service charge for making it possible for the Government to use its own credit. All the banks have to do is to receive the bonds, give full credit, and certify to the Treasury how much credit is available on account of the placing of such bonds.

I do not know what charge will be made for such services. Mr. Morgenthau testified before the committee that he is now borrowing money at three-eights of 1 percent a year; and yet these bonds proposed to be issued draw 3 percent, or more than six times as much interest as that for which Mr. Morgenthau is now being able to borrow money with which to finance the Government.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. Has the Senator explained how we could get the Federal Reserve banks to take these bonds under contract?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Yes; I provide for that in my amendment. The Treasury Department is given the power to issue certificates against the surplus gold and silver we now have in the Treasury. If the Treasury will not do that, then they could issue these bonds; and if the banks will not take the bonds at a reasonable rate the Treasury Department could issue the money against such surplus gold and silver. The banks will not want the Treasury to issue such money; they would make available the public's credit to the Government at cost and at a fraction of 1 percent rather than see the Government issue money against the surplus gold and silver. Does that make it clear?

It might be said that is a sort of persuasive influence in the hands of the Treasury to require or to induce the Federal Reserve banks to give the Government a real low rate contract charge for making this credit available.

Mr. MINTON. One more question. Suppose the Federal Reserve banks accept the proposition, where do they get the money with which to pay the soldiers?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, all the real money in the Federal Reserve banks is printing-press money. Where do they get the money to lend to a bank at Indianapolis? They do not have any money except printing-press money; and that, we have been told, is a dangerous form of money. When a bank in Oklahoma City wants money from the Federal Reserve bank at Kansas City it sends bonds or other collateral to the Kansas City bank and such bank sends back printing-press money. Perhaps the Oklahoma bank does not want real money; perhaps all it wants is credit at such Federal Reserve bank.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. May I submit an additional question along the same line? As I understand, the Federal Reserve capacity to issue paper currency is limited to the assets of one kind or another which the bank has. That is, the purpose of the Federal Reserve was to provide original money with which commerce and industry could operate. They have at this time a large proportion of their funds invested in Government bonds. Some contend it is too large a proportion. I am wondering what would be the effect upon the ability of the Federal Reserve bank to accommodate commerce and industry if they have to invest an additional amount of, roughly, $2,000,000,000 in Government bonds.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Under the law the Government bonds are good for the issuance of paper money 100 percent. The banks in my State can send their bonds to Kansas City and get currency for such bonds. The Federal Reserve banks certainly could have the Treasury issue currency against the bonds dollar for dollar. That makes a larger demand on the printing press, but we cannot get away from it now. Our heads are in the noose and our feet are in the fly paper, and what are we going to do about it? What can we do about it?

Mr. ADAMS. May I divert the attention of the Senator to the first section of the bill? The amendment provides that there is to be appropriated out of the Treasury the sum of $2,237,000,000. I am wondering how that can be reconciled with the constitutional requirement as to the origination of appropriation bills in the House?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The Senator is mistaken about the constitutional provision. The Constitution requires that revenue bills must originate in the House, but there is no provision that appropriation bills must originate in the other body.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator knows that we in the Senate rather acquiesce with the contention of the House as to the origination of appropriation bills.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. By practice only, but we are not limited by the Constitution. It seems to be more agreeable to let the House originate appropriation bills, hold hearings, and act first on such measures. The Members of the House come directly from the people each 2 years, hence are more closely in contact with the people than are Senators, because House Members have fewer constituents to see, so through long custom it has become the practice for the House to originate appropriation bills.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. The constitutional provision with reference to revenue bills originating in the House does not, to my mind, apply to appropriation bills. The Senator is aware that the practice not only prevails to some extent, but also to the extent that the House on many occasions has absolutely refused to receive an appropriation bill originating in the Senate on the ground that it was an appropriation bill, and has taken the position that it could not legally consider such a bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I have occupied entirely too much time, much longer than I had anticipated. I submit the amendment now for the consideration of the Senate.

SECRET TREATIES DURING WORLD WAR

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, nothing could be further from my desire than unnecessarily or at any length to delay the consideration of the very important measure now before us in which I am so much interested. I feel, however, that certain remarks made yesterday by the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] not only justify but make it necessary for me to take the time of the Senate for just a few moments in replying thereto.

Mr. President, more than 20 years ago I heard a very distinguished Member of the House of Representatives, on the floor of the House, refer to the present senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], then a Member of that body, as "the gentleman from Virginia who never speaks except in terms of intense indignation." The thought occurred to me yesterday, as I listened to the philippic delivery by the senior Senator from Virginia, that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] was being added to the long list of distinguished gentlemen who in the last 25 years have been made the objects of the unbridled wrath of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for the purpose of summoning a quorum?

Mr. CLARK. No; I do not think that is necessary. I do not desire to delay consideration of the bill for that purpose.

Mr. President, I have known the Senator from Virginia for nearly 30 years. I not only have the deepest respect for his great ability, his integrity and force of character, but I entertain for him a feeling of deep personal affection and have for many years. However, I regret that the Senator from Virginia saw fit to pour the full force of his unrivaled power of vituperation, invective, and abuse upon an individual member of the Munitions Committee rather than to read dispassionately and soberly the record of the testimony which has been adduced in the hearings before the Munitions Committee with a view to learning therefrom what led to our uphappy experience in the past in being dragged into a war, with a view of keeping the United States out of war in the future. The purpose of the investigation which has been conducted since the convening of Congress early this month was not for the purpose of finding a basis for appraising criticism, giving laudation to the work of any man or even the course of any man, whether he be alive or whether he be dead.

Yesterday the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] inserted in the RECORD a long list of men whose names have been mentioned in the investigation and who have now passed to the Great Beyond. I submit that that is beside the point. I submit that any public man taking part in public affairs of great moment, going to influence the policy of a great nation in time of great stress, must know when he is doing so that he is making history and that his words, his letters, and his acts are the fair subject for investigation by his fellow countrymen or by anybody else in the world at a later time in the ascertainment of historic facts in connection with the events with which he was connected.

I submit that it is no reflection on the memory of President Wilson; that it is no reflection on the memory of Secretary Lansing; that it is no reflection on the memory of Secretary Bryan, or of any member of the House or Senate who supported or opposed the declaration of war in 1917, for us to soberly and dispassionately examine the facts in connection with the web of circumstances which finally brought us into the World War, a war in which victory was followed by calamity, a war which, viewed in the perspective of 20 years, can only be regarded as one of the greatest, if not the greatest, calamities that ever befell the United States in its entire history.

Mr. President, I desire for just a moment to review the course of the testimony adduced in the investigation which has been conducted by the Munitions Committee at this session of the Congress. That investigation has collected many facts already known. It has undertaken to assemble them in a perspective which could be presented from a new viewpoint. That testimony has shown that upon the outbreak of war in Europe in the summer of 1914 the President of the United States issued his neutrality proclamation, and in addition to the issuance of that neutrality proclamation he issued an official appeal, one of the most eloquent documents ever penned by Woodrow Wilson, in which he urged the people of the United States to be neutral in thought as well as in deed.

The record shows that very soon thereafter, upon an inquiry from J. P. Morgan & Co., international bankers of New York, the President officially expressed the opinion through his Secretary of State, Mr. Bryan, that it would be a violation of that principle of neutrality in thought as well as in deed for the United States Government to permit the flotation in this country of loans or credits by any of the belligerent nations, either of the entente group or of the Central Powers.

Contrary to the opinion expressed yesterday by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who stated that an attempt had been made to make it appear that the United States Government had some legal authority to impose such a restriction on loans, the fact was that neither the President nor Secretary Bryan nor anybody else ever contended for a single moment that the Government of the United States had any legal authority to prevent such loans; but the fact also appeared from the testimony of Mr. Morgan and Mr. Lamont, and from the universal practice followed at that time and for more than a year later, that the request of the President, the expression of the President's opinion as to neutrality, had in fact the moral force of law. Mr. Morgan and Mr. Lamont testified that while they realized from the beginning of the war in 1914 that the President had no right under the law to prevent them from making loans to the Allies or from floating loans for the Allies in this country, the request of the President had such great moral force that they regarded it as if it had had the force of law.

The record shows that immediately after the outbreak of hostilities the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co., acting certainly well within their legal rights, entered into an arrangement with the Government of Great Britain by which they became the purchasing agents in this country for munitions, contraband, and various supplies, and that they purchased during the course of the war, prior to the entry of the United States into the struggle, some $3,000,000,000 worth of goods, for which they received a commission of $30,000,000.

The record shows that with the control of the seas by the British Navy our trade with the Central Powers fell away from a heavy normal trade to practically nothing, while our trade with the Entente Powers increased by leaps and bounds until it was more than tenfold what it had been prior to the outbreak of the war.

The record shows that from the very beginning of the struggle the neutral rights as to the freedom of the seas asserted by President Wilson and by Secretary Bryan and later by Secretary Lansing as the American position were flagrantly and deliberately and repeatedly violated by Great Britain. The record even goes to the extent of showing that on one occasion the American Ambassador to Great Britain actively participated in encouraging the seizure of an American ship bound with a cargo of cotton for a neutral port, in direct violation of the position taken by the Government of the United States.

The record further shows that during a number of months, for more than a year, the British Government, through the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co., had been actively and strongly supporting the exchange market—that is, supporting the value of the pound sterling—for the purpose of establishing credits of dollars in this country to pay for the various kinds of material, both munitions and otherwise, which were being purchased in this country.

The record shows that in August of 1915—on August 13, to be exact—the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co., as agents for the British Government, suddenly stepped out from under the support of the exchange market and the support of the pound sterling; that within a few days thereafter the pound sterling sold from $4.76 down to $4.50 and a fraction; and that immediately after the firm of Morgan & Co. had withdrawn from the exchange market, allowing it to slide off in that way, representations were made to various Government officials by Morgan & Co. as to the exchange crisis; the idea being created in the minds of some of those officials that a panic was likely to be caused in this country by the withdrawal of British purchases from our market.

The record shows that within 3 days after the withdrawal of the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. from the exchange market, from the support of the pound sterling, a letter was written by the Secretary of the Treasury to the President emphasizing the crisis in exchange, and in the strongest possible terms urging the President to reverse the policy which had been adopted by the Government for more than a year of advising against, and as far as might be from a moral standpoint forbidding the flotation of allied loans in this country.

The record further shows that prior to the withdrawal of J. P. Morgan & Co. from the exchange market a British commission had already started to the United States for the purpose of negotiating an allied loan of $500,000,000. They intended at that time, as we were informed by the Morgan partners, to negotiate a loan for a billion dollars, and that at a time when our Government had not reversed its position as to the flotation of allied loans in this country.

The record further shows that after the Anglo-French loan of 1915 for $500,000,000 had been floated in this country, after the country had once been committed to the policy of permitting allied loans in this country, J. P. Morgan & Co., on instructions from the British Government, reentered the exchange market, pegging the pound sterling around $4.70, and maintained it there until the end of the war, clearly demonstrating the fact that there would have been no difficulty on the part of the British Government in maintaining the exchange market around $4.70 during the 2 months in the fall of 1915 when they had withdrawn from the market and when the first Anglo-French loan was being floated.

The record shows, furthermore, that during the whole war prior to 1917, when we entered the war, there had been repeated violations on the part of the British and French Governments of our neutral rights and of our contentions as to the freedom of the seas, and that President Wilson had not only protested bitterly to the British Government and the French Government but had in many ways evidenced his displeasure and his dissatisfaction with the course they were pursuing.

The record shows that after the beginning of unrestricted submarine warfare on the part of the German Government Secretary Lansing, who had succeeded Mr. Bryan as Secretary of State, proposed to the Allies a modus vivendi, as he called it, in which he pointed out very clearly and with unanswerable logic that there was merit in the German contention as to the use of submarines unless the British should abandon their illegal practice of arming merchant vessels with armament which would necessarily be offensive armament as against submarines, and should abandon their illegal practice of instructing such armed merchant ships to attack submarines on sight. The record shows that this representation on the part of Secretary Lansing was not only coldly received but was received with very scant courtesy on the part of the Allies, and thereafter it was dropped like a hot cake by our Government.

The record shows that after the Lusitania incident, the incident of the Arabic, and the sinking of the Sussex, when President Wilson sent a very severe note to Germany, the German Government replied in a note directed to the United States in which they agreed to stop their unrestricted submarine warfare, and that they did stop their unrestricted submarine warfare, but that in that note they attached as an addendum the statement that while they were stopping their illegal practices with regard to the use of the submarine, they depended on the good faith of the United States to see that the Allies also stopped their illegal practices which had given rise to the unrestricted use of the submarine by Germany. The record shows that the administration in Washington did endeavor to bring about this change in the illegal practices of the Allies, but entirely without success.

Then, Mr. President, the record shows something that is very significant. The record shows that during the summer of 1916, when the relationship between the American Government and the German Government was better than it had been at any prior time during the progress of the war, American public opinion was outraged, and President Wilson himself was outraged, by the publication by the British Government of a blacklist against scores of American firms, in which the subjects of the British Empire were forbidden not only to deal with the blacklisted firms but forbidden to deal with anybody who did deal with the blacklisted firms.

The record further shows that at that time the illegal British censorship of our mails and the mails of other neutrals, in which on occasion they even detained the diplomatic pouches en route to American embassies, aroused President Wilson to the point where he asked and obtained from the Congress authority for retaliatory measures against Great Britain, and considered putting into effect what amounted to an embargo, refusing clearance to ships armed with contraband of war.

The record further shows that at that time the Department of Commerce was requested for an opinion as to the most effective means to be taken by the Government of the United States to put into effect the retaliatory measures which had been authorized by Congress, and that the Secretary of Commerce replied that the United States had become so deeply involved in a commercial way by furnishing supplies to the Allies that to put in force any such retaliatory measures as those authorized by Congress would be likely to cause a panic in this country, and therefore that nothing was done about it, and nothing more was ever heard of the proposed retaliatory measures.

The record shows that during all that period the State Department had been repeatedly advised by our Ambassador to Germany, by our acting Ambassador to Germany, by our Chargé d'Affaires in Germany, and by the American Ambassador to Turkey, who was some time in Germany in transit, that unless the United States should compel the Allies to respect our contentions as to our neutral rights and our contentions as to existing international law, the Germans would be forced, under the exception contained in their Sussex note, again to employ unrestricted submarine warfare.

The record shows that in January the German Government did notify the American Government that they had reached an impasse where it was necessary for them again to resort to unrestricted submarine warfare.

The record further shows, not on my testimony, not on the testimony of the Senator from North Dakota, not on the testimony of any member of the Munitions Committee, but on the testimony of Secretary Lansing himself, that the notes of the United States to Great Britain as to their violations of international law, while quite severe in many cases, were deliberately involved in a sea of verbosity, in accordance with the extract from Secretary Lansing's war memoirs which I inserted in the RECORD yesterday, and I will read the last paragraph of it:

> The notes that were sent (to Britain) were long and exhaustive treaties which opened up new subjects of discussion rather than closing those in controversy. Short and emphatic notes were dangerous. Everything was submerged in verbosity. It was done with a deliberate purpose.

I submit, Mr. President, that there cannot be any higher testimony as to the purpose and structure of the diplomatic notes which were sent by the United States to Great Britain than the testimony of the man who himself wrote those notes.

It should further be noted that the record discloses the fact that shortly after the outbreak of hostilities in Europe in 1914, and again in 1915, the suggestion was made in the American Congress that the shipment of munitions to one set of belligerents when access to our markets was forbidden to the other set of belligerents, by reason of the British control of the seas, was in itself an unneutral act; that is, unneutral in the definition which the President had laid down of being neutral in thought as well as in deed, although it was never contended on anybody's behalf, as far as I know, that the exportation of munitions in the existing state of the law was not entirely a legal performance, and the State Department, immediately after the outbreak of hostilities in 1914, rendered a public opinion to that effect. But at the time the suggestion was made in this body and in the body at the other end of the Capitol that the neutrality of the United States could best be preserved by forbidding the export of munitions to one set of belligerents when the other was shut out of our market, an official opinion was rendered at the State Department that to change the law after the outbreak of hostilities would in itself be an unneutral act. While that opinion has been questioned by very eminent international lawyers, who insist that it would not have been a violation of our neutrality to change the law after the outbreak of hostilities, I am of opinion from a reading of the Hague convention and other documents on the subject that the State Department was entirely justified and entirely within its rights in the views it then took.

Therefore, to answer the questions which were propounded here yesterday as to the purpose of this phase of our investigation, the purpose of the testimony put into the record was to study the events of those tragic years, to draw such lessons as may be possible from the perusal and scrutiny of those records and those events, with a view to taking steps at a proper time before the outbreak of another world-wide conflict to keep the United States from a web of circumstances similar to the web of circumstances which proved strong enough in 1914, 1915, 1916, and 1917 to draw even so self-reliant and strong willed an Executive as Woodrow Wilson, who undoubtedly desired to keep us out of war, into the struggle, and to precipitate upon the United States, as I said a moment ago, possibly the greatest calamity that ever befell it. That is the purpose of the investigation, and that is the purpose of the testimony produced before the committee.

The Munitions Committee is, of course, the creature of the Senate. The Senate created it. The Senate gave it all the authority which it has ever had. The Senate can take away that authority, or the Senate can refuse to appropriate for the conclusion of the hearings already scheduled. Nobody questions that. Senators may close their ears and shut their eyes to the historical records introduced before the committee, but I make bold to say that it will be impossible to wipe those records from the consciousness of the American people and from the scrutiny of future historians.

Mr. President, something was said here yesterday as to the action of the committee in availing itself of the services of men and women employed on a W. P. A. project.

The Senator from Arkansas went so far as to say that we had put the Senate on relief.

Mr. President, I am unable myself to see any impropriety in a governmental agency, whether it be a Senate committee or any other governmental agency, availing itself of the services of people whom the Government itself had desired and was seeking means to employ in some useful capacity. The project was a nonrelief project, employing white-collar workers of the city of New York on important clerical work, and otherwise it would have been necessary for the committee to have expended Government funds for the performance of that work.

I submit that it is better for the people on W. P. A. projects to be engaged in useful governmental work than to have them engaged in boondoggling, or in taking papers off one desk and carrying them across a room and putting them on another desk and then carrying them back and putting them on the first desk.

I further submit, Mr. President, that there is nothing either revolutionary or unusual in the use by the committee of a W. P. A. project. Many other governmental agencies have employed people employed on W. P. A. projects, and I am informed that one of the leading standing committees of this body, namely, the Committee on Interstate Commerce, which is presently engaged in a very important investigation of railroad receiverships, is itself at this moment availing itself of the services of people employed on W. P. A. projects, and I may say I think such employment by the Committee on Interstate Commerce is entirely proper and entirely fitting.

As far as the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] on yesterday were concerned, as to his desire to terminate the work of the Munitions Committee, I may say that there is nothing new or unusual in the attitude of the Senator from South Carolina. Every appropriation which has been made for the Munitions Committee has been made after a struggle. It was originally the intention of the Senator from South Carolina to confine the appropriation to a paltry $15,000, which would have made it impossible even to start an outline of the work of the committee. Every additional appropriation, as I have said, has been secured after a struggle.

It may seem to the Senator from South Carolina that the appropriations made have been exorbitant. I submit to him that they are very small in comparison with the amount expended by a committee of which both he and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] are very prominent members—to wit, the committee conducting the Pecora investigation, which spent something in excess of $260,000.

Mr. President, before I conclude, may I be pardoned a personal word? For the past several days a studious effort has been made on the part of some newspapers in the United States to make it appear that my own part in the conduct of the examination of the Munitions Committee was actuated by personal animus because President Wilson defeated my father for the Democratic nomination for President in the Baltimore convention in 1912. That matter is very easily disposed of. There was never the slightest animosity between my father and President Wilson, or toward the memory of President Wilson by any member of my father's family. My father was a candidate at the Baltimore convention, as he had a right to be, and he received a majority of the votes cast on nine ballots. He was subsequently defeated by President Wilson, who was also a candidate, as he had a right to be, and who, so far as I have ever been informed, did nothing improper or blameworthy in connection with that fight.

Such animosity as my father had, such animosity as I have felt, and still feel, or as the other members of my family have felt, and still feel, was and is directed toward another man, a delegate instructed as a delegate for my father under a law which he drew himself, and who betrayed my father at the Baltimore convention, namely, William Jennings Bryan. It must be obvious, Mr. President, that if I were capable of being actuated in the slightest degree by my personal feeling in the performance of my official duty, that the last thing I should desire to do would be to introduce into the RECORD any testimony or any exhibits which would necessarily tend to justify the position taken by Mr. Bryan, as Secretary of State or as a private citizen, in contradistinction to the position taken by President Wilson or anybody else.

Mr. President, it seems to me that that is a proposition so plain, so obvious, and so concise that even such a lickspittle and sycophantic toady as Mr. Arthur Krock, of the New York Times, ought to be able to grasp.

Mr. BYRNES obtained the floor.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield briefly.

Mr. CONNALLY. Yesterday the Senator from North Dakota made the charge here that according to the proof, or what he called the proof, President Wilson and Mr. Lansing had falsified, and that they had knowledge of the secret treaties before we entered the war. Do I understand the Senator from Missouri to contend that, or does he contend——

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas does not understand me to contend that. I will state to the Senator that the other day in the committee I declined to agree with the Senator from North Dakota in his characterization of the testimony of President Wilson and Secretary Lansing. I do say, and I stated to the Senator day before yesterday, that there were in the State Department prior to the entrance of the United States into the war certain communications from Ambassador Walter Page at London, Ambassador Thomas Nelson Page at Rome, and Ambassador Francis in St. Petersburg which bore very considerably on those secret treaties. I further say that there were certain entries in the diary of Colonel House which indicated that Colonel House, who was President Wilson's unofficial diplomatic representative, had knowledge of the substance of the secret treaties.

So far as I am concerned, I have never said, and I do not say now, and I do not believe that President Wilson had personal knowledge of the treaties prior to the entrance of the United States into the war.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is what I wanted to bring out, and I think my question was prompted as much by the desire to try to set the Senator correct before the Senate in that view as it was——

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I never intimated or said that President Wilson had any such knowledge before entrance of the United States into the World War.

Mr. CONNALLY. I desire to ask the Senator another question. The other day in the Munitions Committee, under the Senator's own leadership, he put into the record the so-called chronology of events leading up to the war. Is that correct?

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Why did not the Senator include in that the Zimmermann telegram, in which Germany proposed an alliance with Mexico conditioned on the fact that in the event of victory a number of the States, including Arizona, New Mexico, and Texas, and a great territory, should be given back to Mexico?

Mr. CLARK. Because I did not think that that was any material contributing cause to the United States getting into the war. If the Senator wishes to include it, I shall be glad to include it.

Mr. CONNALLY. No; I do not care. The Senator did not include that incident, which inflamed the people of this country very greatly. Why did not the Senator include in his chronology the action which Germany took after unrestricted submarine warfare was declared, after the declaration of which unrestricted warfare President Wilson stated that we must then wait for overt acts in the carrying out of that declaration?

Those overt acts were the sinking of the Memphis, the Vigilancia, and the Illinois, the Vigilancia having six Americans on board, and the sinking without warning of the American tanker Healdton. Why were they not included in the Senator's chronology?

Mr. CLARK. There were a number of things which were not included in that chronology. I did not insert in that chronology the reply of President Wilson after the war was over to the question asked him by Senator McCumber, of North Dakota. Senator McCumber asked him whether it was his opinion that the United States would have gotten into the war if there had been no violations of American rights by Germany, in reply to which President Wilson said that he thought we would have gotten into the war anyway. There were a number of other things impossible to get into the simple chronology.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me ask another question. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] yesterday, I think, made a statement regarding the private Lansing papers. I stated my understanding was that Mr. Lansing had left his private diaries with his wife with an injunction not to publish them within 20 years because of the living characters which were mentioned, and that Mrs. Lansing upon her death left them with Mr. Dulles, and he turned them over to the Library of Congress. The Senator from North Dakota stated that the committee had obtained control of those documents. Is it or not true that the committee subpenaed those documents from the Library of Congress?

Mr. CLARK. I am unable to state to the Senator from Texas. So far as I am concerned, I have never seen the private Lansing documents.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the committee subpenaed them, did the members not know at the time that it was in violation of the express wish of Secretary Lansing?

Mr. CLARK. Let me say so far as that is concerned that Mr. Lansing——

Mr. CONNALLY. If the committee did not do it, it does not make any difference.

Mr. CLARK. I do not know whether we did or not, I am frank to say. The Senator from North Dakota can answer that question. I am not familiar with the facts, and I did not see the papers.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK. Let me say a word further before I yield to the Senator from North Dakota. If the Munitions Committee subpenaed the papers, I say with regard to any record or any data officially having to do with matters of great import to the United States, concerning so important a matter as the participation of the United States in the war, the Congress of the United States has the right to those papers if they are pertinent; and I submit to the Senator that no papers from that private collection have ever been placed in the records of the committee. The documents of Mr. Lansing which I placed in the record were other documents open to public inspection in the Library of Congress or else contained in the various writings of Mr. Lansing.

Mr. CONNALLY. I make no quarrel with the Senator on the way he puts it. The acts of the public official which relate to his official duty are one thing, but the private personal diary of a dead man is another thing. That is what I am complaining of.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the private personal diary of a Secretary of State, who records in his diary underlying important events of the day, is not a private matter. It becomes a public matter.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. NYE. The question is raised concerning the understanding by and through which we came into possession of the diary of Secretary Lansing. Before answering that I ought perhaps to make quite certain my ground. My recollection at this time, however, is, and I think it will be shared by the Senator from Missouri, that the response to our subpena for this record came only after the estate of Robert Lansing had indicated to the Library an agreement to permit that to be done. If I find myself mistaken in this assertion, I shall gladly report it to the Senate before the day is over.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the Senator from North Dakota state whether he has ready for the RECORD this morning the information regarding the lecture tours and compensation which he received?

Mr. NYE. No, Mr. President; I have not. I wonder if the Senator from Texas will join me in a few days in the introduction of a resolution calling upon all Members of the Senate to report annually their income? Will the Senator from Texas do that?

Mr. CONNALLY. No; the Senator will not. The Senator will agree to put his own income into the RECORD if the Senator from North Dakota will put his in, however. It is none of my concern what is made by Senators in their private pursuits, such as practicing law and things of that kind. The Senator from Texas will agree, however, to put in under oath a detailed statement of his income if the Senator from North Dakota will do the same thing.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Texas thinks that he is going to embarrass me to the extent of causing me to alter plans and programs which I have in mind, to convey to the people of this country the developments which have been the consequence of the munitions investigation, he is sadly mistaken. And if honorariums are offered for that service, I am going to accept them.

Mr. CONNALLY. We know that.

Mr. NYE. If I can reach people who ought to know about these things, and no honorariums are paid, I shall, nevertheless, respond in each instance where I possibly can. If the Senator thinks he is going to alter that program, he is sadly mistaken. The Senator from North Dakota will be quite happy to join with the Senator, when he is prepared, in reporting accurately, precisely, and exactly what his income has been since the beginning of this investigation as the result of his lectures upon the munitions question.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, we shall look forward with a great deal of pleasurable anticipation to that, and I think the Budget will be able to reduce its estimates on account of the increased income it will receive.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, it was not my intention to say a word with reference to the discussion which has taken place between the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. I intended to direct my remarks to the pending bill. The remarks of the Senator from Missouri, however, cause me to make a statement with reference to what has been said as to the appropriation for the Munitions Committee.

First, the Senator says that there is another committee, the Interstate Commerce Committee, which has had a work-relief project established in order to secure additional assistance in conducting an investigation authorized by that committee. I telephoned to the Director of the Federal Emergency Relief in order to ascertain the facts with reference to that matter. The cases are not parallel, according to the information given me, in that the City College of New York is making an investigation of certain statistics, railway figures, and it so happens that the information desired by the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee is of the same character as the information being compiled by the City College of New York, and that information has been made available to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER].

That at least is the information given to me by Mr. Baker, of the relief organization, and it is not comparable in any way with the action of the Munitions Committee in having the city of New York originate a work-relief project and have the city and State contribute $22,000 to carry on the work of a committee of the United States Senate with its employees on the relief roll, clothed with the power of the Senate of the United States. That is an entirely different proposal. The Senator said that when I referred to that on yesterday it was not surprising, because, in passing upon requests for appropriations heretofore, as chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I have been very liberal in recommending appropriations from that committee. It all depends on what one calls being liberal. When $125,000 was appropriated, $124,281 of which has been spent to date, I call it liberality to the extreme.

I wish to tell the Senate exactly how it occurred. When the first resolution was submitted and the Senator from North Dakota, and possibly the Senator from Missouri, came before the committee asking for an appropriation, $15,000 was granted. Then, only 2 months later, the Munitions Committee asked for $35,000 more, and the Committee to Audit and Control recommended $35,000. If the Senator from Missouri had been dissatisfied with that action of the committee, he had the right on the floor of the Senate to move to amend the resolution and suggest any sum he thought wise.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the Senator will undoubtedly recall that when the members of the Munitions Committee appeared before the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate and asked for an additional appropriation of $35,000, without which the work of the committee could not have been started, because the $15,000 which had been granted by the committee was so obviously inadequate, the Senator from South Carolina took such a hostile attitude toward the request for the additional grant of funds that I stated to him that I was going on the next day to rise in my place in this body and resign from the Munitions Committee for the reason that the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate was obviously making it impossible for the Munitions Committee to fulfill the duties imposed on them by the Senate. I came back to the Senate that afternoon and gave notice that the next day, as soon as the Senate met at 12 o'clock, it was my purpose to address the Senate on the subject of the Munitions Committee inquiry; that it was my purpose to state the facts which I have just stated. The next morning the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate met again and granted the Munitions Committee the additional $35,000. Obviously, I was not dissatisfied with the grant of $35,000, because that was exactly what the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] and, I think, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE] and myself, who appeared before the committee, had requested.

Mr. BYRNES. The first resolution submitted requested $50,000, and the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate recommended $15,000. The Senator from Missouri could have arisen then and asked the Senate of the United States to increase the amount to $50,000, but the Senator from Missouri did not offer an amendment.

The Senator from Missouri makes a statement as to which I have no recollection, except that he did appear to advocate the adoption of the resolution. Again the Senator appeared and asked for $100,000, but the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate reported a resolution providing for $50,000. The Senator from Missouri could then have arisen at his seat on the floor of the Senate and moved to make it $100,000. He never offered an amendment.

Again I will say to the Senate at that time I told Senators on the Munitions Committee that ever since the armistice men had been parading over the country talking about taking the profits out of war. There was hardly a Member of the Senate who had not made speeches on the subject. We had investigated; we had appointed a congressional committee composed of Members of the House and the Senate. They had spent almost 2 years investigating; they had filed reports, but nothing had been done, and the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate believed it was time to legislate and not investigate; and we urged upon them, instead of asking for more money to continue an everlasting investigation, that they seek to legislate. We told them at that time—certainly I told the chairman of the committee—that certain matters had been brought out calling attention of the public to the investigation which would be helpful in securing legislation; that that was the time to ask for legislation; that if they did not do it, the matter would be forgotten and all the value of their investigation would be lost. I urged that upon the Senator who is now presiding over the Senate (Mr. POPE in the chair), as he well recalls.

Senators on the Munitions Committee agreed at that time with the statement I made; and when I look back I know that I was wise, because that report was made last year; and if the Committee on Munitions had followed it up and endeavored to secure legislation instead of continuing——

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I decline to yield now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina declines to yield.

Mr. BYRNES. Instead of continuing the investigation and diverting the minds of the people to other subjects, today we would have made greater progress in the consideration of the measure to take the profits out of war. I want the Senate to act upon that measure. I want the Senate to legislate instead of investigate.

The Senator from Missouri wanted to investigate; the Senator from North Dakota wanted to investigate; and they continued their investigation until finally they shocked the Nation with the statement that a former President of the United States, Woodrow Wilson, had falsified the record.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President——

Mr. BYRNES. I share the resentment of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. I will not attempt to express it as he did. I join in his expression of indignation that any Member of the United States Senate should make such a statement with reference to any President of the United States.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BYRNES. Now I yield.

Mr. NYE. The Senator makes reference to the delay which the Munitions Committee has occasioned in the consideration of the bill to take the profits out of war.

Mr. BYRNES. No; I did not say any such thing. What I said was that if the Munitions Committee had devoted its time since last April, when they were working upon a report, to following up that report and securing legislation, instead of going into new fields, I believed they could have made a substantial contribution toward the enactment of such legislation.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. The Senator from South Carolina is not contending that the committee is asking for more time to consider the matter of taking the profits out of war?

Mr. BYRNES. Oh, no; the Senator can certainly understand plain English. I said that if the committee had consumed the time which has elapsed in following up its work along that line greater progress would have been made.

Mr. NYE. There are members of the Committee on Munitions who last spring and summer were striving as earnestly as they knew how to accomplish the hearings upon the war-profits bill. How unsuccessful they were only the record reveals.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I know that measure is before the Committee on Military Affairs. The Senator is a member of that committee, is he not?

Mr. NYE. The bill is not before that committee. It has been reported out of that committee and is before the Finance Committee at the present time.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator from Missouri, then, is a member of the Finance Committee, and I hope he will devote his time to an effort to having the bill reported by the committee.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Let me say to the Senator that he has completely misstated the facts.

Mr. BYRNES. In what respect?

Mr. CLARK. In regard to the bill for taking the profits out of war. That bill was reported from the Munitions Committee. It was then referred by the then Presiding Officer to the Committee on Military Affairs. The members of the Munitions Committee appeared before the Committee on Military Affairs. The bill was favorably reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, and then was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, that statement——

Mr. CLARK. Wait just a moment. Will the Senator let me complete my statement?

Mr. BYRNES. Very well.

Mr. CLARK. Repeatedly I made representations in the Finance Committee looking to the consideration of the bill. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and other members of the committee requested consideration of the bill. We finally procured the appointment of a subcommittee headed by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], who will bear me out in what I am about to say; I am certain that I repeatedly spoke to him urging hearings on that bill with a view to taking it up; that the matter finally went to the extent that I served notice in committee that if the bill was not taken up by the subcommittee it was my purpose to offer that bill as an amendment to the revenue bill when it came in. Subsequently the Senator from Kentucky stated that he had been so busily engaged in his services on the Interstate Commerce Committee and other committees it had been impossible for him to take the matter up, and he resigned the chairmanship of the subcommittee.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] was then appointed chairman of the subcommittee; and the Senator from North Dakota and I repeatedly urged the Senator from Texas to take steps for the consideration of that bill. Finally—I think it was in June or July—a meeting was held by the subcommittee at which it was represented on the part of the experts in the Treasury Department that they had not been able to consider the taxable features in that bill on account of the work on the revenue bill, and an agreement was entered into with the Senator from Texas and other Members interested in the measure by which it was understood that the matter would be taken up just as soon as it could possibly be done after the convening of Congress. Is not that true, I will ask the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CONNALLY. In substance, the Senator is correct in that it was agreed by all, at the request of the Treasury experts, who stated they were not prepared to testify because of the revenue bill which was before us last year and its technical character, and that they could not give the committee information upon which to act until the present session of Congress. Yet the Senator from North Dakota, and the Senator from Missouri—not to the same extent, however—are seeming to blame the Finance Committee for not having taken action.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will yield for just a moment, I should like to say that I have never blamed the Senator from Texas or the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I cannot yield further. The Senator from Missouri took the floor at about 1:15, and had all the time he wanted, and my time is now limited.

The fact remains that since November 17, 1918, the Congress of the United States has been talking about legislation to take the profits out of war. Prior to April 1 last year there was a resolution from the Munitions Committee, and in that resolution reported by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I inserted a provision that on or before April 1, recommendations for legislation at this session of Congress based upon the inquiry to the date of such report should be made.

The Senator from Missouri says that he is not responsible; the Senator from North Dakota says he is not responsible. There are other members of that committee, and I cannot believe that the Committee on Finance will refuse to give consideration to the measure at any time the members of that committee demand consideration of the bill.

Then what happened? The Senator from Missouri and the Senator from North Dakota came before the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate and asked for an appropriation of $45,000. That was on June 7. The committee recommended an appropriation of $25,000, with this provision:

> Twenty-five thousand dollars, in addition to the amount heretofore authorized to be expended, to complete the investigation authorized in said resolution.

That resolution came upon the floor of the Senate. If the Senator from Missouri was displeased with the amount, if the Senator from Missouri was displeased with the language of the resolution which directed the committee to complete its investigation, he could have moved then to change the language of the resolution in order to suit his wishes. He never addressed the Chair, seeking to amend the resolution. The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate had a right to believe it was satisfactory to him.

Now, after having been directed by the Senate—for that resolution, although reported by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, was adopted by the Senate and became the action of the Senate—after having been directed to complete the investigation with the $25,000, the Munitions Committee have established, or somebody for them has established, in New York City a works project to have the city of New York and the State of New York pay expenses incurred by the United States Senate.

I tell the Senate now that the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate has a very difficult task to perform. The appropriation bill which passed through the Congress gave to the committee $100,000 or $125,000 for all inquiries and investigations. There is a fight every year between the House and the Senate to retain that amount, because the House makes its investigations through members of its committees instead of employing people and clothing them with the powers of the House of Representatives. Consequently out of the $100,000 or $125,000 the Committee to Audit and Control has to determine which committees shall be given money to conduct investigations.

I say to the Senator from Missouri now that the Committee to Audit and Control should not be subject to criticism. I say to him that since he talked to me this morning I have prepared a resolution. I have left out the name of the introducing Senator. If he wants to introduce it, I want him to do so.

I have left out the amount. If he or the Senator from North Dakota will introduce the resolution, I promise to have it reported back immediately, because I have authority from other members of the committee to do so. I will report it back within 10 minutes after he has introduced it, and then we will let the Senate this afternoon, at the conclusion of the vote on the bonus bill, say whether the investigation committee is to be provided with any more money or whether it shall close in accordance with the language of the resolution adopted last May. I have the resolution prepared in that form, and I should be glad to have the Senator from North Dakota or the Senator from Missouri introduce it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator has informed the Senate of various appropriations made for the use of this committee. It seems to me that before any action is taken on any further resolution we ought to be informed as to how that money has been spent, who received the money, for what purpose it has been spent, and that we should have a full itemized account of the expenditures of the investigating committee. I suggest to the chairman of the committee that he submit such a statement to the Senate.

Mr. BYRNES. It can be secured from the disbursing officer of the Senate. I have not the information. I know that the Senate directed this committee, in the resolution appropriating the last money for it, to complete the investigation. According to the disbursing officer of the Senate they have not more than $400 or $500 left and the work is going on. A resolution will doubtless be submitted asking for further funds. The Senator from North Dakota said he was going to submit such a resolution. If he wants to offer it now, I want him to do so and let the Senate take the responsibility of saying whether or not it wants this investigation to continue.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. NYE. The Senator from North Dakota is quite confident that within a matter of hours the committee is going to be in position to determine accurately and exactly what its additional requirement is, and then it will be requesting that amount from the Senate.

Mr. BYRNES. That is all I desire. I say to the Senator that if he will submit the resolution this afternoon the Committee to Audit and Control has authorized me to report it back to the Senate before the Senate adjourns or recesses, so action may be had on it. We can ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. NYE. I assure the Senator there is no prospect of it being offered this afternoon, because there is no chance of our knowing exactly what the need is.

Mr. BYRNES. Evidently that is true, because the committee has not been able to know accurately heretofore. I do not know what the committee has in mind, but I say to the chairman of the committee, if he cannot offer the resolution this afternoon, I hope he will introduce it Monday. If it is offered Monday, it will be reported to the Senate by the Committee to Audit and Control within 5 minutes after it is introduced.

Mr. President, after this excursion into the fighting of the war I wish to use the time I have left under the unanimous-consent agreement to say something in behalf of the bill providing for payment of the bonus to those who fought the war.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will my colleague submit to an interruption?

Mr. BYRNES. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. I wish to say just a few words to the Senate. I do not need to pass compliments with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. He knows perfectly well, because I have very often told him, of my affection for him. There has been nothing, so far as he is concerned, of a personal nature that I have said about him.

I feel constrained, however, to say now that I listened with the most intense interest to his summation of the record of his committee. According other Members of the Senate the same reasonable degree of intelligence that I claim for myself, I assert there is not a Member of this body who has not been familiar with every circumstance the Senator from Missouri cited as the record of his committee. I submit that it did not require the expenditure of $125,000 or of 25 cents to have made that record available to the Munitions Committee.

All of us followed the circumstances of that period. All of us discriminated the attitude of our Government as between the belligerent nations. All of us understood the intensely controversial nature of the diplomatic correspondence between the Government of the United States and the British Government and other governments.

I recall one of the outstanding incidents of that correspondence was that the skillful foreign minister of Great Britain put the United States Government on the spot by producing the record of the United States Government in the War between the States and showing that the United States Government, over and over again, did exactly the same thing that we were complaining of Great Britain doing.

That is not a revelation which should have cost the committee $125,000. There is not a fact stated in the summation of the record by the Senator from Missouri that Senators of reasonable intelligence were not fully aware of.

I do not care to add anything to the controversy.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9870) to provide for the immediate payment of World War adjusted-service certificates, for the cancelation of unpaid interest accrued on loans secured by such certificates, and for other purposes.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, returning to the pending bill and the pending amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], I can gladly testify that as a member of the House in 1924 the Senator from Oklahoma voted for the payment of the bonus through the form of adjusted-compensation certificates and, when the President vetoed it, voted to override the veto.

In 1932 there were 18 votes cast in favor of payment of the bonus. The Senator from Oklahoma was then leading that fight. I was one of the 18 who voted for it. In 1935 again he was active in the fight. No one can doubt his sincerity or his activity in behalf of the payment of the adjusted-compensation certificates. At the same time, Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma has been equally interested in the subject which he explained at length to the Senate yesterday afternoon and this morning, that the payment should be made in the form of Treasury notes.

The Senator from Oklahoma, I know, would agree that during the last session of Congress the bonus bill took the form that he preferred. I was one of those who voted for the Vinson bill. The majority thought otherwise. On the final passage of the bill, sacrificing the views which I entertained, in order to vote for payment of the bonus, I voted for the Patman bill. Many other Members on the floor of the Senate did the same thing. It was vetoed, and when the vote was taken upon overriding the veto, the vote, as I recall, was 54 to 40. It was apparent then, and it is apparent now, that the bill in that form could not become law over the veto of the President.

Veterans of the United States doubtless enjoy the oratory of all of us in behalf of the bonus. Since that time at their banquets they may have listened to many more speeches, but speeches are all they have received. They never have had cash payment of the adjusted-compensation certificates. In this session of the Congress I have interested myself in endeavoring to bring about an adjustment which would give to them something more than oratory, which would bring an end to this fight.

In conference with other Members of the Senate, we finally agreed upon this bill. The Senator's amendment would go only to the method of payment. He desires to have this debt paid with Treasury notes. I submit to him as a friend of the veterans, when he has two proposals to which he has devoted his time, whether he will not be willing to see the accomplishment of one, the payment of the bonus, and not try to bring about the accomplishment of both the objects in which he has been so interested, because, if that were done, in view of the vote which was taken at the last session in the effort to override the veto, defeat would be certain; and no man has any reason to expect any change in the vote on the question of overriding a veto in this session of Congress.

So the question is whether we shall march up hill only to come down again, or whether we shall try to be practical and secure results.

I say to the Senator from Oklahoma that within the next 6 months there will become due Treasury obligations amounting to $4,477,000,000. If the Senator from Oklahoma, believing as he does in the wisdom of the plan proposed by him, wishes to have it tried as an experiment, I beg him to introduce a proposal to that effect as a separate bill and provide for the issuance of these Treasury notes to pay the $4,000,000,000 of obligations which must be met before next September. That would provide all he wants in the way of putting money into circulation. If it would raise prices, that would provide for raising prices. I beg him, however, not to try to tie such a provision on the bonus bill, in the light of what has happened heretofore.

If the Senator does not wish to take that course, I will say that it will be but a short time before an appropriation bill will come into the Senate to pay the salaries of the Senators and Representatives, their clerks, and all the employees of the Senate and House. Tie the proposal to that bill, and say that those expenses shall be met by issuing certificates in the manner the Senator from Oklahoma desires. Then, if that bill should be vetoed and could not pass over the veto, nobody would be hurt but the Senators and Representatives and the Capitol employees. But if the Senator's proposal should be tied on this bill, and the bill should be vetoed, the veterans of the United States for another long year would meet under the flag and call for the bonus and mourn because they did not get it.

That is a practical suggestion. If the proposal of the Senator from Oklahoma is meritorious, put it on anything else; put it on the relief bill; put it on any other bill, and provide that payment shall be made in the manner provided by the Senator's amendment.

The Senator from Oklahoma says the payment here provided would mean four bonuses. I think the Senator was in good humor and wished to have a little fun when he made that statement.

He said the first bonus was to pay the soldiers, and everybody was in favor of that. Then he said that if we should give the soldiers bonds, and they should cash the bonds a month later, the Treasury would have to issue bonds in order to pay that amount. Well, they would have to issue bonds anyway. We have $4,000,000,000 of obligations coming due. We shall have to issue bonds to meet those obligations; and if those bonds become due, and we print other bonds to take them up, we shall not be having any additional bonus. We shall simply be retiring one obligation with another obligation.

The Senator then said there was a bonus because of this Government life insurance. I think the Senator from Mississippi explained that matter this morning. It is not the war-risk policies to which reference is made but the life-insurance policies held by the soldiers. As a result of their holding those policies, a trust fund had to be established, and every policyholder has an interest in that trust fund. Every soldier who has a policy has a beneficial interest in it, just as a policyholder in any other life-insurance company has a similar interest. We have to maintain in good faith the interest rate of 4½ percent. By legislation it was reduced to 3½ percent; but each year the Treasury is taking from the adjusted-service-compensation fund an amount equal to 1 percent and is transferring it on the books and putting it in that insurance fund, so that every veteran who has an insurance policy has the comforting assurance that the trust fund is being maintained to make certain the payment of his life insurance. So there is not anything to the statement that a bonus is involved in transferring on the books of the Treasury a certain amount to straighten out that life-insurance fund.

The Senator from Oklahoma next speaks of the so-called "bonus" to the well to do. It is a very interesting fact that most persons assume that every man who borrowed on his adjusted-compensation certificate was needy.

I have been informed by officials of the Veterans' Administration that after Congress authorized loans on these certificates to the amount of 50 percent, the first man to telephone to ask how he could get his money was a man worth more than a million dollars. When asked the reason for his action he said, "I can get that money and make more money on it. Therefore I want it." Those are the kind of men who in many instances borrowed on the certificates. When we say there are 3,500,000 men holding certificates and 3,000,000 of them have borrowed it does not follow that the incomes of all those persons may be classified together.

The Senator calls them well to do. That term is not defined. What constitutes a well-to-do man? Many thrifty men who have not more than two or three thousand dollars to their names have held on to those certificates as insurance policies for the protection of their wives and their children. No man could call them wealthy. On the other hand, the millionaire has borrowed because in that way he can make more money out of the sum due him than by leaving it with the Government.

The fact is that we have to provide a way to pay the certificates, and no one has ever devised a better plan than this from the standpoint of the veteran.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair). The time of the Senator from South Carolina on the amendment has expired.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I shall use the time I have on the bill.

I deny that every one of the 3,000,000 men who have borrowed on their certificates will immediately cash these bonds. The very purpose of issuing the bonds in $50 denominations is to induce the owners to exercise a little thrift. The average amount of the certificates held by the veterans is $625. I know enough about human nature to know that when the average veteran gets $25 in cash, and sees that there is a provision for cashing the bonds in full, and says, "I can get real money for these bonds", when he comes back home and says, "I am thinking of selling my bonds to the Government", the old wife is going to say, "Now, here; wait 1 minute. You have $25 in cash. You may have had a good time today or tonight, but these bonds are all we have. Let us hold them", and if the average veteran can get hold of one of those $50 bonds, he will be luckier than most men of my acquaintance. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. While the Senator is on that subject, I wish he would explain the language on page 11, line 21, reading as follows:

In denominations of $50 or multiples thereof having a total face value up to the highest multiple of $50 in the amount certified as due the veteran.

As I understand, these bonds will not necessarily be in $50 denominations.

Mr. BYRNES. No; I will say to the Senator that I asked the same question yesterday. Under the language of the bill, as proposed to be amended, bonds of larger denominations may be printed. It is not the intention of the Treasury to print them, however.

I will say to the Senator that in this transfer into the United States Government life-insurance fund of $507,000,000 from the amount of bonds to be issued, the Treasury Department does not want to and should not, of course, print any $50 bonds just for the purpose of carrying them over. The amount involved is $507,000,000. The bonds ought to be printed in denominations of $10,000 or higher amounts, because it is a bookkeeping transaction, and should be a simple one.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, I am not complaining about that; but if, for instance, a veteran had $600 coming to him, he would get 12 bonds of $50 each.

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator is right.

Mr. NORRIS. But could he not get one bond of $600 instead? And if that were the case, that would not safeguard the payment afterward as the Senator has indicated.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, the thought of those of us who were drafting this bill was that if we should issue a $600 bond to the veteran the Senator has in mind, if that man wanted to get $50 or $100 to pay on something, he would have to sell his entire $600 bond. When he turned it in he would then have that much cash, and there would be every inducement to him to spend it.

Simply as an inducement to him not to spend it, when a man has 12 of these $50 bonds, which I continue to call "thrift bonds", if he owes $50 to someone, instead of having to go and sell his $600 bond and pay his $50 and have that much cash left, he can take one of the $50 bonds, go to the post office, get the money, pay the amount he owes, and then he will still have the other bonds left; and as each necessity arises he can meet it through cashing a bond.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that; but if he had a $600 bond he could not do that. It seems to me that if we should leave the denomination to the discretion of the veteran, he might think at the time he got the bond or the bonds that he never would want to get any money on them; but if he took a $600 bond instead of 12 $50 bonds, and afterward he needed $100 or $50 to tide him over some emergency, how could he get it without surrendering his whole bond and taking the whole amount of money?

Mr. BYRNES. I must say to the Senator that it was not the intention of the committee, and certainly it was not the intention of the Treasury Department, nor was it intended by the language of the committee amendment, to have anything printed but $50 bonds except in the case where the transfer is to be made to this insurance fund. All other bonds are to be printed as $50 bonds.

Mr. NORRIS. I call the attention of the Senator to the report on page 2, in the next to the last line, where it says:

Payments to veterans will be made by the issuance of nonnegotiable but immediate redeemable bonds to the greatest multiple of $50 contained in the amount due.

Mr. BYRNES. I do not know what the Senator is now reading from.

Mr. NORRIS. I am reading from the report made to the Senate by the chairman of the Finance Committee.

Mr. BYRNES. I had the bill in my hand. That is why I did not follow the Senator.

I say to the Senator that under the language of the bill it is left to the discretion of the Treasury to print a bond other than a $50 bond.

Mr. NORRIS. The report seems to indicate, from what I have read to the Senator, that it is the intention to pay in bonds of larger denomination.

Mr. BYRNES. I will say to the Senator that the intention is to print bonds of larger denomination only for the purpose of making the transfer in the Treasury I have described, and that all bonds issued to the veteran would be $50 bonds.

Mr. NORRIS. That is not what the report says.

Mr. BYRNES. It gives the discretion, undoubtedly, but it is not the intention that what the Senator suggests should be done.

I believe it will result in the cashing of these bonds over a long period of time. It is going to ease the strain on the Treasury and certainly be more beneficial to the veteran.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] said yesterday, and I think my friend the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] agreed, that there would be an inducement to a man to cash his bond and take the money and invest in a negotiable bond. That may or may not be so. The fact is that the veteran had a rather unfortunate experience with Liberty bonds just after the war. He had Liberty bonds, for which he paid $100, and he had to sell them for $90 or $85. As long as he holds the bonds to be issued under the pending bill he is guaranteed that he can get 100 cents on the dollar any day he wants it from the banks or from any post office designated. If he sold it and bought a negotiable bond, a Liberty bond, he might get 100 cents on the dollar today, but if the situation changed his bond might not be worth more than 95 or 96 or 98. When he sells this bond he gets a hundred cents on the dollar.

The veterans' organizations of this country for a long time have been divided in their views about this matter. Now they are united in their views. They know, after long study of it, that the bill now pending offers to them the best opportunity to secure a final adjustment of the matter.

We have so often considered this subject that it is unnecessary to refer to any of the things that actuated us in the original action of the Congress, but there is one matter which has always been in my mind, and which I have not heard referred to recently. During the war we gave to the civilian employees a bonus, and we called it a bonus. We paid them $240, as I recall it. When we came to the men who had been in the military service, there was opposition from the very day the payment of a bonus was proposed.

Something has been said about it being final when we gave them a contract of life insurance. It was not a contract, because a contract is mutually entered into. The veteran had nothing to say about the contract that was given him as an adjusted-service certificate; he took what he got. But he believed then that it should have been paid November 11, 1918, and that the interest should have been calculated from that date.

The veterans form the best cross-section of American citizenship; they believe this payment is honestly due to them, and a majority of the people of the United States think the matter should be disposed of. This I believe, and it is the time for the Congress to act, and if the Senate will pass the bill today and send it to the House and let the House concur in it on Monday, we can settle once for all this bonus question and make happy the 3,500,000 veterans throughout the United States.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I intend to vote for the payment now of the adjusted-compensation certificates.

Ever since I have been a Member of the Senate the bonus question has been a subject of constant conflict, the veterans demanding payment largely on the basis of need and the Treasury resisting payment on the basis of danger to the national credit. Four years ago the Treasury reported that a $2,000,000,000 expenditure for the veterans would wreck us economically. Since then a new administration with gay recklessness has spent almost six times as much.

Resistance to the bonus, therefore, cannot be supported by Treasury statements or by the economic policy of this administration. Bluntly, I favor paying off old debts before contracting new ones.

The adjusted-compensation certificates represent an established debt to the veterans, created by Congress in 1924, and while the debt would not legally mature until about 1945, no reason exists for delaying payment during an administration which has already demonstrated its ability to pay six times this sum, and its willingness and intention of spending a great deal more.

Inescapable debts already incurred must be paid, and it is better economy to start paying them than it is to go on wasting money in the meantime for "boondoggling."

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, it was 8 or 9 months ago when this body last considered the question of the immediate cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates. As I recall, we voted on the bill itself on May 7, 1935, and we voted on the question of overriding the veto on May 23 of last year.

After the vote was had upon the bill itself, and within a day or two of the time when the question arose here as to whether the veto should be overridden, a Member of the other House sent to very many of the veterans in his district a circular letter. In that form letter reference was made to me and to my attitude upon the so-called "bonus" question. In his letter he misstated my position, and whether his doing so was deliberate or not makes no difference now. I wish merely to state that ever since that time I have received letters from veterans in that district asking me why I was against the payment of the bonus, and why apparently I had changed my opinion from the time when I was so active in the ranks of the American Legion as just a private citizen in my State. In order, therefore, that the record may be straight I desire to make this very brief statement.

In the year 1932, when I was campaigning as a candidate for Senator from my State, I said to my people that if given the opportunity, if I were a Member of this body, I should be glad to vote for any bill that would provide for the immediate cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates. Since that time in many speeches and in hundreds and, perhaps, thousands of letters I have reiterated that position.

I stated in public, however, on many occasions, and also in many letters, that I was not in favor of any bonus bill, so called, being proposed as a rider or as an amendment to other kinds of legislation to which it had no possible reference. I stated my opposition to that course. Amendments are often proposed for the purpose of defeating the bill to which it is sought to attach them. I did state, however, that I should be glad of the opportunity to vote in favor of any reasonable measure for the payment of the veterans' adjusted-service certificates when the question might be presented upon its merits.

The first opportunity that came to register such a vote since I have been a Member of this body was on May 7 of last year. I was in favor of and personally liked better the Vinson bill. I think the American Legion was entirely justified in sponsoring the Vinson bill in accordance with the mandate of its national convention at Miami. However, it appeared to me at that time that the Patman bill had a better chance of being enacted. It seemed to me, under the pledge I had made in my campaign, that it was my duty to vote for any reasonable bill which had the best chance of enactment, and therefore I voted in favor of the Patman bill.

I am very happy that now the various veteran organizations—the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Disabled American Veterans—have come to an agreement as to the kind of bill that is best suited to the needs of the veterans, and that is the bill which is here before us.

On May 23 last I voted to override the veto of the President. I hope I will not be called upon to vote to override a veto of this particular bill. However, if that occasion shall arise, I conceive it to be my duty to vote to override any such veto.

Mr. President, as part of my remarks, at this point in my address I ask unanimous consent to have printed a short table giving the schedule, by counties, of the amounts of the bonus payments to be made to the veterans in the State of Wisconsin if this bill shall become a law.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Wisconsin (88,036 certificate holders): Adams $128,496.17, Ashland $338,043.03, Barron $550,736.86, Bayfield $240,936.34, Brown $1,127,917.95, Buffalo $246,138.48, Burnett $164,801.05, Calumet $270,511.49, Chippewa $599,563.16, Clark $548,553.24, Columbia $489,756.17, Crawford $269,435.74, Dane $1,810,105.28, Dodge $836,389.16, Door $291,930.20, Douglas $747,936.65, Dunn $434,106.06, Eau Claire $659,692.88, Florence $60,499.01, Fond du Lac $961,481.46, Forest $178,510.61, Grant $617,658.27, Green $351,144.72 Green Lake $223,387.13, Iowa $321,746.19, Iron $159,484.25, Jackson $264,410.21, Jefferson $590,619.96, Juneau $277,190.79, Kenosha $1,015,975.52, Kewaunee $257,490.08, La Crosse $874,329.48, Lafayette $299,428.35, Langlade $345,910.47, Lincoln $338,232.04, Manitowoc $942,069.75, Marathon $1,134,019.23, Marinette $538,357.68, Marquette $150,733.73, Milwaukee $11,644,822.73, Monroe $461,433.39, Oconto $423,653.62, Oneida $255,274.35, Outagamie $1,008,156.24, Ozaukee $279,278.07, Pepin $119,617.20, Pierce $337,866.41, Polk $426,559.76, Portage $543,126.32, Price $277,511.91, Racine $1,448,524.16, Richland $313,493.40, Rock $1,191,451.54, Rusk $258,196.54, St. Croix $408,705.48, Sauk $514,273.68, Sawyer $142,545.17, Shawano $536,132.90, Sheboygan $1,143,749.16, Taylor $283,950.36, Trempealeau $373,898.96, Vernon $458,194.08, Vilas $117,112.47, Walworth $498,667.25, Washburn $178,269.77, Washington $426,302.86, Waukesha $840,660.05, Waupaca $538,084.73, Waushara $231,639.92, Winnebago $1,229,242.84, Wood $607,960.44; total $47,177,680.61.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I make bold to occupy what I feel will be but a few minutes—intruding myself upon the bill, but not entering upon debatable grounds respecting figures and computations. I have in mind an error which ought to be corrected before the American public. It is to that I shall allude—to excise an excrescence from the measure that brings it to ridicule or contempt.

In one of the letters of Pliny on Roman life he refers to a session of the Roman Senate when the Gabinian law was before that body, looking to compensation and reward in land or money to the soldiers who had returned from the field after having defeated the advance of the foreign army upon the imperial Roman nation. Outside of the gate of the senate—says the writer—there stood a man with one side of his body lost to view. When a sentinel guarding in front of this Roman Senate approached the man, pulled him slightly forward, and said, "What are you waiting for here?"

The soldier replied, "I want to go in."

"Well, who speaks for you?"

The waiting individual turned his body and disclosed one of his arms cleft from his body, and, turning to the sentinel, said, "Will not this speak for me? I left the arm on the field."

Mr. President, may not these who seek their due rewards turn to this honorable body and, recalling their sacrifices, their losses, and the deaths of their comrades, the agonies the living have endured, exclaim, "Will not these speak for us?"

Mr. President, the one thing I wish done is to clarify before the American public that which I feel has been a great misrepresentation and misunderstanding. All over this country—from those who speak of themselves in opposition—comes the constant statement against the soldier seeking a bonus, intimating he is guilty of imposition. I now define the injustice.

Mr. President, there has lately gone out from the records gathered here statements of salaries of $100,000 and $200,000 to eminent officials of great financial institutions. To these there is disclosed some $25,000 to $50,000 to $65,000 added upon the basis of what is spoken of as "bonus." It is very natural that the country at large should take the word "bonus" as addressed to the soldiers as similar to that which they read of in connection with these large salaries and their attached bonuses. It is natural that the country at large takes the word "bonus" in the same sense as applied to these very large offerings and compensations in industry and commerce. Many of those who have not understood within these last years all the things which have transpired in government on the legislation as to the soldiers' compensation are inclined to regard this demand in the bill before the Congress as an expression of a bonus, some favor to be granted to the soldier as a gratuity from the Government, and this for no reason whatever except as a grant. This is being construed in many quarters as a deliberate compensation tendered the soldier by Congressmen as pay for his political support and something which is extended to him upon the theory that he will reward the vote by his political advocacy; or punish the omission of it by his political opposition.

It is as to that phase of the question that I inject myself at this moment, and to which I address myself. Mr. President, there is no such thing before this body, in this bill or otherwise, as a bonus for the ex-soldier—there is no such thing contemplated in the measure. Eminent Senators alluding to the expression "bonus" do so because the word has long occupied public attention as something which designates the measure but not as something that defines the purpose.

These soldiers are to receive from the Government what I respectfully submit is a payment of debt created by Congress. The able Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] well stated that there was no contract between the soldier and the legislation. Yet, sir, we cannot deny that there was a contract between the legislation and the people and the people's representatives and the country.

What was it? It is that the soldier, conscious of the fact that he had lost his position and work, lost his salary, lost his possessions, his family dependent upon him, is with no recourse and no refuge. It is assumed to return to him something of that which he has lost and which is necessary for his maintenance in life as a citizen of this country and for the support of those who are dependent upon him. Thus it was, sir, that the measure came forth as a fulfillment of faith pledged.

I may be pardoned for saying I am not without some knowledge of what may be called the genesis of the legislation. I, too, was one of the legislators.

Now this honorable body is concerned with the question of keeping faith with the contract which was made with the country. Passing for the moment the methods of payment and the time of installments, let me say that the question before us is, Shall we do justice to the men with whom we have entered upon this honorable undertaking?

Mr. President, Sir James McIntosh—at a critical hour of the English Government—standing before that great legislative body, turned to those who were a part of the House of Lords and said:

> My Lords, I ask for civil justice. Give me civil justice and I will drive out every tyrant who now threatens the Crown. Deny it, and there is not a petty despot who cannot soon undermine the very foundation of the Government.

Here today I beg to call to the attention of the Senate the fact that from time to time there comes the echo of some threat to our land from what is called the Communist within and dangers from the enemy without. If that which is threatened shall take the form of some expression of action, let us believe that by doing justice to those who are the soldiers of the Nation we invite them again to revive that spirit of patriotism and sacrifice for their country, lately diminished. They then will delight to save and succor a country which has been faithful to its obligations, doing him civil justice. When this is done to these men, we need have no fear of the future of our country, its protection, or its security. These grateful soldiers will turn to their flag, and, saluting it, in the words of the great revolutionary hero proclaim > America, thy sentinel am I!

I thank the Senate.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, I came to the Congress in the spring of 1931. I came favoring the immediate cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates. Whenever a bill or an amendment to a bill has been proposed providing for the prompt and immediate payment of these certificates I have cast my vote in favor of the measure. I have never spoken either in the House or in the Senate upon this question. I have not done so, mainly because I have felt that no argument I might advance, and, so far as that goes, no argument that perhaps any other Senator might advance, would change a single vote. I have no hope or expectation that anything I may say now will have any influence whatsoever upon the deliberations of this body.

I wish, however, for the RECORD to show why it is that I propose to cast my vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma. I know the very serious study which the Senator has given to the financial problems and monetary policies of our Government. I appreciate the value of those contributions which he has made upon that subject to the Senate of the United States. But, Mr. President, I agree with the thought expressed by the Senator from South Carolina. I believe, however meritorious may be the suggestions of financial policy contained in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma, and considered as an independent measure, that such financial policy should not be mixed with the main question before the Senate. It has been my observation that whenever the matter of paying these certificates has come up before Congress we have been confronted with alarms as to the credit of the United States, and the measures proposing the payment of these certificates have been to some extent confused with different fiscal policies which different Members of Congress advocate.

I look upon the plan proposed in the bill presented by the Committee on Finance as presenting a ready, feasible, practical, common-sense plan to pay these certificates in cash at the option of the veteran. It is a simple proposition.

If the veteran does not want cash, he may retain the bonds that are given him and draw interest thereon, or, under the interpretation placed upon the bill by the Senator from South Carolina, he may retain any portion of the bonds and cash any other portion of the bonds. He can therefore take the bonds and keep them as an investment, in whole or in part, or he can present them and secure cash for them. I repeat, it is a simple proposition.

I do think, Mr. President, when this Finance Committee has given the earnest consideration that it has to this question and has presented a bill that calls for the immediate payment of the adjusted-service certificates, we should not undertake to support any measure, however well intended, that might serve to muddy the waters. I feel satisfied that the bill reported by the committee is one that will be voted for by the Senate and will meet with the approval of the other House.

I also entertain the hope, Mr. President, that when this bill shall finally go to the White House it will this time meet with the approval of the Chief Executive of our Nation. I am inclined to that view and entertain that hope for the reasons expressed by the chairman of the Finance Committee yesterday when he said, in effect, that year after year the proposal to pay these certificates has grown in popular favor; that year after year and session after session the cause has become stronger and stronger in the other House and in the Senate; and that the views of men have been constantly changing in respect to the policy that ought to be pursued by our Government in this matter. I entertain the hope that, in all probability, when the President of the United States knows that the Congress of the United States has again, by an overwhelming majority, expressed its approbation and its approval of the payment of these certificates he will come to the conclusion that it is to the best interests of the Republic that the bill be approved and payment of the certificates be made and the whole controversy brought to a final conclusion.

I cannot hope, Mr. President, to compete with the eloquent Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] in his historical illustrations with which he so illumines at times his discourse, and which he employed today in the remarks which he so eloquently made just preceding my rising to my feet; but, in humble imitation of the style of the Senator from Illinois, permit me, in expressing the hope that in the event the President shall conclude again to veto the bill it will be passed over his veto by the Congress of the United States, to relate an incident of which I one time read in connection with the history of Napoleon Bonaparte. That great military genius found on one occasion that the tide of battle was going against him and he concluded that it would be best to order a retreat. He summoned his favorite drummer boy and gave the command to him, "Beat a retreat." The drummer boy looked up in surprise at the great general, and said, "Sire, I do not know how to beat a retreat; I know how to beat a charge. I have beaten a charge many times for you. I have beaten it at Lodi, at Austerlitz, and at Marengo, and at other great battles. No, sire; do not ask me to beat a retreat, but let me beat the charge once more." Napoleon ordered the charge to be sounded, and once more he carried his troops to victory. So I close, Mr. President, by expressing the hope that in the event this bill shall come back to us again encumbered with a Presidential veto we will not order a retreat, we will not beat a retreat, we will not make any retreat; but that the Congress of the United States will beat a charge that will carry this cause to victory.

Mr. HASTINGS obtained the floor.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. LEWIS. I reannounce the absence of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] and the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] for the reason stated on the previous roll call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ninety-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, the records of the Committee on Finance show that I voted to report the bill favorably. I did not intend to so vote, although that record is due to my own carelessness and not the fault of any other person. I realize as I rise in my place that I am in the minority, but I may say to the Senate that I have been in that position so often lately that I do not feel entirely out of place.

The bill is undoubtedly an important one. It affects many people of the Nation. From the point of view of many Senators, what we are about to do is a just thing, a necessary thing, in order that the Government may deal justly with the veterans. We must appreciate in the first place, however, that what we are doing is paying a debt 9½ years before it is due, at an extra cost to the Government of $1,300,000,000.

I appreciate that the objective of this generosity is a worthy one. I make no complaint about that. It may be that the amount granted to the soldier in the first place was very much less than it should have been. What I am thinking about now, however, is that I am being called upon to vote an extra $1,300,000,000 at a time when 10,000,000 or 11,000,000 people are out of work, at a time when the public debt is greater than it ever has been before, and at a time when the demand for relief is coming from all the important centers of this great country of ours.

I should like to invite attention, in the first place, to the progress of the Federal debt from February 28, 1933, until the 1st of July 1937. February 28, 1933, the public debt was $20,934,728,350. That is the condition in which the President found the Treasury when he took his oath of office. Six days after he took that oath of office he sent to the Congress a message, a message from which I have quoted many times, and the details of which are known to every Senator, if not to the whole country. I might call attention to two or three important things in it which I am sure impressed the Congress and which I know impressed the country as a whole.

The President called our attention to the fact that the deficit in the United States Treasury was increasing rapidly and that by the end of the fiscal year 1934, unless something was done about it, that deficit would reach the huge sum of $5,000,000,000. In that same message he called attention to the fact that the country was definitely on the road to bankruptcy and that what he wanted the Congress to do was to pass the Economy Act—an act which would do what? The Economy Act was to give the President authority to reduce, under its terms, the pay of Federal employees by 15 percent.

But this bold President dared to do more than any other President had ever done and he proposed to reduce the amount of money paid to the American veterans by an amount which would ultimately balance his Budget and reduce the deficit and prevent it from reaching the huge sum of $5,000,000,000. A great many Members of this body opposed that measure because they were afraid to trust the President of the United States with the great responsibility of reducing the amount being paid the disabled veteran who had served his country and who was now suffering from illness of one kind or another. I voted for the measure. I voted for it because I was afraid not to do so. I voted for it because the Executive of the Nation had stated that we were on the road to bankruptcy and something drastic like that must be done.

Shortly afterwards, the President issued Executive orders reducing the amount of money being paid to the Federal employees and reducing the amount of money that was being paid to the disabled veterans. When those reports began to come back to the Congress many of us believed that a great injustice had been done the disabled soldier in this effort to economize. Various measures were proposed in the Congress. One of them at least, the most important of all of them, was passed by the Congress and sent to the President, and he promptly vetoed it. I voted to override his veto because I believed that the disabled veterans were being improperly treated and that after all it had become dangerous to turn that important job over to any particular individual, whether he be the Chief Executive or not.

Subsequent to that time on the floor of the Senate there was introduced by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. McGILL] a bill which would bring back to the Spanish War veterans the amount of money they had been receiving prior to the time the Economy Act was passed. The distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the leader on the Democratic side of this body, offered an amendment to the bill which sought to reduce the amount until it was equal to the Executive order then in force. That was debated on the floor of the Senate, and when it came to a vote there was not a single vote except my own against the measure. I do not know what I would have done if I had known I was going to be in such a minority as that, but I still believe these men had not been treated unfairly, as had been the veterans of the World War, and that they could stand that cut a little while longer and until the Government had had an opportunity to improve its financial condition.

Then came a proposal for the payment of the soldiers' bonus in cash in 1935. That was debated on the floor of the Senate. I said nothing with respect to it, but merely cast my vote. It was finally passed by the Senate and by the House of Representatives and went to the President. The President vetoed it. It came back here and the veto was sustained by a comparatively small majority.

In the meantime, between February 28, 1933, and the date of that veto message, the public debt had increased by approximately $8,000,000,000 during the 2 years and 3 months of the administration that had elapsed, or to a total sum of $28,638,881,498. In the next 8 months it had been increased by about $2,000,000,000, bringing it up to a new high on December 31, 1935, of $30,557,324,062. Add to that the startling figures given in the testimony of the Secretary of the Treasury, and it will be found that by July 1, 1937, the public debt will be $35,563,000,000, without taking into account the possibility of having to return to the processors about one billion of money which has been paid under an act which has been declared unconstitutional.

Notwithstanding all these facts which I state to the Senate, we are assured by the chairman of the Finance Committee that while he cannot speak for the President of the United States, he hopes the President will sign this bill; but he is satisfied that the bill is to become a law whether the President shall approve it or not.

I wonder why it is that the Senate and the country do not know where the President stands upon this important subject. We saw him come before the Congress within recent weeks, and heard him deliver an address upon "the state of the Union"; but not a single word did he say from which anybody could gather his position with respect to this bonus matter.

It seems to me a reading of the President's veto message would convince anybody that less than 8 months afterward he is sure to veto this particular bill. On the other hand, there is evidence which indicates to my mind that he will not veto it.

If I did not know anything about this veto in May 1935 and I saw upon this floor the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee urging his friends in the Senate, urging his Democratic colleagues as well as his Republican colleagues to support this measure, and read what he says to the newspapers and to the committee about having framed this bill in conjunction with the distinguished leader on the other side, if it were not for this veto message of the President in May 1935, I should say beyond all question the President of the United States would approve this measure.

On more than one occasion we have heard it said on this floor by distinguished men who were close to the President, "If you add this amendment, it will mean a veto. If you pass this bill, it will meet a veto." But here, upon a great question—a question affecting millions of people, and making it necessary to appropriate billions of dollars—we find nobody able to say what the President of the United States will do with respect to it.

Mr. President, some will say that this bill is different from the bill we once considered; it is different from the one the President vetoed. That is true; but my contention is that it is substantially true with respect to one thing only, and that is the method of payment—whether greenbacks shall be issued or whether bonds shall be sold and the money raised in the regular way with which to pay the bonus.

Mr. President, it will not do for the chairman of the committee or for the President of the United States to undertake to prove to the country that there is any great difference between these two bills except the one I have mentioned. This is nothing more nor less than a cash payment of this obligation 9½ years before it is due.

I know it is said that we are going to issue bonds, and I know it is said that there is a hope that the soldiers will not cash the bonds until 1945. There is a hope that they will not cash the bonds until they need the money. Five hundred thousand of the soldiers have not borrowed anything on their certificates, and it is argued that the chances are that those 500,000 will hold on to the bonds as an investment.

Mr. President, I first call your attention to the fact that a bond of this kind does not bear compound interest. If the soldier keeps his bond, it is true that he is entitled to 3-percent interest annually, but he does not collect a dime of the interest until he cashes his bond; and when he gets to figuring on what that means to him the chances are that he will take his money instead, and nobody will blame him if he does.

The distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] states that there is another reason why the soldier will hold onto the bonds. I am certain Secretary Morgenthau would not approve of the statement. The Senator says another reason why the soldier should hold onto the bonds is that he is always certain to be able to get from the Treasury 100 cents on the dollar on these bonds, whereas if he transfers the money to some other Government bonds they may be reduced in value, and when he goes to cash them they will not be worth 100 cents on the dollar.

Mr. President, I am very much afraid that is true. I am very much afraid what we are doing here today will reduce the value of all the outstanding bonds until they are worth very much less than par. I call attention, however, to the fact that I do not know that the soldier is as safe with these bonds as the Senator from South Carolina intimates. I do not know how soon the Government will repudiate the payment of all its bonds, including those that it proposes to give to the soldier today; and if I were in the soldier's place I would not take any chance on that. I would take the money as soon as I could get it because of the fear that when I did go to get it there would not be any money there for me.

No, Mr. President; I repeat that we cannot find a distinction between the two bills that warrants us in approving one and disapproving the other, except as to the feature of issuing greenbacks.

I know a few Senators who wanted to vote for the cash bonus as soon as they had an opportunity, and voted against it 8 months ago because of what they called the inflationary feature. I think there were some Members of the Senate who were opposed to paying the bonus unless it did include the inflationary feature. So I have nothing to say with respect to those who opposed it before because of that, and who now have changed their views. In fact, I have no complaint of anybody, Mr. President. Many loyal and faithful Senators on this floor have been urging at every opportunity the payment of this bonus in cash. I have no complaint of them. There are many of them who have told their people back home that when they got here they would take the very first opportunity to give the soldiers this cash bonus. I have no complaint of them. My complaint goes only to those who have changed their views in less than 8 months, when they find that the public debt is already $2,000,000,000 more than it was then, and with the assurance that it is going to be increased about $5,000,000,000 more.

But, Mr. President, let me call attention to one part of the bill of 1935 which is not in the present bill, and that is the three "whereas" clauses, reading as follows:

> Whereas the immediate cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates will increase tremendously the purchasing power of millions of the consuming public, distributed uniformly throughout the Nation, and will provide relief for the holders thereof who are in dire need and distress because of the present unfortunate economic conditions; and will lighten immeasurably the burden which cities, counties, and States are now required to carry for relief; and
> Whereas the payment of said certificates will not create any additional debt, but will discharge and retire an acknowledged contract obligation of the Government; and
> Whereas since the Government of the United States is now definitely committed to the policy of spending additional sums of money for the purpose of hastening recovery from the present economic crisis, the immediate cash payment at face value of the adjusted-service certificates, with cancelation of interest accrued and refund of interest paid, is a most effective means to that end: Therefore
> Be it enacted—

And so forth.

Mr. President, in the President's veto message he literally destroyed every one of these "whereas" clauses; and he destroyed them so completely that the committee, when presenting this bill in both Houses of the Congress, said not a single word as an excuse or reason why they were doing it; and I think they are to be commended for taking that course, because, as the President pointed out, all of these "whereas" clauses were put in merely as excuses or reasons, many of which were not true in fact.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to call attention to some of the language of the President of the United States in this veto message. I think it is worth while to refresh our recollections as to what he said, regardless of whether or not we know what he is going to do with the present bill.

The President went on to show how this bonus certificate was made up. I think it is not necessary for me to read that part of his message. You are all familiar with it from the mere statement of the fact.

He further said:

> Since 1924 the only major change in the original settlement was the act of 1931, under which veterans were authorized to borrow up to 50 percent of the face value of their certificates as of 1945. Three million veterans have already borrowed under this provision an amount which, with interest charges, totals $1,700,000,000.
> The bill before me provides for the immediate payment of the 1945 value of the certificates. It means paying $1,600,000,000 more than the present value of the certificates. It requires an expenditure of more than $2,200,000,000 in cash for this purpose. It directs payment to the veterans of a much larger sum than was contemplated in the 1924 settlement. It is nothing less than a complete abandonment of that settlement. It is a new straight gratuity or bounty to the amount of $1,600,000,000.

Which in this bill, as I figure it, is $1,300,000,000.

It destroys the insurance protection for the dependents of the veterans provided in the original plan. For the remaining period of 10 years they will have lost this insurance.

This proposal, I submit, violates the entire principle of veterans' benefits so carefully formulated at the time of the war and also the entire principle of the adjusted-certificate settlement of 1924.

Further along in the veto message he says:

I hold that that able-bodied citizen, because he wore a uniform and for no other reason, should be accorded no treatment different from that accorded to other citizens who did not wear a uniform during the World War.

Further along the President said:

The statement in this same second "whereas" clause that payment will discharge and retire an acknowledged contract obligation of the Government is, I regret to say, not in accordance with the fact. It wholly omits and disregards the fact that this contract obligation is due in 1945 and not today.

If I, as an individual, owe you, an individual Member of the Congress, $1,000 payable in 1945, it is not a correct statement for you to tell me that I owe you $1,000 today. As a matter of practical fact, if I put $750 into a Government savings bond today and make that bond out in your name, you will get $1,000 on the due date, 10 years from now. My debt to you today, therefore, cannot under the remotest possibility be considered more than $750.

The final "whereas" clause, stating that spending the money is the most effective means of hastening recovery, is so ill considered that little comment is necessary.

Further along the President said:

The core of the question is that a man who is sick or under some other special disability because he was a soldier should certainly be assisted as such. But if a man is suffering from economic need because of the depression, even though he is a veteran, he must be placed on a par with all of the other victims of the depression. The veteran who is disabled owes his condition to the war. The healthy veteran who is unemployed owes his troubles to the depression. Each presents a separate and different problem. Any attempt to mingle the two problems is to confuse our efforts.

Mr. President, let me call attention to this language:

I cannot in honesty assert to you that to increase that deficit this year by $2,200,000,000 will in itself bankrupt the United States. Today the credit of the United States is safe. But it cannot ultimately be safe if we engage in a policy of yielding to each and all of the groups that are able to enforce upon the Congress claims for special consideration. To do so is to abandon the principles of government by and for the American people and to put in its place government by and for political coercion by minorities. We can afford all that we need, but we cannot afford all that we want.

I do not need to be a prophet to assert that if these certificates, due in 1945, are paid in full today every candidate for election to the Senate or to the House of Representatives will in the near future be called upon in the name of patriotism to support general pension legislation for all veterans regardless of need or age.

Finally, I invite your attention to the fact that solely from the point of view of the good credit of the United States, the complete failure of the Congress to provide additional taxes for an additional expenditure of this magnitude would in itself and by itself alone warrant disapproval of this measure.

Now, I wish to read the final paragraph.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. STEIWER. Is the Senator reading with approval the argument the President made in the veto message?

Mr. HASTINGS. I think I will ultimately make myself clear.

Mr. STEIWER. If I may be more specific, I wondered whether the Senator approves the President's proposition that failure to provide taxes was a valid objection when it is remembered that the legislation in question was a greenback bill and required no revenue.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I have always been prepared to vote taxes whenever the President said it was necessary to sustain the credit of the Government, but like every other Senator I have been anxious to postpone the levying of new taxes as long as it was possible or practicable to do so. I think the question as to whether or not taxes are necessary in order to meet an obligation of the Government must necessarily be a question for the Executive, and if the bill had been passed over his veto and the Executive had demanded new taxes I would have been willing to cooperate with any committee of the Senate in an effort to raise sufficient taxes to meet that obligation.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. STEIWER. Is not the Senator overlooking the fact that the bill before the President was the Patman bill, which provided for the payment of the bonus by currency expansion, and that, therefore, there was involved no question of taxes? And if the Senator will permit me to add there are many valid objections which may be urged against any currency expansion scheme, but the objection that taxes were not provided when they are not needed is most unusual and unsound.

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not desire to comment any further upon that. This message comes nearer meeting my approval than anything else the President ever did say, and if I could approve all of it I should be glad to do so. But that is not important, it seems to me.

I wish now to read the last paragraph of the message.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time on the amendment has expired. He has 15 minutes on the bill.

Mr. HASTINGS. I will take 15 minutes on the bill.

The last paragraph of the message is as follows:

I am thinking of those who died in the cause of America here and abroad, in uniform and out; I am thinking of the widows and orphans of all of them; I am thinking of 5,000,000 of Americans who, with their families, are today in dire need, supported in whole or in part by Federal, State, and local governments who have decreed that they shall not starve. I am thinking not only of the past, not only of today, but of the years to come. In this future of ours it is of first importance that we yield not to the sympathy which we would extend to a single group or class by special legislation for that group or class, but that we should extend assistance to all groups and all classes who in an emergency need the helping hand of their Government.

Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the chairman of the Committee on Finance, told us yesterday that he, with the Democratic leader on the other side, had tramped to the White House and had tramped to the offices of various Senators in their effort to reach a conclusion about the kind of a bill which ought to be offered here. I assume that when they went to the White House they must of necessity have considered with the President what he said in 1935. I can hear the distinguished Senator from Mississippi now reading this language to the President, and it occurs to me that when he got through reading it the President might very well have said, "Well, Pat, what did you say in May 1935?" That would bring us to what the distinguished Senator from Mississippi did say upon that subject. I think it is important to know what his attitude was with respect to the matter.

I do not overlook the fact that the President has recently said, "We will not retreat", and he said that twice within a single week, but I am wondering whether it be true that he took his military advisers into his confidence and said to them, "While I cannot retreat, of course, I have no control over some of my lieutenant generals, and lieutenant commanders, and Kentucky colonels [laughter], and all of those people who have been accustomed to advise me."

Let us see, however, what the Senator from Mississippi said. I made no speech when that bill came back here. I did not have to. I did not need to convince anyone. The Senator from Mississippi was sufficient to convince enough Senators to sustain the President's veto. I had no hope of convincing anyone, anyway, and I did not try to interrupt the Senator from Mississippi in his effort.

His speech is to be found on page 8353 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It appears under date of May 23, 1935, and just at the top of the page, by the way, is something which may afford an explanation of the inspiration which came to the Senator at the time he made that speech. I refer to the closing remarks of the distinguished Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], who now sits by the side of the chairman of the Committee on Finance. He said:

While there's grief to need redress,
A balance to adjust;
Where weighs our living manhood less
Than Mammon's vilest dust,
While there's a right to need my vote,
A wrong to sweep away,
Up! clouted knee and ragged coat,
A man's a man today!

Mr. President, following that the Senator from Mississippi addressed the Senate in this language:

I do not know that I can wholly agree with the view expressed by the distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], when he said that no question about "coming back here" is involved in this matter. I am willing to concede that, however. I have not the slightest idea that any Senator, in casting his vote either pro or con on this question, does so with the thought of its effect on his "coming back here." I am not unmindful of the fact that the vote I am about to cast, so far as the ex-service man is concerned, will not be a popular vote.

I have tried in this body, and I hope to continue so long as I am in this body, not to measure my actions here from a political standpoint. Perhaps the easy way, the course of least resistance, would be to vote to override the President's veto. Somehow or other, however, I am not built that way. I have made no promises to my constituents, as some Senators have to theirs, whether they be ex-service men or otherwise, that they were for the Patman bill or the Vinson bill or what not.

Mr. President, I do not read that for the purpose of indicating or even intimating that the Senator from Mississippi has changed his mind for any such purpose as he was discussing here. I know enough about him and I know enough about the people of his State to know that they would return him here regardless of what their position was with respect to the bonus, and I am sure the same thing is true with respect to the distinguished leader on the other side, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]; at least I hope it is true in both instances.

However, Mr. President, while I am quite certain that what the Senator talked about here did not apply to the Senator from Mississippi personally, I am by no means certain that he did not have in mind a greater political interest than that, namely, the interest of reelecting his Chief, the President of the United States. I know the Senator from Mississippi would think that was of such great importance that he could go a long way with his own conscience in order to accomplish that. I can understand now how he could say to the President in discussing it:

Have you noticed the Literary Digest? Have you noticed the poll that is being conducted? You have observed how the popularity of the New Deal has been shifting? While it was once 62 percent in favor to 38 percent against the New Deal, the vote is now exactly the reverse. Now it is 38 percent in favor and 62 percent against. We have condemned the plutocrat. We have run out the autocrat. We are losing every day thousands of Democrats. And with the plutocrats, autocrats, and a lot of Democrats gone from the party is it not necessary that we do something to strengthen it? We have yet a chance with the farmers. We have yet a chance with the laboring man. Now, let us do something for the soldier and gather in that minority group in order that we may save this situation.

Oh, I do not know that that happened. I do not know whether it did or not. Let me continue with the speech of the distinguished Senator from Mississippi to show other reasons why he was against the bill:

I sympathize with the ex-service man in the position he has taken that he believes the adjusted-service certificates are now due. He cannot be blamed, he should not be blamed, because he has been told by some of the most eloquent of men in this body and in the other body, and by some of the leaders of the ex-service men's organizations, that the money is now due. We listened today to a splendid speech from my friend from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], whom I love. Could anyone blame the most unsuspecting ex-service man sitting in a hall crowded with people, hearing his matchless eloquence as he poured it forth in this Chamber today, for believing that his adjusted-service certificate is now due and that his Government has betrayed him in not paying it at this time? Why, I almost fell under the Senator's spell. He is most persuasive. You know and I know that some leaders have gone forth and have played upon these men, and have told them in their gatherings that the Government was unfair to them, that the adjusted-service certificates were due, and that is why they have been led to make this appeal to the Congress.

Let me read this to the Senate with respect to the bill and the difference between it and the former bill, which justifies a change in the vote. Here is what the Senator from Mississippi says:

It is a bad day for the United States when groups can control our Government, and it is a bad day for Congress when groups can dictate the policies and actions of Congress. This is not a Government of groups, and men who are supposed to be leaders, especially men in public life, serve the highest purposes of citizenship when they try to lead their fellow citizen whether they belong to a group or not, along the right line. I am not playing my part as a citizen of this country if I try to mislead some fellow citizen, inflame his mind, arouse his passion, and make him hate other men. But that is what some have done in this bonus controversy.

How many more minutes do I have, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Five minutes.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, does the Senator ask to be given more time in order that he may read a good speech to the Senate?

Mr. HASTINGS. I think I have read most of the speech which is important. Then the Senator goes on:

Why should the President of the United States, who would approve such a measure, be criticized? I say to those who are enthusiastically trying to override the President's veto that if they will just get together with some of us and with the President of the United States they can get some relief for the ex-service man, and a measure to that end will pass this body. But just so long as men say that it has to be "full payment or nothing", they will have their troubles and their difficulties.

When we brought forward a bill which would have met the approval of the President of the United States, some of us appealed to you to support it and get this question behind us, and let it receive the Presidential approval. But no, you would not do it.

Some of us who thought we knew what the sentiment of the Senate was, said that the President's veto would be sustained. Others said to the representatives of the ex-service organizations and to the country, "Ah, we have the votes. We will override the President's veto."

Mr. President, that speech was made less than 8 months ago. It seems to me that there ought to be some explanation made to the Senate as to why there has been a change.

In that connection I asked those Senators who are compelled to vote upon the bill to read the testimony of the Secretary of the Treasury. If anyone can read the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury and then not be afraid to place this additional burden upon the country, it seems to me he does not quite understand the difficulties confronting the Secretary of the Treasury. Why the Secretary of the Treasury did not tell the committee that he was opposed to this bonus bill I do not know, unless it be that he did not know what his Chief wanted him to tell the committee; but if I had been as afraid of the future conditions of the finances of this country as the Secretary of the Treasury was, I would have told the Finance Committee that they dare not pass this bill now unless they provide the money. All the officials appearing before the committee insist that when we pass this bill we must appropriate approximately $2,000,000,000 in order to meet the bonds when they are presented for payment.

I submit if that be true, we might just as well look the facts in the face. I appreciate that many Senators are voting for the bill because they say, "What is the use? What is the use of trying to save anything? There is nothing we can do under this administration toward economy."

I myself would be willing to pay the bonus out of the $4,800,000,000 appropriation heretofore made, because I think the Government then, from a financial standpoint, would in the end be very much ahead, but I will agree with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] that the present administration is spending so much money that no one is trying to save anything. It is exactly that attitude of the administration which has brought the veterans to the point of changing their own view. For many years the conventions of the veterans insisted that the bonus should not be paid, and it is only since we have taken on this business of spending and giving money to everybody that the soldiers come in and demand what they say is "ours, because we might just as well get ours while the getting is good."

I appreciate that many Members of the Senate are changing their positions because of that situation, but, Mr. President, I have opposed with all the vigor that I possess all the measures which the present administration has put through the Congress, and which have brought upon the country so great a debt. I have opposed nearly all of them, and I continue to oppose them, because of the financial condition in which today we find the Government of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Delaware has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I have no desire to postpone the final vote on the pending measure or on any amendment which may be submitted to it; but there are certain things which I think ought to be cleared up with reference to the measure, and its consequences, and the implications which have been applied to it, and so I desire to take a few minutes of the Senate's time for that purpose.

We all appreciate the good humor and charm of our delightful friend from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], who has read with particular emphasis excerpts from the speech delivered by the Senator from Mississippi last year in relation to the veto message of the President. It is always easy and sometimes amusing to quote from speeches made on the floor of the Senate in years or months which are past. I recall when the bill was under consideration in this body to lend the soldiers up to 50 percent of the face value of their certificates that the distinguished Senator from Delaware made a speech in opposition to the measure, and I dare say the Senator from Delaware would not relish a repetition on the floor of the statements which he made at that time in opposition to that bill. In fact, he himself did not relish them after he had made them, because he so corrected his remarks as to make them almost unrecognizable when they appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I am not going to refer further to that address nor to embarrass the Senator by reading it again into the RECORD. It seems to me that no serious consideration should be given to opposition to a measure merely because under circumstances entirely different from those now prevailing the Senator from Mississippi, or any other Senator for that matter, made a speech in opposition to the passage of the measure over the veto of the President.

However, I am not surprised, I will say to the Senator from Delaware, that any man in this body who would make a bitter attack upon the proposal to allow the soldier to borrow money from the Government up to 50 percent of the face value of his certificate should now oppose paying him, because if the Senator were in opposition, as he was, to allowing the ex-service man to borrow money from the Government, he would still be in opposition to allowing him to accept payment of his certificate.

Now, Mr. President, it might be interesting to recall very briefly some of the circumstances connected not only with the bonus but with the growth of our public debt. I think I am within the truth when I say that the agitation in favor of granting a bonus to the ex-service men did not originate with any ex-service men's organization. Having in mind the fact that following nearly all our previous wars, Congress had provided some form of extra compensation for those who fought the battles of the Republic, and having in mind that practically every allied nation and one or two of the nations in opposition in the recent World War had granted to their soldiers some form of extraordinary compensation, there grew up in the Congress of the United States a feeling that there ought to be similar recognition given to the soldiers of the American Army who served in the World War.

I was a Member of the other body at the time that agitation started and at the time the ex-service men's adjusted-service certificate law was enacted. We know what the situation was at that time. I was one of those who then favored cash payment, and we had enough money in the Treasury as a surplus to have paid the ex-service men the extra compensation to which we thought they were entitled, for we had practically a billion dollars surplus in the Treasury, and a billion dollars at that time, which was in 1924 or 1925, would have discharged in a cash payment the obligation, the extraordinary obligation, which the Congress felt it owed the ex-service men. But everybody knew that we could not pass a cash-payment bill over the veto of President Coolidge, because we had to pass even the adjusted-compensation act over his veto, for he vetoed that. Therefore the only thing that could be obtained for the ex-service men in the way of a bonus was based upon a sort of insurance policy, payable in 20 years, which included, as everyone will recall, a dollar a day for service in the United States, a dollar and a quarter a day for service abroad, plus 25 percent on account of the deferred payments from 1918, when the soldiers were discharged from the Army or when the armistice was signed and the war was over, until 1925, when the bill was passed over the veto of the then President. In that certificate was also figured the interest up to 1945. So that the face value of the certificate represented the amount of money that would be due in 1945, when it was payable to the ex-service men.

Since that time we have passed two or three acts enabling soldiers to borrow money, and we had even to do that over the veto of a President. All that we have been able to do thus far in recognizing the claims of the American soldier to any sort of extraordinary compensation, except the $60 that was given to all of them when they were discharged from the Army and his right to borrow upon that certificate, has been done over the veto of Presidents who were in office at the particular time.

Now with respect to our public debt. When we entered the World War in 1917 our public debt was about $2,000,000,000. During the World War in about 19 months we spent more than $30,000,000,000 in fighting that war, and when we emerged from it our public debt had increased from $2,000,000,000 to more than $26,000,000,000. In the subsequent 10 years, or until 1928, which was practically 10 years, we had reduced our public debt from more than $26,000,000,000 to $16,000,000,000.

I do not care to enter into any controversy as to the merits of any administration or the propriety of any increases in the public debt by reason of a comparison between any two or more administrations, but it is at least interesting to recall that from 1928 to March 4, 1933, under the administration of the predecessor of the present occupant of the White House, our public debt increased from about $16,000,000,000 to about $21,000,000,000. In other words, in the 4 years of the administration of Mr. Hoover our public debt increased from about $16,000,000,000 to about $21,000,000,000, whereas it has increased since the 4th of March 1933 from about $21,000,000,000 to about $28,000,000,000. So there is comparatively little difference between the amount of the increase in our public debt during the Hoover administration and during the Roosevelt administration from the 4th of March in 1933 up to the present time, for we cannot lose sight of the fact, Mr. President, that while it is estimated that at the end of the fiscal year 1936, which will be on July 1 next, our public debt will be about $31,000,000,000, approximately $4,300,000,000 of that $31,000,000,000 represents money that has been loaned to industry and railroads and insurance companies and banks by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which is recoverable in the name of the United States and its agents. So if we are going to urge the fact that on next July 1 we will owe $31,000,000,000 because of the outstanding bonds of this country which are now issued or which will be issued between now and July 1, 1936, then in all fairness we ought to subtract from that $31,000,000,000 the amount of recoverable money in which the United States has a proprietary interest and which may be recovered by the Government of the United States, not by that time, I will say, but over the period of years during which the loans shall run, plus interest on the loans during the period.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator will recall in connection with the recoverable assets of between four and five billion dollars to which he has referred there is also presently in possession of the Treasury of the United States a sum something in excess of $2,000,000,000 representing the profit on the gold transaction.

Mr. BARKLEY. I realize that; but I will say to the Senator I do not wish to consider that $2,000,000,000 profit as a result of the gold transaction in connection with the bonus, because I do not believe that $2,000,000,000 ought to be used for the purpose of paying the bonus or for any other immediate current Government expenditure.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I had no thought of suggesting that it be used for that purpose, but in regard to the fiscal situation of the United States, regarding the debt of the United States against the assets of the Government, that is a proper factor to be considered.

Mr. BARKLEY. I agree that, if we are going to take a balance sheet and try to discover how much the Government owes and how much it has as assets, it certainly is proper to consider that $2,000,000,000 profit when we consider the $4,300,000,000 of recoverable assets for which acceptable collateral, I will say, has been deposited with the agencies of the Government, and then subtract that amount from the net amount of the debt. As the result of the inclusion of the $2,000,000,000 in profits, we now have approximately $26,000,000,000 net public debt on the part of the United States, which corresponds approximately with the debt which we had at the end of the World War.

Reference has been made by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] to the probability of our credit becoming impaired. The Senator from Delaware, I am sure—though he is not now on the floor, and I assume has temporarily left his seat—and other Senators will recall that on the 28th day of February 1933, immediately prior to the inauguration of the present administration, the bonds of the United States on the markets of the United States descended to the lowest or about the lowest price for which they had been sold in the history of the Nation since the World War. The peculiar issue of bonds known as the "Mellon 3's"—that was the nickname given to them by the public and not by any act of Congress or by Treasury officials—which were bonds bearing 3-percent interest, descended to $82 on the markets of the United States on the 28th day of February 1933. So, immediately prior to the inauguration of the present administration, the obligations of the United States bearing 3-percent interest went down to as low as 82, and those who held those obligations and were compelled to cash them by offering them for sale were required to take $18 less than par for their bonds, if they desired to exchange them for cash.

Now, I wish to say I do not believe that under any administration in the history of the United States or under any Secretary of the Treasury the credit of our Government has been more safely maintained or advanced than under the present administration and under the present Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Morgenthau. From 1933 our bonds, the Government obligations, have gradually increased in price until today the lowest priced obligation, the one that sold on the 28th of February 1933, or in that neighborhood, for $82 is now selling for $103 on the markets of the United States.

The obligations of this Government, which have not been increased, as the Senator from Delaware said, to the point of injuring and damaging the credit of our Nation, have gone up in price until today they are selling at from 103 to 115 on the markets of the United States. During the gradual increase in price of Government bonds and Government obligations on the financial markets, the interest rates which those bonds have borne have been gradually decreased, until this year our Government borrowed money on short-term obligations at three-eighths of 1-percent interest. We are now in the process of refunding our outstanding Liberty bonds and other obligations, saving more than $100,000,000 a year in interest to the Government and people of the United States, not only because of the wisdom of the present administration, but because of a revived confidence of the American people in the fiscal policy of that administration. I submit to skeptical and pessimistic Senators that, in view of that situation, there is no possibility of the financial safety of the Government being jeopardized by the passage of the pending bill.

It has been a foregone conclusion that the bill will be passed. The newspapers have been full of it, as a matter of fact. When Congress adjourned last August, under the wise leadership and suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], our beloved leader on this side of the Chamber, it was known that in January of this year Congress would pass some kind of a bonus bill paying the veteran the compensation which was represented in the adjusted-compensation certificate he holds. Ever since we met here the 3d day of January, in view of the overwhelming action of the House, in view of the overwhelming action of the Finance Committee, it has been known by everybody with any intelligence that Congress was going to pass a bonus bill, and in spite of that knowledge the prospect has had no effect on the financial market either for Government bonds or for any other Government certificates dealt in on the markets of the United States.

I submit these plain facts to show that the credit of the United States was never on a more sound basis. The confidence of the people in our Government was never firmer nor higher than it is today. It is useless for anybody to call forth any spooks in order to attempt to frighten us from the performance of our duty when we have brought in a bill which, in my judgment, is so wise, so generous, and so fair to the ex-service men and to the Treasury of the United States that in voting for it there is no inconsistency involved on the part of Senators who heretofore have been unable to support such legislation.

While I have no idea what the President will do about it, because I have not conferred with him concerning it, and I do not know whether he has confided to anybody what he will do with this measure when it comes to him—I doubt very much if he has—I am bold enough to say that there is nothing in the bill which the President could not approve without any inconsistency as between his attitude and his veto message sent to the Congress on the former measure in May 1935. However, that is a matter, of course, which will appeal to the President's judgment when the measure reaches him. I do not think the Senator from Delaware is entitled to criticize the President because in his annual message to Congress which was delivered 2 weeks ago he did not veto or approve a measure which has not yet reached him.

Mr. President, just a word with respect to the probable outlay involved by the passage of the bill. It is easy for figures to be juggled and for false implications to follow from them. Reference has been made to the prospective increase of about $11,000,000,000 in the financial requirements of the United States Government during the next 17½ or 18 months. The figures are very simple, and there is no occasion for us becoming alarmed by reason of them.

During the next 18 months $5,800,000,000 of Government obligations will fall due. That $5,800,000,000 is represented by bonds already outstanding and in the hands of the public. The passage of the bonus bill will have no effect upon the refinancing of that $5,800,000,000. That process must be gone through with regardless of the bonus bill. It involves what Bob Taylor once explained when he was a candidate for Governor. His Republican opponent was complaining and pointing out to the people of the State that Mr. Taylor had had no financial or business experience and therefore did not know how to refund the State debt. Finally Mr. Taylor's friends said he ought to make some reply, and he did in the following language:

> My fellow citizens, my Republican opponent charges that I do not know enough about financial matters and have not had enough financial experience to enable me as Governor of the State to refund the State debt. Ladies and gentlemen, the refunding of a debt means the taking up of one note and putting down of another, and I have been doing that all my life.
> [Laughter.]

Mr. Taylor was elected, and refunded the debt by taking up one note and putting down another, and he did it well. That is all that is involved in the refunding of the $5,800,000,000 that is coming due in the next 18 months. It simply means taking up one note and putting down another in the place of it.

If the credit of the United States and the confidence of the people in the United States increases in the same proportion which has marked its increase during the last 3 years, the possibilities are that that $5,800,000,000 will be refunded at a lower rate of interest than it now bears, thus saving many other millions of dollars to the people of the United States. So far as this item is concerned, we will put that $5,800,000,000 on the shelf and forget all about it, because it has no place in this calculation.

It was not pointed out in the President's Budget message, because at that time the Supreme Court had not rendered its decision on the A. A. A., but it has been estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury that, in view of that decision, there will be an additional $1,000,000,000 needed for the present fiscal year for the refunding of the processing taxes which have been paid into the Treasury. That does not involve the $200,000,000 which has been impounded. In order to have an honest Budget the President referred to it, but that money has never gone into the Treasury, and it is not necessary to have an appropriation in order to take it out of the Treasury, because it has been impounded in the courts of the country. The Supreme Court held the other day that that money would be paid back to those who had paid it.

What Congress will do or what the Supreme Court will do with respect to the processing taxes which have been paid into the Treasury is only speculative. The Supreme Court has not held that Congress is required to refund that money. If it should hold that it is required to do so, I imagine that with relation to any appropriation bill brought before the Congress of the United States to refund $1,000,000,000 or any other amount of money that has been paid into the Treasury as processing taxes we will inquire into the situation to ascertain whether those who paid that tax have passed it onto the public and have collected it from the public. So far as I am concerned, I certainly do not look with favor upon refunding out of the Treasury the processing taxes which have been paid by the processors, but which in turn have been collected from the American people. I think that is a situation which Congress certainly will want to inquire into if it can do so when that question arises.

That, however, is speculative. That is not on our doorstep. It may never be on our doorstep, because the Supreme Court has not yet passed upon it, and Congress has not authorized the refund. Therefore, so far as we are now concerned, we might as well lay that billion dollars on the shelf and forget it.

The remainder of the $11,000,000,000 referred to as a financial requirement during the next 18 months is made up of two items of $2,000,000,000 each—$2,000,000,000 for relief and $2,000,000,000 which is said to be involved in this bill.

I do not know how much money the President will request Congress to appropriate in addition to the $4,800,000,000 already appropriated for relief; but he has not yet asked us to appropriate $2,000,000,000. I do not know whether or not he will ask us to do so. I do not know whether Congress will appropriate $2,000,000,000; but, anyway, that is not at this time an obligation on the Treasury of the United States, and it is entitled to be dealt with on its merits when it comes here, and not held out as a sort of danger signal in order to induce men not to support the measure now before the Senate of the United States.

So that eliminates all except the $2,000,000,000 which is supposed to be involved in the bonus bill.

If every soldier in the Nation should demand cash payment immediately upon the receipt of the bonds representing the obligation of the Government to him, it would, of course, involve an expenditure of a little more than $2,200,000,000. During all this depression, however, during all our unemployment, during all the distress of the past 3 or 4 years since 1931, when we authorized a loan of 50 percent of the face value of these certificates, 500,000 American soldiers have not borrowed a dime on their certificates. They had the right to do it, whether they needed the money or not. They had the right to demand it, because we did not fix necessity as a qualification for the right to borrow.

It is my deliberate judgment—and that is confirmed by the belief of those who represent not only the ex-service organizations but the Treasury and the Veterans' Administration—that we may reasonably rely upon the fact that the 500,000 soldiers who have not borrowed any money on their certificates will not rush in and cash the bonds provided for by this bill as the method by which the obligation is to be changed from a long-standing one, due in 1945, to one with an option of earlier maturity, as everyone understands.

If the 500,000 soldiers who have not borrowed do not cash their bonds, and if we may assume that all the others who have borrowed would rush in to cash them, that would reduce the Treasury's immediate obligation for raising money to $1,700,000,000. In view of the improved economic condition of our country, in view of the increased income of our people industrially, agriculturally, and otherwise, I think it is reasonable to expect that a very large number of those who have borrowed on their certificates will not cash the bonds. The ex-service organizations estimated that at least 250,000 ex-service men would not desire to cash any of their bonds; and many of them who may need money, as has already been explained, may cash some of them and hold the rest. So, under these circumstances, I believe it is safe to say that the immediate cash requirement over the next 12 months as a result of the passage of this bill will not be more than one and a quarter billion dollars, instead of $2,200,000,000.

I do not think those figures need frighten us. In view of the increase in our public debt from 1928 to 1932 by about $5,000,000,000, and in view of the net increase of our public debt in the past 3 years of between four and five billion dollars, no bond issue of which has received less than a 3 to 1 subscription on the part of the people of the United States, I do not think we need become excited over the possibility of having to raise a billion and a quarter or a billion and a half or even $2,000,000,000 in order to discharge this obligation to the American soldier.

I voted against the bill passed by the Congress at the last session. I voted against the motion to pass it over the veto of the President, because while I voted for the cash payment of the bonus so long as we had a surplus in the Treasury, I have always contended that whenever we do pay the ex-service men the value of their certificates they ought to be paid in the same kind of money that I and everybody else draw on any obligation of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Kentucky on the bill has expired. He has 15 minutes on the amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I hope not to use the entire 15 minutes.

I am sure the Senator from Oklahoma will understand that I do not even remotely mean any reflection upon his economic views when I say that I have never felt that it was wise or fair to the American soldier, in order that we might pay him in a hurry, to print money of a special design and type that would cheapen every other dollar, including those he now has and those he may receive in order to discharge this bonus obligation. For that reason I have opposed the passage of the so-called Patman bill and other so-called inflationary measures designed to increase the amount of money in circulation as a result of the payment of the bonus.

I desire to compliment the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and all others who have participated in working out what seems to me to be a reasonable, a fair, a safe, and sound method by which this obligation may be discharged, even though the discharge comes 9 years prior to the term fixed in the bond which the Government of the United States executed, which nobody else except those who accepted it had any voice in determining.

The truth is, as we all know, that if this obligation had been dated from November 11, 1918, the end of the war, even the 20-year period would expire in 1938, only 2 years from this date. So I do not think we need quibble here over the circumstance that because of our own delay in recognizing what we later, in a tardy fashion, did recognize, we propose to move up the date of payment of this obligation by 9 years, when, as a matter of fact, if we had done what we should have done, we would have made it payable in 1938 instead of 1945.

Mr. President, for these reasons, and others which I might express but to which I shall not take the time to advert,

I shall support this bill. I do so without reservation. I do so with enthusiasm. I do so with a feeling of pride that, after all, we have found a way to do justice to our ex-service men and justice to the Government of the United States. I trust, though I do not know, that the bill will receive the approval of the Chief Executive.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, if no other Senator desires to speak on the amendment, I hope very much we may have a vote on it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] to the committee amendment.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Ninety-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, since I have been a Member of the Senate I have been in favor of the cash payment of the soldiers' bonus. There are some things which I do not like about the committee amendment to the bill. Perhaps the baby-bond proposition is all right, but the bonds will draw 3-percent interest. The Senator from Kentucky and others have made the argument that if a large number of veterans do not desire to cash their bonds at the present time, the Government will not have to pay the money until later on. That is perfectly true, but in the meantime the bonds will draw 3-percent interest.

We are told that the baby bonds will sell for 100 cents on the dollar at any time. I remember very well, and I think others do, that during the World War period we were told that the Liberty bonds would be worth 100 cents on the dollar at any time, but it was a very short time after some of those bonds were bought before they went down to below a dollar. In fact, if I am not mistaken, before President Wilson's term expired they were quite considerably below 100 cents on the dollar. If I remember correctly, I sold some myself for 87 cents on the dollar before Mr. Wilson was out of office.

It is hard to tell, as some have said, just how long these bonds will remain at par or above par, so my prediction is that the veterans will cash their bonds just as soon as they can, and if they do not need the money, they will put it in some savings bank where the interest will be compounded.

It is intimated that any other form of bonus bill except one containing provision for a bond issue will be vetoed by the President. I cannot quite understand why that is the case, if it is true. I am frank to say that I am strongly in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS].

As I see it, the difference between the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma and the committee amendment is simply that the committee amendment provides for the issue of baby bonds, to draw 3-percent interest, and those bonds which are cashed must be paid by the Treasury of the United States, and in order to cash them the Treasury will have to sell ordinary bonds bearing at least 3-percent interest in order to pay for the baby bonds. In other words, under the committee bill, as I understand it, it will cost the taxpayers of this Nation from a billion and a half to $2,000,000,000 in interest if that measure shall be enacted, while the Thomas amendment would save the payment by the taxpayers of a billion and a half or $2,000,000,000 in interest to the bankers or the bond buyers.

Of course, if anyone desires to assist the bankers, and to help the poor fellows out, by giving them interest to the amount of a billion and a half or $2,000,000,000, that is all well and good; but I wish to call to the attention of the Senate the fact that the money changers are supposed to be driven out of the temple. I have the President's message here, the message he delivered a short time ago at the joint session of the two Houses, and while he did not say so in so many words, he intimated that the money changers have been driven out of the temple.

I cannot understand the argument of anyone who will rise and intimate, at least, that the President demands that we give the bankers and the money changers a billion and a half or $2,000,000,000, if they have been driven out of the temple. If they have not been driven out of the temple, they ought to be. One way to help drive them out is to adopt the Thomas amendment, because it does not provide for the payment of 3-percent interest to the bankers or the bond buyers. It provides for the issuance of new money; not, as the Senator from Kentucky intimated, inflated money but money based on gold and silver in the United States Treasury; money based on bonds, which can, under the Thomas amendment, be turned over to the Federal Reserve banks and they allowed to issue Federal Reserve notes in the regular way.

It is true that the rate of interest will be reduced, and it should be reduced. All the Federal Reserve banks pay for the paper money which they issue is the cost of the paper and the printing. The last figures I saw amounted to about seven-tenths of a cent per bill. So they should not give very much above that amount of interest. It means probably about fifteen or twenty hundredths of 1-percent interest. They should not get more than a half-percent interest under the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma. It would save about 2½-percent interest being raised by the taxpayers of this Nation.

Mr. President, it seems to me that in all fairness and in view of the fact that the money changers have been driven out of the temple, we should adopt the Thomas amendment and provide for the payment of the bonus in cash and not by the issuing of bonds but by the issuing of as much currency as is necessary to make the cash payment based on the gold and silver in the Treasury of the United States, or based on bonds, if the President thinks that bonds must be issued, but a bond bearing a lower rate of interest.

I am confident that the veterans will be satisfied with a measure of that kind. I am also confident that the taxpayers of the Nation will approve a measure of that kind. If anyone thinks he is going to gain votes or political strength by voting for a bond issue to pay the veterans a cash bonus instead of a straight issue of currency backed by the gold in the Treasury of the United States, it is all well and good for him to think so; but I doubt it. He is at liberty to vote that way, of course, if he desires.

The title of the act begins:

To provide for the immediate payment of World War adjusted-service certificates.

Immediate payment! The argument, of course, has been made that many of these baby bonds will be carried over until 1945. They may be carried over; but, according to the specifications of the committee bill, they are subject to call at any time at 100 cents on the dollar, and they begin drawing interest immediately, and the 3 percent is collectible at any time that the bonds are cashed after 1 year from the date of issue.

Under the Thomas amendment there is no interest provided. Under its provisions no one gets any interest. No one makes any money out of the cash payment of the bonus.

Mr. President, I defy anyone to make any reasonable argument to the voters of this country as to why he should desire to vote to give the bankers and the money changers of the Nation a billion and a half to $2,000,000,000 to make this little cash payment to the soldiers who are entitled to the money.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk called the roll.

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce the necessary absence of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF]. If present, he would vote "nay" on this question.

Mr. LEWIS. I rise to reannounce the absence of the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] by reason of attending the funeral of the late Representative Lloyd, of Washington, and the absence of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], who is necessarily detained.

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 64, as follows:

YEAS—27

So the amendment of Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma to the committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the Senate has just decided to pay the bonus through a bond issue. The bill now before the Senate provides an authorization for an appropriation necessary to cash the certificates. The bill does not provide for an appropriation. At this time I offer an amendment to follow the authorization section, making the appropriation necessary to finance this payment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the committee amendment will be reported.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In the amendment of the committee, on page 14, after line 11, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 8½. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,237,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay the balance due on the adjusted-service certificates as authorized in section 8 of this act.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I do not know whether or not a point of order would lie against the amendment. I make the point of order to raise the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On what ground is the point of order made?

Mr. HARRISON. It has been the practice that appropriation bills should originate in the House. That is where they should originate. I have no doubt, if the bill providing an authorization shall pass and become a law, that the necessary appropriation will be made to carry out its purposes. However, I withdraw the point of order and express the hope that the amendment will not be agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, to the amendment of the committee I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed, at an appropriate place in the bill, to insert the following:

No person may be declared ineligible for employment under the provisions of the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935, or any amendments, revisions, or extensions thereof, by reason of having received the benefits of the provisions of this act.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope the Senator will not insist on his amendment.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I am merely going to ask the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] to state whether my understanding is correct. I want to state my understanding. If the Senator from South Carolina states it is correct, I shall not press the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. The amendment merely provides that men shall not be ineligible for work under the Works Progress Administration because of the receipt of money through the payment of the adjusted-compensation certificates. The amendment was submitted by me a few days ago because of a fear which arose on account of the statement which was issued last week that it would be the policy of the Works Progress Administration to refuse to permit those who had accepted money under the adjusted-compensation certificates to be considered eligible for work of that kind.

I have been assured by the administration leaders in the Senate, and the representatives of the various veterans' organizations have been likewise assured, that it is not the purpose or intention of the Works Progress Administration to put such a rule into effect, but that they intend to treat every case upon its own merits. Further, I have been assured that there would be difficulty in securing the passage of the bill if this more or less controversial amendment should be urged.

I ask the Senator from South Carolina whether my statement is correct?

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I have talked to the Senator from Washington about the situation. His statement is exactly in accord with the information I have had.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. On the basis of that assurance I shall not press the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington withdraws his amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In the committee amendment, at the end of section 7, page 14, after line 8, it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That in all cases in which the veteran or other person entitled to any payment under this act is indebted to the United States, or any agency or instrumentality thereof, except national banks, on account of a loan of any kind, the amount otherwise payable under this act to such veteran or other person, or to the legal representative thereof, shall, instead of being so paid, be forthwith applied in reduction or liquidation of such loan, whether matured or not, and there shall be paid in such cases only the amount, if any, by which the amount otherwise payable under this act exceeds the amount of the indebtedness on account of such loan.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, section 7 of the bill, as reported by the Committee on Finance, provides as follows:

SEC. 7. Notwithstanding the provisions of Public Law No. 262, Seventy-fourth Congress, approved August 12, 1935, no deductions on account of any indebtedness of the veteran to the United States, except on account of any lien against the adjusted-service certificate authorized by law, shall be made from the adjusted-service credit or from any amounts due under the World War Adjusted Compenation Act, as amended, or this act.

There was no such provision as section 7 in the bill as it passed the House of Representatives. The Committee on Finance recommends that there be no deduction from the face value of the adjusted-compensation certificates on account of any indebtedness to the United States except for money heretofore borrowed by a veteran on his certificate.

This proposed legislation to pay the full face value of adjusted-service certificates is based upon the assumption that the United States owes a debt to World War veterans which should be settled now. If anyone presents a claim against the United States, either for services rendered or materials furnished, he receives no money until the General Accounting Office finds that he does not owe anything to the United States. It is therefore proper to inquire whether veterans who are to be paid an average of about $1,000 under this bill have obligations tc the Government as a whole which may properly be offset against what they will receive.

Authority to make deductions from claims against the United States was granted in the Budget and Accounting Act of 1921 (U. S. C. 978–981):

SEC. 71. All claims and demands whatever by the Government of the United States or against it, and all accounts whatever in which the Government of the United States is concerned, either as debtor or creditor, shall be settled and adjusted in the General Accounting Office.

SEC. 93. The General Accounting Office shall superintend the recovery of all debts finally certified by it to be due to the United States.

The procedure in the General Accounting Office for the recovery of debts due the United States is well established. For example, no individual owing an income tax or no corporation owing a corporation tax can receive payment from the Government unless such taxes are paid.

During the past 5 years Congress has greatly extended Federal credit to individual citizens, principally through the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and the Farm Credit Administration. I have made inquiry to ascertain how much money has been borrowed by World War veterans from these sources, and while the results are only approximate, I believe that the Senate will be interested in the figures I have made which, I repeat, are based only on approximations.

As possible borrowers, let us take all men in the United States over 21 years of age, which the last census numbers at 37,056,757. The number of World War veterans estimated to be alive on January 1, 1936, is 4,164,402. Of that number, the War Department estimates that there are possibly 200,000 entitled to adjusted-service certificates who have not applied for them. The total number of such certificates now outstanding is 3,518,191.

The average age of World War veterans in 1936 is 45 years. As men of such age, the probability is that a greater proportion of them are heads of families and owners of homes and farms than any other group of 3,500,000 in the total male population. It is therefore fair to assume that at least one-tenth of the home loans, farm loans, and other similar loans to individuals made by the Federal Government or its agencies and instrumentalities have been made to World War veterans as borrowers.

The total number of loans made by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation on December 26, 1935, was 968,947 and amounted to $2,931,917,000. Home loans are being granted at a diminishing rate, but it is quite certain that before June 15, 1936, which is as soon as adjusted-service certificates may be converted into bonds, or otherwise paid under this legislation, the total number of home-loan borrowers will be at least 1,000,000 and the total loans will be over $3,000,000,000. Upon the assumption that one-tenth of the Federal home loans have been made to World War veterans, then their total obligations to the United States will be about $300,000,000.

I have obtained from the Farm Credit Administration the following tabulation of the loans made by its various institutions on November 30, 1935:

Type	Number	Amount
Federal land banks	642,160	$2,065,620,306
Land Bank Commissioner	426,693	785,897,814
Regional Agricultural Credit Corporation	46,003	46,220,080
Emergency crop and feed loans	1,107,457	108,624,314
Drought relief loans	273,069	66,813,612
Production credit associations	122,254	91,304,167
Total	2,617,636	3,164,480,293

The Federal land bank and land bank commissioner loans are secured by liens on real property. The regional agricultural credit corporation and production credit association loans are, with few exceptions, secured by liens on personal property. The emergency crop and feed loans and drought-relief loans are secured by liens on crops, feed, and livestock.

Upon the basis that World War veterans constitute one-tenth of the Farm Credit borrowers they are obligated to the United States for 10 percent of a total of $3,164,480,293, or about $300,000,000. The combined obligations of veterans for home loans and agricultural loans may be approximated at $600,000,000.

The average home loan is close to $3,000 and the average farm loan is about $3,200. The average amount of the other types of agricultural loans is much smaller. Adjusted-service certificates actually have an average value of $985.66 and are therefore commonly referred to as being worth about $1,000. These figures show that, by and large, veterans who are borrowers from governmental agencies will have a sufficient credit to satisfy about one-third of their obligations to the United States. If their total obligations are $600,000,000, the adoption of this amendment should result in the retirement of about $200,000,000 of their indebtedness to the United States.

The amendment includes the Federal Government and all its agencies or instrumentalities except national banks. Besides the Home Loan Corporation and the Farm Credit Administration there are other agencies, such as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which have loaned Federal funds to individuals. National banks loan private money and, therefore, should not be included. Congress has never said in so many words that national banks are instrumentalities of the United States, but the courts have said so in a number of final decisions. Recent happenings require that Congress pay some attention to legislation by the judiciary.

To properly state what an adjusted-service certificate is, I quote from page 2 of the report of the Committee on Ways and Means made on this bill on January 7, 1935, which describes the World War Adjusted Compensation Act of 1924 as follows:

> It fixed the adjusted-service credit, as did the former bills, at $1 per day for each day of home service and $1.25 per day for each day of oversea service, not to exceed, however, in any case, $500 for home service or $625 for oversea service.
> Under that act the veteran received the equivalent of a paid-up 20-year endowment policy for the amount which his adjusted-service credit, plus 25 percent, would purchase at his age. Such insurance to be computed in accordance with the accepted actuarial principles and based upon American experience tables of mortality, with interest at 4 percent per annum, compounded annually.

I am advised by the Veterans' Administration that at $1 and $1.25 per day the average World War veteran earned $394, to which was added 25 percent, or $98.50, making the average total $492.50. Compounded at 4-percent annual interest for 20 years the average endowment-insurance policy would have a value of $985.66 in 1945.

The 25 percent was added not, as is often stated, in lieu of interest from 1918 to 1925, but because, under the endowment-insurance plan, veterans were required to wait 20 years to get any money. Since that term has a little over half expired, if the earned portion of the 25 percent is prorated, an adjusted-service certificate for $1,000 is worth $650 in 1936. Including the whole 25 percent in the base figures a $1,000 certificate was worth $690 in 1935, and its present worth in 1936 is $715.

The amendment provides that the amount otherwise payable under this act to any veteran shall be applied in reduction or liquidation of any loan he may have obtained from the United States or its agencies whether such loan is matured or not. The bill now under consideration by the Senate proposes to pay the full face value of a Government obligation 9 years before it is due. It would, therefore, seem that there is some reasonable relationship between the two proposals.

As I have stated, depending upon which way the calculations are made, an adjusted-service certificate of a maturity value in 1945 of $1,000 has a 1936 value of from $650 to $715. Under this bill interest amounting to $263,000,000 is to be forgiven to 3,026,190 veterans who have borrowed on their certificates, or an average of about $87. In any event Congress will give the average veteran about $300 more than his adjusted-service certificate calls for. If the United States is to pay its obligations before they are due, is there any impropriety in asking a veteran to use the immediate credit he is to receive through the enactment of this bill as a means of paying, in whole or in part, whatever total sum he owes the United States?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. As I understand the effect of the Senator's amendment, it would be about as follows:

Every ex-service man who has borrowed money from the Home Owners' Loan Corporation or the Farm Credit Administration and has arranged for repayment on an amortization plan extending over a period of years, would have his indebtedness to that organization immediately declared due and payable and paid out of this certificate.

Mr. HAYDEN. To the extent of the amount due him.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; to the extent of the amount due him. Would not the effect of that be to penalize every man who has borrowed from such an institution because he happens to be an ex-service man? Why interfere with the orderly process of repayment under contracts which have been entered into, which were satisfactory to the agency of the Government, simply because we are now on an entirely different basis and are dealing with an obligation which arose out of a different situation, providing for payment to the ex-service men?

Mr. HAYDEN. Because in this case we are entirely changing the basis of the obligation by paying it 9 years before it is due.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I very much hope this amendment will be voted down.

The Finance Committee amendment changes the House bill in this respect: If the ex-service man has his adjusted-service certificate up as security for some loan from the Government, the loan must be paid before bonds are issued to him; but it would seem to me unfair to the soldier, because he has incurred indebtedness to some of the various agencies of the Government, for the Government to pry into him and investigate him before he is paid, and then take the amount of his indebtedness out of his certificate.

Already it is provided that the soldier may pay such indebtedness, at his option, if he owes it to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation or the Farm Land Board; and the worst feature of the pending amendment is that if it should be adopted it probably would be a year before the ex-service men would get their bonds. A thorough investigation would have to be made by the Veterans' Administration and the innumerable agencies of the Government into the account of every ex-service man in order to determine, before issuing the bonds, that he did not owe money to any of those agencies.

I hope the amendment will be rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk to the amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 8, after line 22, it is proposed to insert the following:

That provisional first and second lieutenants who served as such in the World War, and who were discharged or resigned within 1 year after November 11, 1918, shall be eligible to receive the benefits under the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended, on the same terms as other officers of the same rank.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, during the World War a number of provisional first and second lieutenants went into the service simply for the purpose of remaining during the war. After the war was over they were either discharged or resigned; but under the original Adjusted Service Compensation Act, Regular Army officers were excluded from receiving the benefits of the bonus. The Veterans' Administration has construed that to mean that the provisional second lieutenants, who technically were Regular Army officers for the time being, could not receive compensation. It seems to me they ought to be included along with the first and second lieutenants in the Reserves and in the National Guard, who went in simply for the time of the war and then were discharged.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator's amendment involves, I think, about 2,000 officers.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not know the exact number, but it is a small number. Whether it is 200 or 2,000, the principle is just the same; and the amendment ought to be adopted if we wish to treat all the officers on the same basis.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas to the amendment of the committee. By the sound, the "noes" have it.

Mr. CONNALLY. I ask for a division.

On a division, the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONNALLY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, if this matter is going to provoke further discussion, may I interrupt for the moment? I understand one other amendment is to be offered, and I do not know how long the discussion of that amendment will proceed. I do not desire to impose on the Senate and to keep Senators here extraordinarily late. Personally I should rather stay and finish up the matter tonight.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas has asked for the yeas and nays on his amendment to the amendment. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Finance in the nature of a substitute.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in the confusion I was not able to hear the question as propounded by the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question was on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. KING. I have an amendment I desire to offer.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask that the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the vote is reconsidered.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment, and I ask that the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lieu of the amendment proposed by the committee it is proposed to insert the following:

That section 507 of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 507. All amounts in the fund shall be available for payment, by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, of adjusted-service certificates upon their maturity or the prior death of the veteran, for payments under section 502 to banks on account of notes of veterans, for repayment of loans made by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs out of the United States Government life-insurance fund on the security of adjusted-service certificates, in which case the Administrator shall pay the amount of the outstanding liens against such certificates, including all interest due or accrued, together with such amounts as may be due under the provisions of subdivision (m) of section 502 of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended, for making loans authorized by section 502, as amended, and for payment to veterans of the amount of the cash-surrender value of their adjusted-service certificates."

SEC. 2. Title V of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 509. (a) Upon the application of any veteran to whom there has been lawfully issued an adjusted-service certificate under the provisions of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended, and upon the complete surrender of such adjusted-service certificate, together with all rights and privileges thereunder (with or without the consent of the beneficiary thereof), the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is authorized to pay such veteran from the adjusted-service certificate fund the cash-surrender value of his certificate as hereinafter defined, less any indebtedness of the veteran on account of any loan or loans made under the provisions of this act and unpaid interest, if any, accrued to the date of settlement.

"(b) The cash-surrender value of an adjusted-service certificate shall be the amount of the net single premium (determined as of the anniversary date of the certificate nearest to the date application for benefits under the provisions of this section is filed with the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs) necessary to purchase paid-up endowment insurance for the maturity amount of the certificate at the then attained age of the certificate holder for the unexpired portion of the original 20-year period on the basis of the American Experience Table of Mortality and interest at 4 percent per annum compounded annually.

"(c) No payment shall be made under this section until the certificate is in the possession of the Veterans' Administration nor until all obligations for which the certificate was held as security have been paid or otherwise discharged.

"(d) If at the time of application to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs for payment under this section the principal and interest on or in respect of any loan upon the certificate have not been paid in full by the veteran (whether or not the loan has matured), then the Administrator shall (1) pay or otherwise discharge such unpaid principal and so much of such unpaid interest (accrued or to accrue) as is necessary to make the certificate available for payment under this section, and (2) deduct from the amount otherwise payable the amount of such principal and so much of such interest, if any, as accrued to the date of settlement: Provided, That as to loans on adjusted-service certificates properly made, unpaid and held by a bank, upon application for benefits in accordance with the provisions of this section, the bank holding the note and certificate shall, upon notice from the Administrator, present them to the Administrator for payment to the bank, in full satisfaction of its claim, of the amount of the unpaid principal and unpaid interest in accordance with the terms of the note or notes held by the bank if the rate of interest charged is not greater than the legal rate under the provisions of this act which were in effect at the time the note was executed, except that if the bank after notice of application under this section fails to present the certificate and note to the Administrator within 15 days after the notice, such interest shall be paid only up to the fifteenth day after such notice.

"(e) Upon payment under this section, the certificate and all rights thereunder shall be canceled.

"(f) A veteran may receive the benefits of this section by application therefor, filed with the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs. Such application may be made and filed at any time before the maturity of the certificate (1) personally by the veteran, or (2) in case physical or mental incapacity prevents the making or filing of a personal application, then by such representative of the veteran and in such manner as may be by regulations prescribed by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs. An application made by a person other than a representative authorized by such regulations, or not filed on or before the maturity of the certificate, shall be held void.

"(g) If the veteran dies after application is filed with the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, payment of the cash-surrender value less any indebtedness of the veteran on account of any loan or loans made under the provisions of this act shall be made to the estate of the veteran.

"(h) Payments under the provisions of this act shall not be made until 3 months subsequent to the date of enactment.

"(i) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to redeem from the United States Government life-insurance fund all adjusted-service certificates held by that fund on account of loans made thereon, and to pay to the United States Government life-insurance fund the amount of the outstanding liens against such certificates, including all interest due or accrued, together with such amounts as may be due under subdivision (m) of section 502 of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to make such payment by issuing, to the United States Government life-insurance fund, bonds of the United States which shall bear interest at the rate of 4½ percent per annum. No such bonds shall mature or be callable until the expiration of a period of at least 10 years from date of issue, except that any such bond shall be redeemed by the Secretary of the Treasury and the principal and accrued interest thereon paid to the United States Government life-insurance fund at any time upon certification by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs that the amount represented by such bond is required to meet current liabilities. Bonds issued for the purposes of this section shall be issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, subject to the provisions of this section."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether it is his purpose to have a final vote on the bill today, in view of the offering of this amendment?

Mr. HARRISON. I was merely expressing my own idea. I had hoped that we could finish the bill tonight, but if it is the sentiment of Senators that they desire to have it go over until Monday, I am perfectly willing to abide by the wishes of the Senate. This is about the last amendment to be offered, I may say.

Mr. NORRIS. I submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. The committee amendment is offered in the nature of a substitute. Is it in order now for the Senator from Utah to offer a substitute for the committee substitute?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know of any other way to answer the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The certificates could not be cashed tonight even if we passed the bill, so I do not think we will lose anything by waiting until Monday.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports of committees are in order. If there be no reports of committees, the calendar is in order.

NATIONAL EMERGENCY COUNCIL

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Lyle T. Alverson, of New York, to be acting executive director.

Mr. COPELAND. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The nomination will be passed over.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters in Minnesota.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, at the request of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE], I ask that the nominations of postmasters in Minnesota go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nominations will go over.

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters in Idaho and Oklahoma.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that the nominations be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of John Van A. MacMurray, of Maryland, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to Turkey.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Arthur Bliss Lane, of New York, to be Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, may I ask, as to the nomination now being considered, whether this is a promotion within the Service? Does the Chair recall?

Mr. ROBINSON. It is my information that this is a career appointment.

Mr. COPELAND. Very well; I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Boaz Long, of New Mexico, to be Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Nicaragua.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

PUBLIC WORKS ADMINISTRATION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Martin E. Kelly, of Montana, to be State engineer inspector in Idaho and Montana.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

RECESS

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon Monday.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Monday, January 20, 1936, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate January 18 (legislative day of Jan. 16), 1936

SENATE

MONDAY, JANUARY 20, 1936

(Legislative day of Thursday, Jan. 16, 1936)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

HOMER T. BONE, a Senator from the State of Washington, appeared in his seat today.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. ROBINSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar days Friday, January 17, and Saturday, January 18, 1936, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

READING OF WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS

The VICE PRESIDENT, under the authority of the order of the Senate of January 24, 1901, appointed the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BACHMAN] to read Washington's Farewell Address on February 22 next.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Clark	Hayden	O'Mahoney
Ashurst	Connally	Holt	Overton
Austin	Coolidge	Johnson	Pittman

Mr. LEWIS. I announce that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are necessarily detained from the Senate.

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] is necessarily absent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Ninety-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

COMMEMORATIVE ADDRESS ON THE LATE SENATOR LONG

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, on the opening day of the present session, in making formal announcement of the death of my late distinguished colleague, Senator Long, I stated that at a more appropriate time I should make some remarks in commemoration of his life and public services. Tomorrow being election day in the State of Louisiana and the day on which Senator Long, had he lived, would have offered himself for renomination to the United States Senate and unquestionably would have been renominated, I shall immediately after the Senate convenes ask for recognition in order that I may address the Senate in commemoration of my departed colleague.

Mr. OVERTON subsequently said: Mr. President, I understand it is the intention of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to move a recess until Wednesday instead of recessing until tomorrow.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; I intend, when the Senate concludes its business, to move a recess until Wednesday noon.

Mr. OVERTON. This morning I made the announcement that I would attempt to secure recognition of the Senate when the Senate convened tomorrow in order that I might submit some remarks in memory of my deceased colleague, the late Senator Long. In view of the circumstances, I wish to say that, for the purpose stated in my announcement, I shall ask for recognition when the Senate shall convene on Wednesday.

Mr. ROBINSON. May I state that before arranging for a recess until Wednesday I advised the Senator from Louisiana, who indicated his readiness to change the notice which he had given so that he might speak Wednesday instead of tomorrow?

EXTENSION OF CERTAIN OIL LEASES

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate two letters from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, reporting, pursuant to law, relative to extensions beyond the 20-year period of certain oil leases within the Garland Structure in Park and Big Horn Counties, Wyo., and Unit No. 5, Cedar Creek Anticline, Fallon County, Mont., which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

REPORTS OF THE FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Chairman of the Federal Power Commission, transmitting, pursuant to law, the fifteenth annual report of the Commission for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1935, with additional activities to December 1935; and also enclosing a statement showing the name, title, and compensation of members and employees of the Commission as of June 30, 1935, which, with the accompanying reports, was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kentucky, which was ordered to lie on the table:

Resolution requesting the immediate payment of the soldiers' bonus by the Congress of the United States

First. Be it resolved, That the House of Representatives and the Senate of the Commonwealth of Kentucky request the Congress of the United States to make provisions immediately to fully pay the soldiers' bonus without the charge of interest on any previous loan.

Second. That this resolution be spread upon the permanent records of both the house and senate.

Third. That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States of America.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a petition of sundry citizens of Bryan County, Okla., praying for the enactment of suitable legislation in place of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a resolution of the Southwest Kansas Bar Association, favoring the enactment of legislation creating a western district of the United States court for Kansas, comprising generally the Fifth, Sixth, and Seventh Congressional Districts of the State, and further providing in such proposed western district three or more divisions, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a letter in the nature of a petition from the Committee of Twenty-one, signed by Louise Wilson Schwarz, chairman, Roland Park, Md., praying for an investigation of charges filed by the Women's Committee of Louisiana relative to the qualifications of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON], which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. COOLIDGE. Mr. President, on behalf of my colleague [Mr. WALSH] and myself, I present a memorial numerously signed by sundry citizens of the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the present enactment of legislation providing for the immediate payment of World War adjusted-service certificates. I ask that the memorial may lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. COPELAND presented a letter from the Roger Smith Hotels Corporation, signed by Harvey F. Hambur, New York City, N. Y., endorsing a joint statement of the American Hotels Association, the Motion Picture Theater Owners of America, and the National Association of Broadcasters, favoring the enactment of Senate bill 3047, known as the Duffy copyright bill, which, with the accompanying paper, was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution of the Greene County (N. Y.) Farm Bureau Association, opposing any lowering of the tariff duties on agricultural products as a result of reciprocal trade agreements with the Dominion of Canada, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution of Alexander Di Francesco and Amedeo Pastore Post, No. 2160, Veterans of Foreign Wars, of Bronx, N. Y., favoring the observance of a policy of strict neutrality on the part of the United States in all foreign controversies, particularly the present Italo-Ethiopean conflict, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LOGAN presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kentucky, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Concurrent resolution memorializing Congress of the United States of America to eliminate the taxation of gasoline by the Federal Government

Whereas the Congress of the United States of America has imposed a tax upon all sales of gasoline; and

Whereas the State of Kentucky and all other several States of the United States have already imposed taxes upon such sales; and

Whereas the Federal tax on such sales is untimely and prohibitive and, coupled with the respective State taxes on such sales, places a burden upon the users of gasoline beyond that which they should carry and beyond that which the traffic can legitimately bear; and

Whereas the taxation of sales of gasoline should properly be left to the exclusive use of the States as a means of providing funds for road construction and maintenance: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the house of representatives and the senate concurring therein, that the Congress of the United States be and it is hereby respectfully memorialized to enact with all convenient speed such legislation as may be necessary to abolish the Federal gasoline sales tax and to surrender to the States exclusively the power to tax such sales in the future; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, the Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives, the Secretary of the United States, and to each Member of Congress elected from the State of Kentucky and that the latter be urged to use their best offices to procure the enactment of such legislation as will accomplish the purpose of this resolution.

Mr. LOGAN also presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kentucky, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Concurrent resolution expressing approval of and urging the continuance of a policy of strict neutrality of the United States Government in international disputes not affecting this Nation

Whereas the clouds of war hang heavily over many of the nations of the world, and more particularly those peoples of central and southern Europe; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States, together with the honorable President of the United States, have heretofore and recently acted to safeguard the neutrality of this country from disputes between foreign nations: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Kentucky (the Senate of the Commonwealth of Kentucky concurring), That the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky heartily approve the policy of the Congress and the honorable President of the United States to maintain strict neutrality in the territorial and political disputes of foreign nations, and express the sincere desire that said policy shall be maintained inviolate; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent by the clerk of the house of representatives to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, and to each United States Senator and Congressman from Kentucky.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

As in executive session,

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the following nominations:

David J. Davis, of Alabama, to be United States district judge, northern district of Alabama; and James W. Morris, of Florida, to be Assistant Attorney General.

Mr. DIETERICH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of John E. Hushing, of the Canal Zone, to be marshal, district of the Canal Zone, vice John T. Barrett, term expired.

Mr. McGILL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Roulhac Gewin, of Alabama, to be United States marshal, southern district of Alabama, vice James A. Stafford, whose term expires January 21, 1936.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported favorably the following nominations:

Col. Frank C. Burnett, Adjutant General's Department, to be Assistant The Adjutant General, with the rank of brigadier general, for the period of 4 years beginning December 28, 1935, with rank from December 24, 1935, vice Brig. Gen. Edgar T. Conley, Assistant The Adjutant General, who accepted appointment as The Adjutant General, December 24, 1935;

Lt. Col. Henry Harley Arnold, Air Corps, to be assistant to the chief of the Air Corps with the rank of brigadier general for the period of 4 years beginning December 28, 1935, with rank from December 24, 1935, vice Brig. Gen. Oscar Westover, assistant to the Chief of the Air Corps, who accepted appointment as Chief of the Air Corps December 24, 1935; and

Col. Wallace DeWitt, Medical Corps, to be assistant to the Surgeon General with the rank of brigadier general for the period of 4 years beginning December 28, 1935, with rank from December 1, 1935, vice Brig. Gen. Matthew A. DeLaney, assistant to the Surgeon General, retired November 30, 1935.

Mr. SHEPPARD also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported favorably the nomination of Maj. Paxton Sterrett Campbell, Infantry, for appointment by transfer in the Regular Army to the Quartermaster Corps with rank from November 1, 1934; also the nominations of sundry other officers for appointment by transfer in the Regular Army.

He also, from the same committee, reported favorably the nominations of sundry officers for appointment in the Regular Army; and also the nominations of sundry officers for appointment, under the provisions of law, in the National Guard of the United States of the United States Army.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BENSON:

A bill (S. 3762) to authorize the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans secured by receipts on account of national forest reserves, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. GEORGE:

A bill (S. 3763) for the relief of S. H. Prather; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 3764) relating to the war-risk insurance of Ashmead Ferguson Bruce, deceased; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. McNARY:

A bill (S. 3765) granting a pension to Jennie Alexander;

A bill (S. 3766) granting a pension to Lina Buckley; and

THE MERCHANT MARINE—EDITORIAL FROM SEA POWER

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a brief editorial from Sea Power on the subject of the merchant marine.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Sea Power, December 1935]

THE MERCHANT MARINE—BENEVOLENT AMERICA

At the present time America is subsidizing foreign shipping with 200 million American dollars a year, 16 millions a month—half a million a day—all out of American pockets.

American citizens are paying approximately a billion dollars a year for sea freight and fares. To preserve an economic balance, at least 53 percent of these freights and fares should be returned to American pockets and ultimately be spent in America. We are only retrieving 30 percent and permitting 70 percent of these American dollars to be drained off abroad to build and operate efficient foreign ships to reduce that 30 percent, increase their American subsidy, and still further limit our foreign market. Benevolent America!

The explanation is simple. The ships we sold our shipping companies were left-overs from our successful effort to feed and save the Allies. They were built with little thought of their usefulness as peacetime carriers of our foreign commerce. Haste was the essence of our effort. After the war we spent millions in an unsuccessful effort to make them over into efficient ships and then sold them to American shipping companies for a song, which, even if badly sung, was much more than they were worth to operate in competition with foreign ships.

Incidentally, these inefficient ships cost our Government three and a half billions of dollars, and we are now paying over a hundred million dollars a year interest on the bonds sold to construct and recondition them. Incidentally, these ships and our troops did save the Allies; and again, incidentally, that incomparable Welsher from Wales—Mr. Lloyd George—in an article published not very long ago, blamed the after-war world dislocation and all the British troubles to our delay in getting our troops into the trenches after we came into the war.

Of more direct importance is the fact that since the close of the war all maritime countries, except only the United States, have carried on continuous construction of fast modern ships under the stimulus of the 132,000,000 American dollars loaned to foreign ship companies on the security of their bonds sold to Americans by American bankers, and the additional impetus of liberal subsidies and contributions from their own governments.

Does any American believe that the bankers of any other nation would sell to their countrymen, or that the citizens of any other country would buy, the bonds of foreign ship companies to enable the building of foreign ships, increasing the naval strength of possible future enemy nations in time of war and creating competition with the ships under their own flag for world commerce in time of peace? Benevolent America!

Meantime this country has built a very few modern liners and combination liner and cargo vessels, aided by subterfuge mail subventions, which, however, were not extended to the construction or operation of cargo ships, and so we have not a modern competitive cargo ship on the seas flying the American flag. Ten- and twelve-knot cargo vessels cannot compete with the 18-knot cargo ships of Japan, Great Britain, and Norway.

The United States cannot hold the seas, regain our foreign commerce, and recoup our share of American freight and passage money without reconditioning some of its ships and building a large number of new ships of types, tonnages, and speed adapted to the trade routes they are to serve and the cargoes they seek to carry.

As by far the greater number of American-flag ships are nearing the age deadline of 20 years on the sea, time is the essence of congressional action.

In view of the high wages paid to American labor and the high cost of materials that go into ship construction, we cannot build ships in American yards as cheaply as abroad nor operate them as cheaply. It follows that in order to build new ships in American yards and operate them in competition with foreign shipping, our Government must grant differential construction subsidies and differential operating subsidies to our shipping companies and also offset the subsidies granted foreign lines with like subsidies to American companies in competition with these lines. In addition, if we are to have competitive ships, the Government must extend amortization loans to cover a very considerable part of the cost of the ship to the owner. Large sums are involved in modern ship construction, and as investments in ships are capital investments they are not bankable loans, and other moneys in large amounts are not obtainable from outside sources.

A measure granting necessary subsidies but failing to provide adequate construction loans would drive us into Government ownership and operation. While such a result would please our foreign competitors for foreign trade and a few of our citizens who have majored in government ownership and control at Moscow, its condemnation by the great body of our citizenship is not in doubt.

It is rumored some Senators are maneuvering to emasculate the Bland-Copeland bill, a reasonably acceptable measure which passed the House at the last session of Congress, but owing to blockading tactics, failed to get on the floor of the Senate for passage.

Some merchant marine bill will probably receive the attention of the Senate shortly after Congress convenes in January. No measure it will consider will be of greater concern to our national prosperity and safety.

We hold no brief for shipping companies, if any, which misapplied mail subventions, nor for Congress in the passage, nor the Shipping Board in the administration, of that measure. Neither do we attribute the blame for its failure to any single one of those bodies. Had the law been properly guarded in its provisions for the application of subvention funds or, if well guarded, had it been efficiently administered, it is difficult to apprehend how large sums could have been deviated from their designed purpose. So far as any present disclosures to the public are concerned, it seems fair to assume that "there is blame enough for all" and to divide that blame three ways.

Such matters, however, have no proper bearing upon the national need of a competitively efficient merchant marine. Its proper bearing is upon the need for a more efficient drafting of the provisions of the new Merchant Marine Act in respect to the use of the Government funds provided and to the setting up of an administrative body which shall be as independent of unofficial political control as our form of government permits.

Public sentiment as reflected by the American press is preponderantly favorable to granting direct subsidies for construction and operation of a merchant fleet capable of holding its own in the sharp competition on the seas.

These ships must give promise of profits or they will not be built. They must seek and find cargoes in order to profit, and in doing this they find foreign trade for the Nation.

Fully 80 percent of this cost of construction and equipment goes directly into the pockets of American labor; not in shipyards alone, but in the mines and mills and in the factories and on the farms well scattered over the Nation.

Ships are durable goods and as are mechanical equipments and tools which must find replacement in our shipyards and factories and mills—and the construction and equipment of these ships and these necessary replacements will constitute the largest contribution to our output of durable goods within reach. The manufacture and marketing of durable goods create the sole financial justification of a liberal demand for consumers' goods.

The public is familiar with the need of merchant ships—a very large number of them—and their officers and crews to serve as armed naval auxiliaries and unarmed service ships in war in order that the fighting fleet may be fed and fueled and served with ammunition and other necessary supplies. That these auxiliaries and service ships must have speed enough to keep up with the fleet at sea is obvious.

It may not be so well known that most of our merchant fleet is not only of inefficient speed and types but most of its ships are fast approaching an age when they should be withdrawn from sea service. We have no cargo ships or tankers that can steam within 6 knots an hour of the ordinary cruising speed of the fleet, and the number of our merchant ships adapted to conversion to armed auxiliaries is negligible compared with the numbers possessed by the other powers.

A nation whose wealth in natural resources is unequaled, whose normal agricultural and industrial production far exceeds its capacity to consume, invites disastrous economic encroachment when it permits its efficient transport to halt at tidewater.

We have loaned foreign ship companies over one hundred and thirty-two millions of American dollars on security that is in large part now defaulted and are freely contributing an additional two hundred millions of American dollars a year to the upbuilding of foreign shipping. Providence is said to watch over children and fools. Perhaps a providential Congress will now do something for the neglected shipping of benevolent America.

PREPARATIONS FOR DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL CONVENTION—ADDRESS BY W. FORBES MORGAN

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, on last Saturday evening Mr. W. Forbes Morgan, secretary of the Democratic National Committee, delivered over the radio a very interesting address with reference to the coming Democratic National Convention in Philadelphia. I ask unanimous consent to have the address printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PREPARATIONS FOR THE 1936 DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL CONVENTION

The Democratic National Committee would like to tell you this evening about a coming event which we Democrats think will live long in the memory of the American people as one of the most interesting, significant, and historical meetings in the Nation's contemporary political annals. I refer to the great national convention of the Democratic Party which will open in Philadelphia on the 23d of June.

Four years ago, as you undoubtedly recall, the Democratic leaders met in Chicago, and after a lively and inspiring convention selected as their standard bearers Franklin D. Roosevelt and John N. Garner, a ticket that proved to be the overwhelming choice of the American people at the succeeding November election. Quite naturally, we anticipate that what we do this year will be of equally compelling importance to every citizen and resident of the country. The deliberations of that Chicago convention profoundly affected the political and social life of this country, and we firmly believe that this year's meeting will likewise be fraught with lasting significance to all of us.

Philadelphia was selected by the national committee as the gathering place of Democracy's hosts this year after a long and painstaking consideration of the many fine cities vieing for that honor. The choice was appropriate, wise, and timely. Philadelphia is the city of brotherly love, the home of the Liberty Bell that rang forth more than a century and a half ago with the glad tidings of American independence from the yoke of foreign tyranny. It is the birthplace of the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States. Perhaps no other city in the world is so associated by tradition and history with the age-long struggle for the preservation of human and political rights, for which the Democratic Party stands.

A few days ago it was my pleasure to visit Philadelphia and, through the courtesy of the mayor, our party was escorted to Independence Hall where once again we gazed upon the Liberty Bell. It was an inspiring sight and we decided then and there that the Liberty Bell, before which we stood in reverential salute, the tolling of which has meant freedom and happiness for untold millions in this country since the days of the Revolution, should be the symbol and insignia of the Democratic National Convention. I am sure the thousands of delegates and visitors who come to Philadelphia during our convention will have their feelings of patriotism revived and strengthened by a visit to Independence Hall and the other historical landmarks of that proud old city.

The success which has attended our initial efforts in making arrangements is due in large measure to the cooperation and help of those Pennsylvanians and Philadelphians who were active in having their city selected as the site of the Democratic Convention. I refer to Gov. George H. Earle; Mayor S. Davis Wilson; Albert M. Greenfield, head of the Citizens Committee of Philadelphia; Mrs. Emma Guffey Miller, national committeewoman of Pennsylvania; and last but not least, Senator JOSEPH F. GUFFEY, the first Democrat elected to the United States Senate from the Keystone State since the Civil War. They are alive, alert, and anxious to make this a memorable party gathering.

The Philadelphia Municipal Auditorium, where the convention will be held, is admirably suited to a gathering of this kind and character. It is ample, adequate, and commodious. It has a seating capacity of 15,000 people, every one of whom will be able to see and hear whatever transpires in the convention. The acoustics have been tested by experts and declared to be unexcelled by any hall of equal size in this country. We can assure those who visit the convention that every comfort and convenience will be provided for them. There will be a conspicuous lack of the overcrowding and high temperatures which, unfortunately, have been so common to large political gatherings in the past.

A staff of competent physicians and nurses will be at hand from local hospitals to provide first aid. Enough rooms and reception halls will be provided for the delegates and their friends to chat and swap political ideas in comfort. A special subpost office will be established by the city for the duration of the convention and mail for the delegates may be sent to that address. Every precaution will be taken to insure the well-being of those who attend.

Now, I wish to give a timely reminder to those of my hearers who are interested and who may possibly attend the convention as delegates or alternates. To expedite the routine handling of business, please make sure that the credentials of delegates are on file with the secretary of the national committee in Washington so they may be checked and placed in readiness before we move to the site of the convention. The convention itself will be officered under the supervision of the sergeant at arms of the Democratic National Convention, Col. Edwin A. Halsey. The staff will be selected from loyal party workers, who will give their services gratuitously. The auditorium management will provide the actual staff in charge of ticket taking and other physical arrangements, and the committee will provide a supplementary staff to aid in that work.

The distribution of tickets will be handled as expeditiously and as fairly as possible. Naturally, first consideration will be given to those who have come to the assistance of the party financially and otherwise.

Press arrangements for the convention will be under the direction of the standing committee of correspondents of the congressional press galleries in Washington, and all applications for press tickets should be addressed to Mr. Thomas L. Stokes, the chairman of that committee. In accordance with the custom of long standing, the national committee is leaving the question of newspaper coverage to the newspapermen themselves. They have handled it capably in the past and will again, I am sure. Commodious quarters will be provided for the great news distributing agencies to carry on their work at the convention hall as conveniently as possible. The latest up-to-date arrangements for radio broadcasting are assured.

In fact, the auditorium is so well provided with space that meeting rooms will be available for the important convention committees like those on credentials, resolutions, and arrangements. It will not be necessary, as it has been in the past, to hold those meetings in hotels, thus delaying proceedings.

In the very near future there will be announced a committee on arrangements, appointed by Chairman James A. Farley, which will take care of all details and to which applications may be made for information about the convention. Meanwhile, those interested and desiring information, may address all inquiries to the secretary of the Democratic National Committee, National Press Building, Washington, D. C.

Philadelphia is particularly fortunate in being able to provide adequate hotel accommodations for the thousands of people who are expected to visit the city during the convention period. There are more than 25 first-class hotels, equipped to give their guests everything that could be expected by men and women seeking modern living conditions. Not only that, but we have been given positive assurance by the hotel people that moderate and reasonable rates will prevail. The Bellevue-Stratford has been selected as headquarters by the national committee. Information regarding hotels and regarding Philadelphia generally and all local matters appertaining to the convention may be obtained by writing direct to the office of Mayor S. Davis Wilson, Philadelphia, Pa.

Perhaps the foregoing brief sketch will serve to give you an idea in rough outline of what we are attempting to do for the benefit of those who intend seeing the convention either in an official capacity or as spectators. The facilities at hand convince us that this year's Democratic gathering can be made one of the most pleasant ever held from the standpoint of convenience and comfort. The weather in Philadelphia is usually very pleasant in June, and we feel certain the weather man won't fail us this year.

Of course, from the standpoint of political interest, it is hardly necessary for me to say that the proceedings of the convention itself will hold the attention of the entire country from the moment the temporary chairman brings down his gavel at the opening session until the delegates leave for home with a platform adopted and a ticket nominated for the next campaign. We Democrats have had a great many charges and complaints hurled against us during our many years of political life, but no one yet has ever accused us of being tiresome or dull. When we have a family disagreement we "speak right out in meeting" at this huge family gathering and say exactly what we mean. We take it that democracy itself is founded on that principle.

We are going to Philadelphia this year in a happy frame of mind, confident that the hard years are behind us and cheered by the prospects of what lies ahead. We like music. When the State delegations arrive, we hope they all bring with them their bands and drum corps and their finest singers. People accomplish their best work in an atmosphere of happiness and good cheer and we are certain the Democratic convention of this year will prove no exception. There is nothing like a good band in bright and snappy uniforms to inspire a gathering of Andrew Jackson Democrats to their best efforts.

Philadelphia is going to give you a welcome this June that will surprise and please you every moment you are there. Attractive entertainment features are being arranged for the convention period, outstanding among which will be the great Mummers Parade, a novel form of entertainment almost unrivaled in this country. It reminds one of the gay Mardi Gras festival at New Orleans, which has attracted so much favorable and friendly attention. The Mummers Parade was held in January but this year it will be repeated in June for the benefit of those who visit the city in that month. There will be other entertainments, big league baseball, water sports on Schuylkill River, a golf tournament and playing facilities for convention delegates and their guests, and the very latest stage shows and moving-picture productions.

The convention roster will be sprinkled throughout with men and women who are known the length and breadth of the land, with people who not only make news but who make the contemporary history of our country. Many of them will be remembered for generations to come for what they have done and are doing in our social and political life.

So then, remember that you will be welcome in Philadelphia; remember that the city is prepared to give you an unusual and friendly greeting and that the Democratic Party will be pleased and delighted to have you there. Without indulging in exaggeration or hyperbole, I honestly believe that we can assure you that the national convention of the Democratic Party will be one of the high spots of the year 1936.

NEUTRALITY AND TREATIES—ARTICLE BY PROF. THOMAS H. HEALY

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I present and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article pertaining to section 15 of the pending neutrality bill, written by Thomas H. Healy, Ph. D., dean and professor of international law, Georgetown University School of Foreign Service, and which appeared in the Sunday Star, Washington, D. C., January 19, 1936.

There being no objection, the article was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Star, Jan. 19, 1936]

NEUTRALITY BILL RAISES CONFLICTS WITH TREATIES—SECTION 15 PROVIDES PRESIDENT MAY NEGOTIATE FOR MODIFICATION, BUT BARRIERS TO PLAN APPEAR

(By Thomas H. Healy, Ph. D., dean and professor of international law, Georgetown University School of Foreign Service)

Section 15 of the administration's neutrality bill, now under consideration by Congress, raises some important questions as to conflicts between existing treaties and neutrality revision. That section provides that where there is such conflict the President of the United States may negotiate with foreign countries for modification of the treaties. Our Government has repeatedly protested against the unilateral abrogation of treaties.

The latest statement on this subject was given to the press by Secretary of State Hull on December 5, 1935, as a warning to Japan on her recent North China activities. Saying that respect for treaty obligations is most essential, Mr. Hull reiterated that "this Government adheres to the provisions of the treaties to which it is a party"; he urged other nations to do likewise.

This attitude raises some interesting (if not embarrassing) questions in reference both to our recent neutrality policy and the revision now under consideration. Article 6 of our existing commercial treaty with Italy (which is practically identical with articles in treaties with a number of other nations) contains the following provisions: "Nor shall any prohibition be imposed on the importation or the exportation of any articles, the product or manufacture of the United States or of Italy, to or from the territories of the United States or to or from the territories of Italy which shall not equally extend to all other nations." As this clause is still recognized by the United States as being effective, even the existing arms embargo (independently of any possibility of embargoes on raw materials) is an obvious breach on the part of the United States of the treaty; our existing arms embargo applies only to Italy and Ethiopia and does not equally extend to all nations.

VARIOUS ASPECTS CONSIDERED

It would be well to examine certain reasons that might be offered in justification of this treaty breach. By quota and other restrictions affecting the commerce of the United States differently from the commerce of other countries with Italy, it might be argued that by previous actions Italy herself so nullified this provision that it should no longer bind the United States. While at first blush this may seem to the layman a sufficient justification for our actions, an examination of our law and precedents does not appear to support this position.

Curiously enough, there is a direct case in point involving this principle and concerning another treaty between the United States and Italy. It is the cause celebre of Charlton against Kelly, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in 1913. The Supreme Court interpreted the extradition treaty between the United States and Italy, whereby both nations agreed to extradite persons accused of certain crimes, without any reservation as to handing over their own citizens. Charlton, an American citizen, murdered his wife in Italy, fled to the United States, and his extradition was demanded by Italy.

Because of the wealth and social position of the defendant, the case in those days was as famous as the recent Insull case. Charlton's attorneys argued that the United States had no right or obligation to extradite him to Italy because Italy herself had previously violated this treaty by refusing to deliver up certain of her own citizens to the United States. The essence of the defense argument was that the treaty was annulled by the previous violations of Italy.

"VOIDABLE BUT NOT VOID"

Our Supreme Court gave this argument careful consideration and expressed its conclusions in the following words: "If the attitude of Italy was, as contended, a violation of the obligation of the treaty, which, in international law, would have justified the United States in denouncing the treaty as no longer obligatory, it did not automatically have that effect. If the United States elected not to declare its abrogation, or come to a rupture, the treaty would remain in force. It was only voidable, not void; and if the United States should prefer, it might waive any breach which in its judgment had occurred and conform to its own obligations as if there had been no such breach. That the political branch of the Government recognizes the treaty obligation as still existing is evident by its action in this case. * * * The executive department having thus elected to waive any right to free itself from the obligations to deliver up its own citizens, it is the plain duty of this Court to recognize the obligation to surrender the applicant as one imposed by the treaty as the supreme law of the land and as affording authority for the warrant of extradition."

As is usual in many treaties, article 25 of the commercial treaty with Italy provides specifically how it can be terminated. It provides termination 12 months after official notification has been given by one of the parties of its intention to terminate the treaty at that time. No such notification has yet been given. Even if it were given the treaty would remain in effect for another 12 months. The actions of our State Department indicate clearly that the executive branch of our Government considers the commercial treaty still in effect today.

CHANGED ATTITUDE SEEN

That our Government fully appreciates the difficulties raised by such general provisions prohibiting restrictions on exports is evidenced by its actions in recent years in inserting special provisions in new treaties making an exception in reference to war materials. The latest example of this is the trade agreement between the United States and Canada that has just come into effect. In article 12 of that agreement it is stated that "nothing in this agreement shall be construed * * * to prevent the adoption of such measures as either Government may see fit with respect to the control of the export or sale for export of arms, ammunition, or implements of war, and, in exceptional circumstances, all other military supplies."

Section 15 of the administration's neutrality bill similarly recognizes the difficulty by providing that in case of conflict with existing treaties the President may negotiate with the foreign country for the necessary modifications. Naturally this will take time, and it is a bilateral action, not dependent solely on the will of the United States.

And this brings up another interesting and peculiar point of law. In international law a treaty is a contract, which, like all other contracts, cannot be changed by the action of one party acting alone. On the other hand, under the domestic law of the United States, treaties and acts of Congress are on a parity. Neither is superior to the other and the determining factor is which is the latter in point of time. Therefore, under our domestic law, Congress can pass acts which unilaterally abrogate treaties. Such congressional action is binding on our courts. This, however, does not remove the international binding effect of the treaty without the consent of the other nation. Our Government has repeatedly recognized this principle; and, furthermore, Mr. Hull has just reiterated our traditional policy protesting against unilateral abrogation of treaties, whether or not it is done under the provisions of the domestic law of the other nations concerned. It might be embarrassing for our State Department to offer as justification for a unilateral abrogation the powers of our domestic Congress when we protest against other nations following a similar procedure.

EQUAL TREATMENT SPECIFIED

While the existing treaty with Italy (as well as with other nations) recognizes that when one of the parties is a belligerent it obtains special rights to prevent contraband from reaching its enemy, it is clearly understood that this does not give the other party—the neutral—the right to prohibit the free exportation of goods, unless they are equally prohibited to all other nations, without any reservation as to whether they are belligerent or neutral. This is because of the equal-treatment clause, of which article 6 of the Italian-American treaty is a normal example.

Remembering that the laws of contraband confer special rights on belligerents to interfere with neutral commerce (without giving to the neutral any right to restrict exports to some but not all nations, where there is a most-favored-nation treaty in existence) it is well to examine certain principles of contraband and special facts connected with our treaty with Italy.

There never has been any effective agreement as to what is or is not contraband. Our treaty with Italy, recognizing this difficulty, makes special provisions of its own. In article 15 of that treaty it is stated that "the liberty of navigation and commerce secured to neutrals by the stipulations of this treaty shall extend to all kinds of merchandise excepting those only which are distinguished by the name of contraband of war. And in order to remove all causes of doubt and misunderstanding upon this subject the contracting parties expressly agree and declare that the following articles, and no others, shall be considered as comprehended under this denomination." The article thereupon lists various articles which are essentially implements of war. It thereby excludes all raw materials such as oil and cotton.

ARGUMENT UNTENABLE

Here again it has been urged that these definitions no longer hold, because during the World War Italy served notice that she would not be bound by them and extended her contraband list to include many of the excluded articles. This argument, while plausible, seems legally untenable for exactly the same reasons offered above in relation to the most-favored-nation clause. As a matter of fact, during the World War we did not elect to consider the treaty annulled because of the announced violation of Italy and there is no indication that even up to the present moment has our Government elected to consider the treaty not binding on the United States.

In these days, when it is becoming more and more the practice to reexamine acts of Congress and Executive acts with a purpose of determining whether they are legal or not, it is probable that in connection with our new neutrality policies, our Government will give adequate consideration to the legal points sketched in this article and which may be summarized as follows:

Our present arms embargo against Italy seems to be a breach of an existing treaty.

Extension of the restrictions to oil, cotton, and other materials may be an even more obvious breach.

Under our domestic law Congress undoubtedly has the power to place such restrictions. This, however, does not remove the international binding effect.

Unless we are ready to engage in the same unilateral abrogation of treaties which we have protested in the case of other nations, the legal solution seems to be to carry out promptly the terms of section 15 of the Administration's neutrality bill and enter upon negotiations with other nations for modification or termination of conflicting treaties.

In case we are to terminate treaties legally, we should follow the procedure provided in those treaties as to termination.

In the case of Italy, if notice of termination were served now (as it could be) the treaty would not actually go out of effect until 1 year hence.

LARGE-SCALE ACTION SEEN

It might well be argued that flagrant violations of a treaty give the other nation the right to immediate termination. If we care to use this principle and at the same time be consistent and refrain from dangerous discrimination, we shall have to embark on treaty denunciation on a large scale. As the voluminous records show clearly, many leading nations can be charged with flagrant violations of their treaties with us, involving trade discriminations, extension of the contraband list, and (in a number of cases) the Kellogg pact. Even Great Britain, France, and Japan would not be exempt under one or more of these headings. Unilateral treaty denunciation (even for good cause) is a dangerous weapon; in sweeping away the bad clauses we may destroy other clauses of great value to us. In view of Mr. Hull's stand, it would seem much better to terminate undesirable parts of existing treaties by the orderly legal processes provided within the treaties or by mutual agreement through negotiations. It will not be difficult to modify or terminate conflicting treaty provisions, but if we are consistent this cannot be done immediately and solely through the fiat of the United States.

While the observations here made concern more particularly Italy, the same theories and the same problems arise in reference to all other nations with which we have treaties, with the exception of the recent ones that have a special reservation about war materials. All of which shows that neutrality revision is more complicated than some of our citizens suspect, and that it cannot be considered by itself, but, rather, in connection with other domestic and international laws and policies.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE NEWSPAPERS—ADDRESS BY EDWARD A. FILENE

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by Mr. Edward A. Filene, of Boston, on December 21, 1935, entitled "Our President and Our Newspapers."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

American newspapers are the best newspapers in all the world, but there is one interesting piece of news which they are not telling.

In the spring of 1933, when business was prostrate and our banks were closed, these newspapers as a rule were loud in their praises of President Roosevelt. But now, when the papers themselves are heralding the story of returning prosperity, most of them are denouncing the President and declaring that the business revival which is occurring under his administration cannot occur under his administration.

One might suppose that this is because another Presidential election will soon be due and that the editors of these papers are generally Republicans. But that doesn't explain it, as every newspaperman understands.

We cannot tell when we read an editorial what the writer of that editorial really thinks. We cannot always tell when we read a newspaper what the owner thinks. As a rule, however, we can tell what the owner wants us to think. And for very definite reasons the owners and financial backers of most of our larger newspapers do not want the masses of America to understand what the Roosevelt administration has been really doing.

It just happens to be a fact that most of our great American dailies are owned or controlled either by big business or by banking interests.

Whether the Roosevelt administration is right or wrong, we must admit that this is a serious situation. In America, at least theoretically, the people rule. What kind of Government we have depends upon their votes; and how people vote depends upon how well they understand the issues at stake. Daily they read their newspapers because they want to keep informed; and they read them, not only for the news, but for interpretations of the news—for some understanding of the meaning of events.

And yet, in a great national crisis, in which our national administration, working for a better distribution of wealth, has somehow come into conflict with the great financial and big-business interests, it turns out that our newspapers—the very source of the average voter's information and education—are usually owned and controlled by these same special interests.

But it isn't a conspiracy. The story is much more interesting than that. Getting angry, moreover, won't help in the least. Admittedly, there is great confusion, but confusion cannot be dispelled by blindly fighting it. All that we really need to do is to understand the situation. Then we may discover that it isn't altogether bad.

Our typical modern newspaper is a big business.

To secure the advertising of national advertisers the newspapers had to become big. They had to get large circulations. To do that required new and expensive equipment, and that required much new capital. In many cases newspapers which had been fighting each other pooled their interests and merged, and the papers which did not merge into larger units presently found themselves in financial straits.

That's where the banks came in. The newspaper business, to them, was just like any other business; and when a business which had once been profitable could no longer meet its obligations, creditors simply had to take some action. If the property could be saved by merging with some other properties, that was one way out. All over the United States, therefore, the same thing began to happen. The day of personal journalism was ending. The day of big business in the gathering and dissemination of more and more accurate news arrived. By this time, however, one property after another was in control of big business interests, not because they had conspired to mold public opinion, but because, under the circumstances, it could not be otherwise.

But why did these newspapers laud the President, or at least refrain from criticizing him, in the dark spring of 1933?

That's easy. Strange as it may seem, American financial interests were not particularly anxious to have their way at that particular time.

They were too sick. Furthermore, they had had their way. That is what made them so sick.

So they begged the President to do something and do it quickly. They couldn't say what, but they wanted him to do something which would revive business. Even the newspaper business at that moment was in a bad way.

And President Roosevelt did something; and eventually business did show signs of recovery. Then the big financial interests did want their own way once more.

There's nothing mysterious about that. Most of my hearers, I am sure, must be acquainted with somebody who is prone at times to invest too heavily in, say, alcoholic spirits. He doesn't mean any harm. He just wants to have his own way; but when his own way makes him sick enough, he may agree 100 percent to the suggestion that he go on the water wagon.

But if going on the water wagon brings about recovery, look out. With his returning strength and returning will power, staying on the wagon may not appeal to him at all.
